It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

PREFACE.

THE only material alterations or augmentations that have been made in this edition, are: First, the incorporation in the text, of the few passages annexed to each volume of the first edition, under the head of "Additions and Corrections"; Secondly, the supplementary Appendix N. to Volume III., in reply to two Appendices to the second volume of Mr. Grote's History of Greece [3rd edit.], in which opinions expressed in this work have been controverted. With this exception, the author has not found it necessary to notice in detail the many, and for the most part indulgent and judicious criticisms, with which his labours have been honoured by the press of his own country.

He cannot however withhold a few remarks on the fourteen lines of unhandsome and disingenuous commentary, bestowed on his volumes by Professor Nitzsch of Kiel, in the preface to a recent work, entitled "Sagenpoesie der Griechen" (Kiel, 1852). It will be proper to apprise the English reader, that Professor Nitzsch was for many years distinguished among the scholars of Germany, by his zealous advocacy of the doctrine as to the Separate authorship of the Iliad and Odyssey, and that, in his lately published volume, he advances a new claim to the consideration of the classical public, by an equally zealous repudiation of that doctrine.

In the passage of his Preface above referred to¹, he begins by stating: that "he has looked into an English work entitled a Critical History of Greek Literature, &c., but has not found occasion to make any use of its contents." Several reasons suggest themselves, for this unwillingness to aid the promulgation of that work among his own countrymen.

In the first place, a portion of it is devoted to the confutation of his once favourite Separatist theory, and to an exposure of the errors and fallacies of which he had been guilty in its support.

In the next place, Professor Nitzsch having now abandoned that theory, and declared his adherence to the doctrine of a single Homer, on grounds chiefly borrowed from² or anticipated in these pages, it was quite natural that he should wish his recantation to

² Sometimes almost to the letter, as we could show by a collation of individual passages if necessary.

It may not be superfluous here to remark, that Prof. Nitzsch's attention was called to this work very shortly after its publication, in the spring of 1850, by a request on the part of a common friend, that he would review it for a German periodical with which that friend was connected. This request, as may be supposed under the circumstances, was not complied with.

appear spontaneous, rather than a concession to the arguments of, we believe, the only modern writer by whom the opinion to which he is now a convert, had been vindicated in a detailed and comprehensive form.

With the exception accordingly of the short paragraph of his preface here in question, explaining or affecting to explain the reasons for his contempt of our volumes, neither they nor their author have been mentioned, throughout Professor Nitzsch's 680 densely printed pages of diffuse commentary on the most threadbare subtleties of the Homeric controversy, and amid copious citations of the legion of other critics of every degree of importance or insignificance, who have taken part in it from the time of Wolf down to the present day.

Professor Nitzsch assigns as his first reason for considering our labours unworthy of his attention, that we have not entered into the "national consideration" of the Homeric question. We have some difficulty in apprehending the precise import of this mysterious phrase, and in particular, whether it alludes to the poet's Greek nationality, or to his German nationality. We have been the more at a loss, from observing that a like censure has been pronounced on Hermann, Lachmann, and other eminent scholars of his own country, whose Homeric nationality of both kinds is certainly more akin to his own than to ours. It is some consolation at least, in being subjected to so harsh a censure, to reflect that we have such distinguished companions in misfortune.

A second reason for his declining any particular notice of our opinions is: that "in so far as regards the illustration of Homer's genius and poetical art, he believes that he has himself treated that part of the subject in a more satisfactory manner than we have." Nothing can be more natural! It is possible however that other, less partial arbiters, may not be quite so indulgent towards a writer who, after having during many years maintained that the Iliad and Odyssey were not by the same poet, —after having expatiated in volumes of subtle disquisition on the diversity of character in the two works, in composition and style, in historical, geographical, and mythological facts and allusions, in moral and religious doctrine, in notices of manners and customs, in language and dialect, as evidence of difference of age,—who after all this changes his mind, asserts both poems to be by the same author, and even speaks with a sneer (p. 412.) of the originators and supporters of his own former doctrine! It is possible we repeat, that with these antecedents of Professor Nitzsch before their eyes, less partial judges of his own genius, may question his being quite so accurate a judge of the genius of Homer as he himself imagines.

Professor Nitzsch, in the third place, gives the finishing blow to the author's pretensions to rank as a Homeric critic, by denying all competency for that office, to any one who expresses himself so doubtfully regarding what he calls, in the pedantic jargon of his own school, the Diaskeuë; or, in other words, regarding the interpolations or corruptions, to which the original text of the poet has been subjected by the early reciters and editors.

It is not true that we have expressed ourselves the least doubtfully on that subject. Nothing can be more explicit than the terms in which we have, on numerous occasions, admitted the existence of such blemishes. Our expressions of doubt refer solely to the pretensions advanced, by rash and hypercritical commentators, to infallibility in their detection. It is true that, in regard to such questions, we have at all times been guided by the spirit of caution and forbearance so worthless in the estimation of Professor Nitzsch; but the absence of which has always appeared to us the ruling defect of the school to which he belongs, and the main obstacle to any practical good resulting from its labours. We have never, we readily admit, arrogated to ourselves the privilege of discarding at will as nongenuine, all those passages of either poem which may happen to stand in the way of some favourite theory or fancy of our own. For such is the true definition of the practice, which Professor Nitzsch considers so indispensable to success in Homeric criticism. No impartial student of the commentaries of Wolf or Heyne, of Hermann or Lachmann, of Payne Knight or Nitzsch, — advocates respectively of the Pisistratian system, the Digamma system, the Patchwork system, the Separatist system, or any other of the numerous modifications of conjecture or paradox, which have bewildered the German brain during the last sixty years, — can fail to perceive, that the dissecting knife of each successive experimentalist, has been directed with scrupulous accuracy to those parts of the Homeric body, on which it was necessary for the sake of his own particular theory to operate, whether in the mode of amputation or otherwise. If these celebrated masters who, however widely at issue on other points, are united in zeal for the mutilation of the poems, could have held a council-general, or congress, on the subject of “Diaskeuë,” and have arrived at some tangible conclusion, as to the precise extent to which the existing text was to be cut up or pared down, even more merciful critics might have been disposed to pay deference to their verdict. But when we find one summarily rejecting what another as confidently retains ; a third condemning and ridiculing what a fourth vindicates and admires ; when we find each dashing out with his pen (like the passing dilettante with his brush, in the familiar story of the picture exposed to wayfaring criticism) the to him objectionable passages, until the whole becomes an undistinguishable mass of blots and scratches, can any reasonable man look on such proceedings as based on common sense or sound criticism ? In the text of this same volume of Professor Nitzsch where we are taunted for our over caution, Hermann and Lachmann, who have carried the work of destruction somewhat further than himself, are smartly attacked for their extravagance, and their views are denounced as "unintelligible," and "impossible," and "idle talk," &c. Hermann and Lachmann again, while each rejecting a great part, it may better be said the whole of the Iliad, as spurious, differ widely as to the mode in which the shreds and patches of Hexameter verse that result from their labours, are to be distributed among the legion of epic ballad-singers whom they have conjured into existence for behoof of their theories. In one thing however they cordially agree, and that is, in regarding Nitzsch's comparative moderation with as great scorn, as he does our disinclination to mix ourselves up in what appears to us a most unprofitable dispute.

It would seem however, that Professor Nitzsch's notion of a competent Homeric critic, in regard to this all important subject of "the Diaskeuë," is, not that he should agree with Professor Nitzsch as to what are the spurious parts of the Iliad and Odyssey, but that he should be prepared at least to discard large portions of their text as spurious; no matter whether the same as, or different from, the portions so discarded by Professor Nitzsch himself. The only parallel case that occurs to us is in the old French farce of the Frères féroces; where the candidate for admission into a company of freebooters, is required to bring evidence that he has robbed or murdered a certain number of travellers, no matter whether that number should consist, in whole or in part, of near friends and relatives of other members of the band.

But the crowning proof of the rottenness of this system, as regards at least Professor Nitzsch's application of it, is to be found in the fact, that after having, some twenty years ago, in the exercise of this heaven-born faculty (Divination, as he himself defines it) of discerning sameness or diversity in epic authorship, proved, to his own satisfaction at least, in a voluminous treatise, that the Iliad and Odyssey were by different poets,—he now, in a still more ponderous dissertation, rejects his former doctrine and arguments as false or fallacious, and maintains in a most authoritative tone, the very opinions which he formerly condemned and controverted. We have no wish to be severe on so valuable a convert to views, the establishment of which we have so greatly at heart. In justice to ourselves however, we must appeal to the impartial public, whether our method be not, of the two, the one best justified by its practical results. The "National consideration" by which we have been guided, and our mode of dealing with the doubtful portions of the text, have led us, from the commencement of our Homeric researches, to the steady maintenance of truths, to which the "National consideration" of Professor Nitzsch, and his intuitive perception of "Diaskeuë," have blinded him during the best years of his life. The question at issue really lies between rashness and recantation on the one hand, and caution and consistency on the other.

Nor must it be overlooked, that Professor Nitzsch's abandonment of his wider range of Separatist heresy, has brought in its train a like abjuration of several subordinate points of heterodoxy, to which he till lately subscribed. Omega of the Iliad for example, formerly condemned by him, has now, also mainly on grounds anticipated in our pages, been admitted to its just Homeric rights, and place in the original poem. Let us hope that he may yet live to produce, after another interval of twenty years, another volume of some 700 pages, in which other portions of either poem, such as the eighth book of the Odyssey or the tenth of the Iliad may, on the same infallible authority, be relieved from the stigma of illegitimacy which, for the present, it is still his pleasure should attach to them.¹

The wonderful part of the matter is, that an

author who has committed himself to so marvellous an extent, in the application of a favourite method of criticism in the gross, should still continue gravely to boast of the excellence of that method, and of his own peculiar skill in its management in detail. After having been so widely at fault in regard to two entire poems, he not only invites us to repose implicit confidence in his gift of inspiration, when brought to bear on individual passages of their text, but exultingly contrasts the rash spirit of adventure to which he owes the disasters of his previous voyage, with the caution and forbearance that have guided others in safety through the same dangerous course of navigation.

Of all qualifications for an office, the meanest is one which every body possesses. It would have been quite as easy for us as for Professor Nitzsch, to discard on all occasions as interpolations, such portions of either poem as did not happen to square with our own views. We might also, if ambitious of distinction in so questionable an arena of polemical gymnastics, have amused ourselves and wearied our readers, as he habitually does, by diffuse speculations on the nongenuine character of this or that verse or passage. Our reasons for avoiding, in as far as possible, such pedantic discussions, have been explained in several parts of this history, to the satisfaction we believe of that portion of our readers who unite common sense to the other qualifications of competent critics. And it would have been more to the purpose, and to his own credit, had Professor Nitzsch sq.) of the tenth book, with its brilliant and cheering exploits, to account for the change of feeling in the army between the ninth and eleventh books, from despondency at the close of the one, to cheerful hope and confidence at the commencement of the other.

fairly met and combated those reasons, instead of indulging in supercilious taunts at our forbearance, such as could hardly fail to recoil upon himself.

In objecting however, to the manner in which he has abjured his late errors, we, in common with every true admirer of Homer, hail the fact of his conversion with sincere pleasure. We should be doing injustice to Professor Nitzsch, were we not to admit, that his elaborate support of the Separatist theory, and the influence of his casuistical arguments in blinding the eyes of less critical students to its fallacy, had placed him, for some time past, in the position of chief bulwark or champion of the old Wolfian heresy in the land of its birth. The other more licentious modifications of that heresy, which we have characterised above as the Patchwork and Pisistratian systems, and which he himself combats under the collective definition of the Little-lay theory, had long proved more than a surfeit, even to the proverbially capacious German appetite for literary paradox. In regard to them, a new generation had arisen which knew not Wolf or Heyne. The efforts even of such veteran giants in polemical casuistry as Hermann and Lachmann, were found insufficient to stem the tide of returning common sense; nor, on their late removal from the scene, does their mantle appear to have fallen on any worthy successor. Professor Nitzsch's surrender of the remaining stronghold of error, with the defence of which he had specially charged himself, will, it is hoped, form the closing act of a controversy, so little credible to the taste or the judgement of the present enlightened age.

ADVERTISEMENT TO THE FIRST EDITION.

As the first Book of this History is in itself of a more or less introductory nature, it has been thought advisable to avoid any undue accumulation of preliminary matter, by comprising in the opening chapter the greater part of those observations which would, in ordinary cases, be embodied in the preface to a work of this description. The remarks here subjoined relate merely to the arrangement of certain subordinate details of the text.

In the citation of authorities, it has been the Author's object to preserve a middle course, between that meagreness which presumes a degree of confidence in his own accuracy, such as he has no right to expect on the part of the reader, and that profusion of references, which tends rather to bewilder than to assist the student, in attempting to form his own judgement by an appeal to original sources. As a general rule, the vouchers for each fact or opinion have been limited to the text of one or two standard authors; reference being frequently made at the same time, for the benefit of those who may desire a more copious array of authorities, to other modern works in which they have been given in greater abundance. Occasionally however, where importance might seem to attach to the number as well as the value of the testimonies on any particular point, they have been quoted at greater detail on the margin of the Author's own page.

The antient classics have usually been cited according to the books, chapters, or other similar subdivisions of their text. In the case however of some, especially the more voluminous of those authors, such as Plato, Strabo, Plutarch, the references, in conformity with what is still in these instances the usual practice, have frequently been made to the pages of the earlier standard editions. The numbers of those pages, as the critical student is aware, have been, as a general rule, noted by subsequent editors opposite to the corresponding subdivisions of the text, on the side margin of the pages of their own editions. In the citation of the Attic dramatists and of Pindar, poets whose metrical forms have afforded scope for much variety of arrangement to modern editors, the references are made to the text of the Leipzig Pocket Classics (Tauchnitz), unless where it is otherwise stated in the citation itself.¹ It could hardly happen but that, in the numerical details of so large a body of references, errors would occasionally find place. Every passage quoted has, however, been carefully verified in the original work; even therefore should the citation itself be at fault, the text appealed to will not be difficult to find, by aid of the copious indices with which editions of the classics are usually provided.

The Author cannot rate too highly his obligations to the zeal and industry of those, chiefly German, philologists, whose valuable collections of "Fragments," have done so much of late to mitigate the calamity sustained by the modern public, in the loss of the entire works which have supplied material for the labours of these meritorious scholars. Without the aid of their collections, the composition of several of the Author's own chapters, offering, as they do, a reconstruction as much as a history of the works to which they are devoted, would scarcely have been practicable. The most complete repertory of the fragments of epic literature treated in the second Book, especially of the Cyclic poems, and of those comprised under the title of Miscellaneous epic poems, is that of Düntzer. The occasional errors of its text have been checked, or its deficiencies made good, by the compilation embodied in Clinton's Fasti Hellenici; by that of Marckscheffel, for Eumelus, Cinæthon, and the Naupactica; by those of Müller and Wüllner for the Epic cycle; and by that of Leutsch for the Thebais. The best collection of the Fragments of Hesiod is that appended to the same work of Marckscheffel; a work containing a large mass both of valuable information and of sound criticism, on the various subjects of which it treats. The citation consequently of the Fragments of "Hesiod," and of the other poets in the compilation of Marckscheffel, will be made according to the numbers of his arrangement; in the citations of the Cyclic poems, and of the Miscellaneous epic poems, the numbers will be understood to be those of Düntzer; unless where, in either case, a different collection is named.

In respect to the Lyric poets, the compilations of Gaisford, Schneidewin, and Bergk, with the separate publications of Welcker, Liebel, Kleine, Matthiæ, Neue, and Bach¹, devoted to the remains of Alcman, Archilochus, Stesichorus, Alcæus, Sappho, and other authors of this period, leave probably little to desire or to hope, short of the discovery of the entire compositions of these illustrious poets. In the chapters devoted to their lives and works, the particular collection preferred as the standard text-book in each individual case will be specified.

In order to avoid that interruption of the just continuity of historical narrative, which would result from an accumulation, either in the body of the work or in the marginal notes, of the many illustrative or controversial details which are more or less indispensable to the full treatment of a subject of this nature, the Author has preferred annexing the greater portion of such matter in the form of Appendices to his volumes.

In the quotations of specimen passages from the lyric poets, translations of the texts quoted have been subjoined. This has been done with the hope, in which the Author cannot venture to feel very sanguine, of securing, even among non-Hellenist readers, some small addition to the very slender share of publicity or popularity now enjoyed by what is, beyond all comparison, the most brilliant period of Grecian or of European lyric poetry. In the quotations from the Iliad and Odyssey on the other hand, the Greek text alone has been given. It could hardly, under any circumstances, have been proper or necessary to supply the reader with versions of passages cited from poems so universally familiar, through the medium of classical modern translations, to all well-educated persons. Nor, in the present case, would the peculiar kind of illustration which the Author had in view, in his often copious extracts from those poems, have been in any great degree promoted by an equally copious supply of English versions.

In his translations from the Lyric poets, he has done his best to embody the letter as well as the spirit of the original. Where however, as sometimes happened, it did not appear that these two objects could be combined, he has considered it more desirable to attempt, by a free paraphrase, to convey to the mind of the reader unversed in the original tongue, a real impression of the genius of the passage and of its author, than by a rigid adherence to turns of Greek idiomatic thought or phraseology, to run the risk of rendering what is spirited and expressive in the one language, pointless or unintelligible in the other.

BOOK I.

INTRODUCTION.—MYTHICAL PERIOD.

CHAPTER I.

PLAN AND PROPOSED EXTENT OF THE WORK.

1. HISTORY OF LITERATURE NEGLECTED AS A BRANCH OF POPULAR COMPOSITION.— 2. ADVANTAGES OF ITS BETTER CULTIVATION.— 3. ERAS OR PERIODS OF GRECIAN LITERATURE. JUST LIMITS OF THE SUBJECT.— 4. CHARACTERISTICS OF ITS EARLIER STAGES. "HOMERIC QUESTION." POETICAL PERIOD.

1. A PROMINENT feature of distinction between the early more genial stages of literary culture, and those of its maturity or decay, is the tendency of the human mind, in the former periods to produce for itself, in the latter to speculate on the works of others. This remark may indeed only appear strictly applicable to a state of society in which the origin and early progress of intellectual pursuit can be traced to the spontaneous efforts of native genius. The case is somewhat different where the first advances in the arts of civilised life have been made under the guidance of foreign or antient models. Hence among the nations of modern Europe, whose civilisation is founded on the ruins of that of classical antiquity, scholastic or grammatical science has invariably preceded or accompanied the rise of taste for original composition. Even here, however, in regard to the properly national department of letters, the principle involved in the distinction above drawn will be found to hold good. Whatever zeal may have been displayed during our own middle ages by the learned men of Italy, France, or England, as commentators of the antient classics, it was not until the art of composition in the native languages of those countries had reached a certain stage of maturity, that the productions of their native authors supplied any field for the labours of professional grammarians.

In Greece, the fountain head of all European culture, no such causes intervened to obstruct or derange the natural course of events. Her literature was, in all its branches, a plant of indigenous growth, indebted to no foreign aid for its nurture or improvement. Its noblest monuments emanate from a period long prior to the existence of scientific grammar or criticism; the rise of which arts as a distinct order of pursuit, in the Alexandrian schools, was simultaneous with the decline or extinction of creative genius.

literature
neglected
as a branch of popular

Upon the same principle may partly be explained, how, among the various branches of historical literature, one of the last to be cultivated should be the history of literature itself. This may, indeed, be considered as in some degree the necessary, as well as the natural, course of things. As events must have happened before they can be recorded, so works must have been written, and the art of composing them carried to some degree of perfection, before its vicissitudes can become a subject of curious investigation. The indifference, however, which many nations have shown to a department of letters so attractive in itself, and so valuable in its results, can but partially be explained by any such cause. Literary history may, in truth, be ranked not only among the last, but the least cultivated branches of composition, both in antient and modern times. That the Greeks themselves should have shown so great an indifference to its value appears the more remarkable, when we consider the infinite number of channels in which, during their latter days, their over-exuberant genius found vent, and the voluminous library of works which it produced in the kindred class of subjects. Yet, among their legion of commentators and grammarians, there is no record of a historian of literature in the wider sense. Similar was the case with the Romans. It was hardly, indeed, to be expected, that a people so dependant for their progress in art and science on the models supplied by the Greeks, should open up for themselves any broad path of learned pursuit not previously trodden by their masters. Nor, on turning to our own commonwealth of letters, will it be found that this branch of composition, though not so entirely overlooked, has received the attention due to its claims. The literature of most European nations, that of our own country for example, has long since arrived at a stage which offers materials sufficiently varied and extensive for a great historical undertaking ; yet we possess no complete national work of this description, and few other countries can boast of one entitled to the rank which it ought to possess in a national library.

In regard to modern languages, the apparent anomaly may admit, in so far, of explanation or apology, that it is but as yesterday that, in comparison with those of classical antiquity, even the earliest cultivated among the former has furnished an adequate subject for enlarged historical treatment. Long before our own course of intellectual activity commenced, that of the Greeks had terminated; and their whole rich and valuable, though imperfect, bequest of literary materials has now been for centuries in the hands of the modern public. Considering, therefore, the large share of general attention which the monuments of Hellenic genius have attracted ever since the revival of learning in Europe; how dependant our own progress has been on the models which they supply; and the extraordinary amount of labour which has been and continues to be bestowed, often, it might almost be said, wasted, on the subordinate departments of speculative archæology; it may appear even still more surprising that no complete history of Grecian literature should have been produced in any modern tongue, than that the Greeks themselves should have failed to bequeath one.

Advantages
cultivation.

2. It were foreign to the present object, to speculate on the causes of this want of labourers in so fair and fertile a field. The advantages, however, derivable from its better cultivation are numerous and obvious. Every one must perceive how greatly the power of appreciating a work depends on a familiarity with the spirit, not only of the age which produced it, but of that which preceded or followed; on an insight into the habits of the author, the circumstances in which he composed, the models he studied, or the school to which he belonged. The investigation of these points is the province of the literary historian. Nor must we overlook the value of his more limited branch of the art, in its bearings on the wider province of civil history. If an accurate knowledge of the political state of any period be requisite in order to appreciate its polite learning, no less essential is a familiarity with its classical productions to a just estimate of the course or causes of political events. It is true that literature reflects, but it is equally true that it always influences, and often regulates, the moral and political destinies of nations. Even admitting, however, that the literary department of history may not be the most practically useful, it is not, or ought not certainly to be, the least attractive. The aspect under which the political annals of society exhibit human character is often most offensive, tending to lower rather than to raise the estimate of our species. How often are the greatest events brought about by worthless or insignificant agents, or perhaps, to all appearance, the result of accident. How often will the exercise of a very ordinary capacity, combined with vice and selfishness, be seen triumphing, by the mere favour of circumstances, over the best-directed efforts of virtue and patriotism. The task of the literary historian, on the other hand, is to portray humanity solely or chiefly under its amiable and ornamental features. The proper materials with which he has to deal are wit and genius. Dulness and mediocrity are, by the fundamental rules of his art, debarred from honourable distinction; and if vice be admitted to a share, it is only when accompanied by the fascinations of genius or learning.

The present work has been undertaken with the hope of supplying the existing void in our national library, in respect to that period of European culture which has furnished the standards of taste and models of excellence to all succeeding ages.

periods of
literature.

3. The literature of Greece classes itself almost spontaneously under six heads or periods, offering to the historian an equally apt arrangement of his subject.

I. The first, or Mythical period, comprises the origin and early culture of the nation and its language, with the legendary notices of those fabulous heroes and sages, to whom popular belief ascribed the first advances in elegant art or science, but of whose existence or influence no authentic monuments have been preserved.

II. The second, or Poetical period, extends from the epoch of the earliest authenticated productions of Greek poetical genius, through those ages in which poetry continued to be the only cultivated branch of composition, and terminates about the fifty-fourth Olympiad (B.C. 560).

III. The third, or Attic period, commences with the rise of the Attic drama and of prose literature, and closes with the establishment of the Macedonian ascendancy, and the consequent extinction of republican freedom in Greece.

IV. The fourth, or Alexandrian period, may be dated from the foundation of Alexandria, and ends with the fall of the Græco-Egyptian empire.

V. The fifth, or Roman period, succeeds, and extends to the foundation of Constantinople.

VI. The sixth, or Byzantine period, comprises the remaining ages of the decay and corruption of antient civilisation, until the final extinction of the classical Greek as a living language.

The strict order of this arrangement has only been infringed in the following pages in so far as certain heads of subject, though properly belonging to one period, might comprehend matter connected with, or common to, others. The inquiry, for example, into the Original genius of the Greek language and of Grecian literature, while embodying much of what may seem to appertain to later stages of their history, has been connected with the first, or Mythical period. It offers a general summary of the principles on which the whole subject will be treated; and, as proceeding upon data more or less familiar to the classical scholar, can hardly be said to anticipate the results of subsequent investigation.

That the author should be destined to complete his undertaking upon the extended plan above laid down is what the most sanguine anticipations of long life, health, leisure, or other requisites for the task, can hardly entitle him to hope. It may here, however, be proper to obviate a misapprehension apt to arise as to the scope and limits of any such work, and calculated to convey a still more serious impression of its extent or difficulty than the reality justifies. The literature of Greece comprehends, no doubt, in the wider sense, her philosophy and science, as well as her poetry, history, and drama. A place consequently belongs, among her authors, to Hippocrates and Euclid, as well as to Homer and Herodotus. The authors and works, however, of the former class supply subject for the history of science rather than of letters. Their value consists chiefly, if not solely, in the depth and soundness of their speculative doctrines, upon which the mere literary censor is under but little obligation to pronounce judgment.

ject.

Those peculiarities of composition or style, which in the more popular branches of writing are the chief objects of critical animadversion, here assume a secondary importance. Hence, by the received courtesy in such cases, the historian of literature, if not altogether free from the obligation to admit such works among his materials, is, at the most, bound to devote to them but a limited share of attention.

Characteristics of its
stages.

4. But, even with this restriction, the subject is one of formidable extent, and encumbered with difficulties, the nature of which can be rightly appreciated by those alone who have ventured closely to grapple with them. All inquiry into the history of a language must be based on a previous acquaintance with that of the people by whom it is spoken. In our own state of society, where the political vicissitudes of each nation, from the period of its first settlement in its present seats, are matter of comparative notoriety, the historian finds this primary head of investigation already so far prepared to his hand, as to coalesce easily with the general course of his subject. In primeval Greece it is involved in deep obscurity, and an apparently inextricable maze of controversy. That fabulous uncertainty in which the remote annals of every people are more or less enveloped, here assumes the form of the most complicated system of figurative mythology ever devised by the liveliest fancy or the most subtle ingenuity. Nor in the case of the Greeks, as in that of most other nations, is this darkness confined to their barbarous ages. It extends over a period in which they had already made great advances, not only in all the elementary arts of life, but in the refinement of their language and in elegant composition. The obscurity may even be said to increase, rather than diminish, as we enter upon that ostensibly more real and practical age, when individual works and authors present themselves in tangible forms to the contemplation. In the modern republic of letters, the appearance of those great masters whose creations form in after times the standards of excellence, coincides with a forward stage of civilisation and well-defined epochs of history. In Greece, not only the period at which they flourished, the place of their birth, and the circumstances of their lives, are unknown, but their very existence has been called in question. In the present age, more especially, the energies of many eminent critics have been exhausted in attempts to prove their individual personality to be illusive, and the supposed monuments of their genius but elaborate specimens of the book-making artifice of a comparatively recent period.

Another question of vital importance in the history not only of Greek but of universal literature, is that relative to the introduction and early use of alphabetic writing. Of this branch of inquiry it may be said as of those above noticed, that in proportion as it is simple and easily dispatched in the annals of modern culture, it is here obscure and enigmatical. It has, with the last and present generation of scholars, been commonly embraced under the single head familiarly called "the Homeric question." That arrangement, however, will here, for reasons to be assigned in their proper place, be set aside, and to each subject will be allotted its own separate share of attention.

On turning to the Homeric question itself, in the more restricted sense, when we consider the learning, ingenuity, and voluminous nature of the works devoted to its treatment during the last half-century, all, it might seem, that could now be required of the general historian were, according to the usual practice in such cases, to condense the materials at his disposal into a few concise and comprehensive chapters. With every respect, however, for the zeal and ability of those researches, we have found them still far from supplying even the elementary data for a final adjustment of the more delicate points at issue. In regard especially to one, and that the most important head of the whole subject, the internal evidence of the poems, despite the universal admission that from this source solely or chiefly can we hope for any real light on the obscurities of their history, we look in vain for any analysis of their text upon such enlarged and impartial principles as alone can insure distinct historical results. Every step, indeed, in the progress of our own investigations, by the deeper insight afforded into the beauties, the peculiarities, even the blemishes, which reflect the entire genius of "Homer," has tended more and more to the conviction that, if they have ever been fully appreciated, they have not hitherto been critically analysed or illustrated as they deserve, for the benefit of those who may themselves have less leisure or industry for such an undertaking. The analysis¹, therefore, of the Iliad and Odyssey, which will occupy so large a portion of the second book of this work, seemed, even apart from its bearings on controversial points, in itself a desirable contribution to the history of literature. No one who rightly estimates the spirit which animates those poems, the principles of their structure, or the characteristic properties of their style, can fail to perceive their boundless influence on the whole subsequent destinies of elegant culture in Greece and Europe. Homer is the father, not only of all classical poetry, but of all elegant composition. The family resemblance, in its various forms and degrees, can be clearly traced through every succeeding generation down to the present day. With his own countrymen he was the undisputed fountain head of excellence: his supremacy was equally acknowledged by their Italian neighbours; and by the joint influence and authority of the two races has been extended, directly or indirectly, over the civilised world. Homer is, as it were, the heart from which the life-blood has circulated, by however intricate a maze of arteries and veins, to the most distant extremities of the entire body of polite learning. A thorough insight, therefore, into the nicer mechanism of his works, is not merely indispensable to any clear apprehension of their author's genius, or of the circumstances under which they were composed: it supplies at the same time a complete code of those elementary laws, by the observance of which the art of composition has been matured and carried to perfection, and, in so far, a test of the degree in which Homer's successors in every age may have emulated his excellence or been influenced by his example.

The period comprised in the volumes now offered to the public terminates about the first dawn of that Athenian ascendancy in every branch of art and science which constitutes, in familiar estimation, the most brilliant era of classical antiquity. Their contents may therefore appear to offer comparatively limited sources of interest to the scholar of the present day. It must be remembered, however, that the inferior celebrity now enjoyed by these early authors, as compared with their successors of the Attic period, is in no degree attributable to any inferiority of merit on the part of the former. The difference is to be sought solely or chiefly in the circumstance, that, while so many masterpieces of the Attic poets and their contemporaries have been preserved, the works of earlier date which have survived the ravages of time and barbarism amount, if we except the poems of "Homer" and "Hesiod," to little more, even in the case of the most favoured authors, than a stock of remains just sufficient, by their own excellence, to embitter our regret for the loss of the entire body to which they belonged. Yet the list of names represented by these remains comprehends, in regard more especially to the lyric branches of poetical composition, a greater number of authors for whom the excellence of their entire works procured from the native public the highest award of fame and popularity than is to be found in the whole subsequent annals of classical literature. Among these names it may suffice to mention that of Archilochus, alone, among the successors of Homer, classed by the native critics as his rival in brilliancy and variety of genius; that of Sappho, equally supreme in the tender departments of lyric song; those of Alcæus, Tyrtaeus, Stesichorus. Weighed against these five names alone, those of the most illustrious lyric poets of succeeding ages, Simonides, Anacreon, even Pindar, are light in the scale.

If to these great lyric masters be added, together with Homer and Hesiod, the variety of miscellaneous poets, epic, genealogical, satirical, mystic, and didactic, of whose styles of composition several seem to have been exclusively proper to this period, it may claim to rank as one of the most fertile, as well as brilliant and original, in the annals of Grecian literature. The personal biographies also of many of these authors, of Archilochus, Tyrtæus, Alcæus, Sappho, Epimenides, and others, possess a peculiar interest, as well from the eccentric features and broad lights and shadows of human character which they exhibit, as from the vital connexion in many cases between the destinies of the men and those of their native commonwealths, or of the Hellenic nation at large.

From these various considerations, it has been an especial object with the author to exhibit both the literary and biographical features of this less familiar part of his subject in the fullest and clearest light which the existing materials for its treatment were calculated to supply.

Distinctive
characteristics of

1. THE history of every language is inseparable from that of the people by whom it is spoken. Nations may, indeed, be subjected to momentous revolutions without any sensible change in their mother-tongue: but a language can rarely, if ever, undergo vital alteration, unless in connexion with some parallel vicissitude of political destiny. It is in that earliest period of society to which attention is here more immediately directed, that, in the case of the Greeks, importance mainly attaches to this connexion; an importance, unfortunately, much enhanced by the obscurity in which the subject is involved. A want of classical authorities cannot, indeed, be pleaded. The difficulty lies rather in the shadowy unsubstantial nature of the copious mass at our disposal; still more, perhaps, in the variety of opinions as to the mode in which the historian may be entitled to avail himself of their aid. It becomes, therefore, in some measure necessary, before entering on any such inquiry, to offer some explanation of the principles on which it will be conducted, and of the author's views as to the nature and value of the existing data for its guidance.

That the voluminous body of popular Greek tradition, which avowedly forms the sole existing record of this primitive age, is essentially fabulous and legendary, will not be disputed by any intelligent scholar of the present day. To pronounce, however, as has been done in certain modern schools, the whole of that tradition, both in its substance and in its details, to be altogether false and visionary, appears a stretch of paradox little less extreme than that of the old sect of mythologers, who assumed the entire succession of gods and heroes to have been mortal kings, warriors, or sages, and the adventures recorded of them to present, under allegorical disguise, the real facts of primeval history. Any elaborate analysis of the comparative merits of these conflicting theories, or of the intermediate views promulgated in the wide field of controversy which they open up, were beyond the present purpose. A few general definitions will, however, be necessary, in order to explain, and it is hoped with the majority of readers, to justify, the position which has here been taken up on the debatable ground.

The mythology of any people, in the wider sense of the term, embraces the whole body of national tradition, emanating from those remote ages when the spirit of accurate inquiry was yet dormant, and artificial aids to the transmission of knowledge were unknown or imperfect. In such a state of society, both historical events and religious doctrines are communicated through the medium of the imagination rather than of the reason, in an ornamental or exaggerated form, often under the disguise of symbol or allegory.

History, on the other hand, while exclusively occupied in recording facts, presents, or professes to present them in their substantial reality.

It is more easy, however, to apprehend the difference between mythology and history, than to distinguish where, in the annals of any people, the one terminates and the other commences. As it is the blending of truth and fiction, of the real and ideal, which forms the distinctive feature of genuine national legend, so it is in the gradual ascendancy of the one over the other, with the advance of intellectual culture, that the transition from mythology to history takes place. A purely mythical period might, perhaps, be most nearly defined : that in which the art of writing is unknown, or so little practised, that memory constitutes the sole means of transmitting knowledge. The habit of recording events in writing might, with similar propriety, be described as the characteristic of authentic history. This, however, becomes a theoretical rather than a practical distinction, where, as in the case here immediately in point, so much uncertainty exists as to the epoch when the art of writing was first introduced, or the extent to which it may have been cultivated in early times. There can also be no doubt that written records of contemporaneous events may abound at periods when the more popular and generally accredited annals are embodied in essentially mythical forms : nor is it less certain, on the other hand, that even professional prose writers of history, in semibarbarous ages, often give little more than the substance of the vulgar legends, in a more methodical perhaps, but scarcely more authentic form than the poetical authorities from whom they borrow.

That alone can be considered as a strictly historical period, in which the art of writing, and the materials for its exercise, are universally prevalent, and the course of events, by its means, is habitually and systematically recorded. Such a state of things can first be recognised in Greece about the time of the Persian war.

In reckoning back from this fully enlightened epoch, in the history of any people, towards their remote mythical ages, or rather in reckoning from their mythical ages down to the fully enlightened era, there must occur a point where light begins to prevail over darkness; where, in the blending above described of the real and the fictitious element of tradition, the former, which in the end acquires the complete mastery, first begins to gain the ascendant. This line of distinction is perhaps more clearly marked in Greece than in most other countries, by the Dorian conquest of Peloponnesus, and the ensuing final settlement of the dominant Hellenic races in the seats which they afterwards permanently occupied. The rude patriarchal polity and martial habits of the previous generations were now gradually superseded by a taste for civil rights and constitutional government; and the first gleams of authentic history appear in the more general practice of recording important events in writing. There seems, indeed, plausible ground of belief, that dates and genealogies, however meagre and imperfect, were so recorded during the whole or the greater part of this period.¹ Hence, too, may be explained why the epoch of the Dorian conquest closes the heroic age of Greece; or, in other words, why the subjects of heroic celebration have been, by a standard law of Greek poetical literature, selected exclusively from the antecedent era. This may be attributed partly, perhaps, to the superior brilliancy of its events and achievements; chiefly, however, to the greater scope which its obscurity held out to the license of fable and poetical embellishment.

Greek mythical legend, how far founded on fact.

2. From the epoch, therefore, of the Dorian settlement down to the Persian war, Greek tradition presents, with whatever alloy of fiction, a more or less connected series of facts: beyond the former epoch, its details, at least, are altogether fabulous and poetical. Hence a wide discrepancy of opinion exists, as to the degree of credit to which they may be entitled. The old, and still the more generally received, doctrine is, that these heroic adventures, in so far as offered to us in human form or substance, embody, however vaguely, certain fundamental truths of early history. This view, however, has been repudiated in some recent schools of mythological interpretation, and all reality has been denied either to facts or persons prior to the Dorian conquest.¹ Events, it is admitted, must have happened, and heroes must have lived, before that date; "but the received traditions concerning them offer," it is maintained, "merely the shadow, not the substance, of men or things. The legend of Troy, for example, is at the most but a dim reflexion of the fact that early warfare existed between the tribes of the western and those of the eastern coast of the Ægæan. The vicissitudes of the contest, as worked up in the Homeric poems, are but types of human conduct or destiny; and the chiefs and heroes celebrated represent the tutelar deities worshipped by those primeval barbarous warriors."

For the better elucidation of this subtle question, recourse must be had to those first principles of human nature in which all popular tradition has its origin; and which, as operating in every state of society, and forming the foundation of all history, of all poetry, and by consequence of all literature, would here, apart from any secondary considerations, demand a certain share of attention.

The disposition to preserve the memory of past events, of the great actions of our forefathers, or of the benefits conferred by them on posterity, is a species of rational instinct forming, perhaps, the chief distinction between man in his rudest state and the brute creation. This disposition is, accordingly, found to prevail more generally, like other instincts, in a primitive than in a civilised state of society, in proportion as in the former the cares of the present are less numerous, and the imagination is more free to dwell on the past; more, consequently, among a pastoral than a commercial people, more in the peasant than in the artisan. In different nations, its influence will be found much in the scale of their mental capacities. Among the Negroes and North American Indians, races inferior in intellectual power to those of Europe and Asia, it seems to be comparatively torpid. In the Indo-Germanic family of mankind, especially the Greek or Pelasgic branch of that family, it has been most powerfully implanted, and most extensively developed.

To the same source from which the legends of a simple people derive their permanence, may be traced the mode in which they are embodied. The same veneration for the great men of past ages which impels their descendants to celebrate their actions, also creates a disposition to exaggerate and embellish them. This tendency to exaggerate, when reduced to system, is called mythology; the tendency to embellish is called poetry. Not only was the subject to be ennobled, but the language to be raised above that of ordinary life, by combining elegance and dignity of expression with the harmonious flow of metrical numbers. Metre was also required to assist the memory, and, in the absence or imperfection of other technical aids, to secure to these primitive attempts at historical composition, what was in fact their original object, permanent preservation.

on the af-

If this view of the rise and genius of legendary history be correct, the advocate of the older more popular opinion might argue that "the leading traditions of heroic Greece, the wars of Troy and Thebes for example, fulfil the conditions above laid down for the blending of the poetical and the real in their composition. It cannot reasonably be doubted, that martial enterprises were undertaken by primitive Peloponnesian and Thessalian chiefs, and that they fought and acted much as Agamemnon and Achilles fight and act in the Iliad: and it is at least as probable that their wars were waged in the country where Homer describes them, as elsewhere. Nor, therefore, is it easy to see why the descendants of those chiefs should not have represented their actions poetically speaking, as they were performed, and called the heroes by their own names, rather than by other fictitious titles. Although, in remote periods of antiquity, pure fiction may gradually usurp the place of traditional history, the case here in question is one of those where such a change is least likely to have happened. Admitting the first commencement of authentic record to coincide with the Dorian conquest of Southern Greece, and the main facts of that revolution to be historical, it must be remembered that the generation celebrated in the Iliad is represented in the same accounts as scarcely a degree removed from that by which the same Dorian conquest was achieved. It is surely far from probable that truth should so suddenly take the place of fiction; that the heroes who figure in Greek legend should be allegorical personages up to the moment when the Dorians crossed into Peloponnesus, and should then at once be converted into real kings and warriors."

3. The want of direct historical light on the legendary annals of Greece may, perhaps, in some degree be supplied by the analogy of corresponding periods in modern times, on which that light shines more clearly. In our own middle ages, lines of authentic chronicle and of fabulous tradition are frequently observed running parallel to each other, without, however, any appearance of the former exercising an influence on the latter, either in supplying its facts or correcting its fictions. If in these cases the substance of the leading events of the prose record is found universally or generally embodied under the usual mythical disguise in the poetical legend, we have a fair ground of inference, that in other cases, where no such direct evidence exists, poetical tradition may comprise real as well as figurative matter. There can be no doubt that this correspondence between poetry and history is commonly, if not invariably, perceptible, where opportunity occurs for tracing it, in the genuine heroic legend of a people in a state of society similar to that described in the Iliad. The examples supplied by the epic minstrelsy of the modern middle ages are numerous and obvious. The poetical legends of Etzel and Dieterich, in the Teutonic, and of Beowulf, Hengst, and Horsa, in the Saxon romance; of the Cid in the Spanish; or of Chevy Chase and Otterburn in our own border chivalry, are, in their origin and essence, as little connected with authentic history in the technical sense, as are the poems of Homer. Another case, perhaps still more in point, is that of the Servian heroic songs¹, between which and the Homeric poems analogy has frequently been traced in illustration of other speculative points of Homeric criticism. To these examples might be added the ballads of primeval Rome, the mythical details of which Niebuhr, no very indulgent authority in such cases, has shown to have been worked up, from the age of Servius downwards, on the same kernel of authentic record which has supplied material for his own critical history. Had the parallel letter of monkish or pontifical chronicle, which in each of these cases establishes the connexion between fact and fable, been swept away, the element of truth in the poems would not the less remain. And does not the law of historical analogy justify the converse of the rule? Had the Iliad been composed in an age when some barbarous chronicler, native or foreign, some Jornandes or Paulus Diaconus, had possessed the means of transmitting in doggerel prose the main facts which that poem embodies, might we not now possibly be as well satisfied of the existence of Priam and Agamemnon, as of that of Attila, the Cid¹, and Percy Hotspur?

There are also plausible grounds for assuming the basis of fact to be broader and more solid, both as to persons and events, in the Hellenic and Latin, than in the Teutonic or Scandinavian minstrelsies, to which appeal is usually made in illustration of this question by the more sceptical school of commentators.² The mythology where Attila, Theodoric and Beowulf figure as prominent characters, extending over a wide expanse of country and a great variety of races, afforded a corresponding scope for the corruption of pure tradition, or the license of popular fiction. The reverse was the case in Greece and Latium,

² The romances of chivalry, to which appeal is often also preferred in the same quarters, such as Parsival, Sangreal, or Amadis de Gaule, fictions for the most part of fantastical sophists of the corrupt middle age of modern literature, can hardly claim to rank as popular legend at all, still less form a criterion for estimating that embodied in the Homeric poems. One might as reasonably adopt the Pilgrim's Progress or Gulliver's Travels as a test of the veracious element in the ballads of Chevy Chase and Otterburn.

narrow regions, with a limited population of the same race, and united by a powerful bond of national feeling. The finer taste and more accurate genius by which early Greek literature is distinguished, would also counteract the tendency to such extravagant exaggeration of facts, or substitution of persons as the parallel course of real history enables us to detect in the "romantic" cycle of epic tradition. The Iliad and Odyssey afford a striking illustration of the distinction above drawn. In spite of their copious ingredient of supernatural mechanism, and its officious interference with human freedom of action, whoever peruses those poems in an impartial spirit, must be sensible of a greater tone of reality in the portions of their narrative which profess to be real, than in any modern composition of the same nature. Allowance may also, perhaps, be made for the different state of art and civilisation. It is difficult to class the men who erected or inhabited the noble structures of Mycenæ, and who certainly preceded the Dorian conquest, in the same rank of mythical nonentity as the barbarous semidæmons who figure in Northern romance: we feel as if the existence of the former ought to have been as intimately associated with their residence, even in the popular legend, as that of the Egyptian kings with their pyramids and palaces. As further evidence of the ingredient of truth in the legend of the Trojan war, might be urged the vital connexion, in the way of cause and effect, between that event and so important a chapter in the real history of Greece as the colonisation of Asia Minor; a connexion, partly immediate, partly indirect, through the Dorian occupation of the mother-country, which latter event, in every version of

To the above evidence, derived from individual cases of historical parallel, another more general argument may be added from the same source. There is scarcely a people of historical times, but can boast of some real series of heroic adventure, around which the poetical sympathies of later generations are fondly concentrated. The Christian races, as a body, look back to their crusades or sacred wars, as their common repertory of chivalrous exploit or epic celebration, with the same feelings as the Hellenes looked back to the siege of Troy. In this wider range, therefore, of common heroic adventure, as in other more local instances already quoted, the really national subjects of minstrelsy are acknowledged to rest, in our own state of society, on some solid foundation of events and characters. None, however, of the nations of modern Europe can claim to surpass, or even equal, the Hellenes, in zeal for the memory of their great men and glorious achievements. It is the more difficult therefore to believe, as the modern theory relative to the Greek heroic age assumes, that these same Hellenes should, alone among nations under similar circumstances, have bestowed their whole stock of chivalrous sympathy on an entirely fictitious set of persons and enterprises, and adopted as the basis of their history, geography, and genealogy, the events of a war which never took place, and the destinies of heroes who never existed.

favour the popular mode of interpretation. From the same source, however, are derived some of the most plausible arguments on the other side. "A certain amount of the supernatural may, it is said, be conceded, as the usual characteristic of all heroic legend, even when founded on fact. But upon no sound principle of historical analogy can we reconcile with a human personality those divine attributes, and that immediate descent from, and connexion with, the popular deities, which form the common privilege of the Greek heroes; still less can we explain the fact of the more distinguished among them having been themselves worshipped as gods in the national pantheon. The true explanation of these divine attributes offers itself obviously in the parallel mythology of the Teutonic romances; in which are frequently found figuring, as real kings and warriors, beings whom the subsidiary light of history proves to have been originally gods, transformed in the fable into men. The same law of historical analogy, therefore, to which appeal has just been made, warrants the inference, as to the heroes of Troy, that the divine element of their nature was the groundwork on which their human personality was afterwards engrafted." In order to test the validity of this conclusion, it will be necessary once more to revert to first principles.

The value of all historical analogy, as a means of critical illustration, must depend on a right estimate of the special circumstances by which the cases supplying the parallel may happen to be distinguished. In the present instance, for example, no appeal could properly be made to the theological element of Teutonic fable in elucidation of the Greek heroic mythology, unless on the understanding that the fundamental principles of the two systems of Paganism were the same; or at least that no such difference existed between them as to render illogical or improbable in the one case, conclusions which might be probable or certain in the other. It happens, however, that, in respect to the peculiar feature now in question, the Hellenic system of polytheism is marked by characteristics exclusively proper to itself, and which preclude, or rather reverse, the test of analogy which it has here been proposed to derive from Teutonic romance. In order rightly to appreciate this distinction, it will be proper to take a concise view of the various elements of which the Greek pantheon is composed.

These may be divided into three classes: the first comprises the purely divine portion of the system, the ideal personifications of the Godhead and of its attributes, common in a great measure to the Greeks with other Pagan nations. These are the personages who figure as the great gods or royal family of Olympus, whose divine nature is untainted by any human alloy, and whose origin no rational interpreter has ever proposed to trace to a historical source.

To the second class belongs the inferior race of figurative abstractions, under which the lively imagination of the Greeks embodied its conceptions of the ordinary phenomena of the moral or material world. Such are the Muses, Graces, Litæ, Parcæ, and other representatives of human action, suffering, or attribute; together with the River Gods, Nymphs, Naiads, Tritons, and the rest of the subordinate train of terrestrial and marine deities.

The third class comprises the Demigods, or Heroes, the human, as distinguished from the purely cosmogonical, elements of the system. This class, according to the popular opinion, consists, in great part at least, of distinguished mortals promoted after death by an admiring posterity to divine honours. As forming by far the most important part of the system in connexion with the present question, it must here be submitted to a somewhat closer analysis.

Human
apotheosis peculiar to Græco-Pelagic
tion.

5. The principle of human apotheosis, or, in other words, of awarding divine honours to mortals, is not only one of the most prominent characteristics of Helleno-Pelagic superstition, but one which distinguishes it from every other antient form of Paganism. Among the Egyptians, Syrians, and other civilised nations to the eastward, unlimited as was the scope given to the representation of the Deity under human type, the promotion of mortal men to the rank of gods was altogether excluded; or, if any approach to such a thing can be recognised, it must be considered in the light of anomaly, or violation of established rule. Among the Greeks, on the other hand, the practice can be traced with singular consistency, from the earliest period of which tradition has preserved any memorial, down to the final extinction of classical heathenism. But the principle itself was too inveterate to give way even to a change of religion. It was transferred from the Temple to the Church, from the heathen to the Roman Catholic mythology, in which system the canonised saints and martyrs offer the closest analogy to the deified Pagan heroes.¹

The most subtle casuistry can point out no generic distinction between the apotheosis of kings or great men in the historical ages of Greece and Rome, and that of popular heroes in fabulous antiquity. Whatever difference may exist is to be sought, not in the spirit of the system, but in that of the times or circumstances. The identity of the system itself distinctly appears in the modifications it underwent with the vicissitudes of society. In the first place it may be observed, that, while the practice of apotheosis was common to all or most of the Græco-Pelasgic tribes, to those namely, connected in blood and language with the Hellenes, no vestige of it can be discovered in any other quarter. In Italy we find it common to the Romans, a people of kindred stock, while among the Etruscans, a nation to all appearance of radically different origin, there is no trace of it whatever. As little can it be recognised among the Germans or Celts. It is further remarkable, that, in the dark as well as the historical ages of classical Paganism, it is exemplified chiefly in monarchical, and rarely, if ever, in republican states. This is in close harmony with the law of nature to which its origin has here been traced. It is chiefly in such a state of society that individuals are enabled to acquire a degree of power or influence over their fellow-men on earth, sufficient to secure them a corresponding homage in the next world. In historical times, accordingly, the practice was carried to the greatest excess during the Roman empire; a period which, from the spread of knowledge and religious scepticism, might otherwise have been supposed least favourable to such extravagance. Other examples might be cited among the Spartans¹, who, adhering to monarchical forms, though tempered by republican institutions, prided themselves also on heroic simplicity of manners. The Macedonian monarchy offers illustrations no less to the point than those derived from imperial Rome. All these examples are marked by the same spirit. The motives which deified a Cæsar, an Alexander, a Lysander, a Lycurgus, an Agamemnon, were the same. The faith with which their divine character was admitted, or the devotion with which they were worshipped, might vary with times or manners: but the original principle of apotheosis is identical throughout.

the custom
on the present question.

6. The critic, therefore, who desires to avail himself of the light of history, in elucidating the obscurities of heroic fable, will reason as follows: During the whole period of classical antiquity on which that light clearly shines, there exists proof of the prevalence of this custom, under the same forms described in mythical tradition. By reference to historical analogy, it were as unreasonable to deny, on the mere ground of supernatural attribute, the real personality of Achilles as that of Vespasian. Were we, then, after tracing the practice from the Cæsars back to the Ptolemies, to Lysander, to Lycurgus, suddenly, on arriving at the epoch in which it takes its origin, to deny its existence, and, appealing to an age and a people of different manners and religion, to substitute in its stead another practice, of which Grecian history furnishes no example, we should obviously be shutting out historical light, instead of availing ourselves of its aid. Perhaps, however, the most pointed illustration of the Greek system of apotheosis, and, generally, of the basis of fact in classical fable, is that derived from the saint-worship of the Roman Catholic church. The arguments by which it has been proposed to set aside the human personality of Agamemnon or Achilles would equally disprove that of St. Benedict or St. Francis. Many of the Roman Catholic saints are gifted, in the legends which supply the chief or only record of their existence, with attributes still more supernatural than those ascribed by Homer to the warriors of Troy. They have been promoted to celestial honours, and worshipped, in all essential respects, as were the Greek demigods, or deified heroes. Yet no one denies that a large portion of them were real characters, connected with historical events. Nor is it easy to see how an opposite inference can fairly be drawn relative to the Greek heroes from any similar process in the Greek religion.

No less evident is it, on the other hand, from the same analogy of those chapters of mythology on which the light of history shines most clearly, that, in numerous instances, what were at first but visionary objects of superstitious worship may have been invested in popular fable with human attributes. The admission, therefore, as a general rule, on the grounds above stated, that certain leading heroes of Thebes or Troy may have been real men, can as little extend to them all, as a similar admission in regard to the Roman Catholic saints or martyrs would involve a belief in the human existence of all those holy personages; many of whom are as purely fictitious as the Muses, Fauns, or Dryads of antiquity. Any attempt to draw a specific line of distinction between the real and the fictitious element of either the Romish or the Pagan Calendar, must, in the absence of all authentic criteria, be obviously hypercritical. The views, on the other hand, which speculative interpreters may be led to adopt on the unsubstantial data at their disposal, will vary so widely in different minds as scarcely to leave a common basis on which to reason with each other. The man who, by a careful study of Homer, or the secondary organs of Homer's cycle of mythology, has been led to the conviction that no such town as Troy or no such warrior as Achilles ever existed, will not easily be persuaded that he is in error by the arguments of those who through the same process have been led to an opposite conclusion. Nor will the adherent of the popular doctrine be more readily converted by his sceptical opponent. Beyond the admission, therefore, on the grounds above explained, of a certain basis of fact in the leading adventures of the ante-Dorian period, such as the Trojan and Theban wars, the more cautious advocate of that doctrine will not be disposed to extend his speculations.¹

cycle of
legend.

7. With respect indeed to the Homeric cycle of heroic tradition, this inquiry involves to the literary critic a somewhat deeper interest than attaches to it as a mere question of historical fact. Every reader of taste and feeling must be conscious how essential to the full effect of a great national poem is a conviction that its principal characters should have been real men, not mere creations of fancy, or types of moral and metaphysical abstractions. In all the higher departments of imaginative art, nature still constitutes an important element; not the mere imitation of nature, but nature as a substantial basis of the artificial superstructure. A picture by Raphael representing King Arthur or Amadis de Gaule, and embodying with all the genius of that great painter the attributes for which romance gives those heroes credit, could never speak home to our sympathies with half the effect of a real portrait even of Cæsar Borgia or Julius II. by the same artist. Could it in like manner be established that the events which Homer exhibits as great national enterprises, or the heroes by whom they were conducted, were but the dreams of his own imagination or that of his ancestors, the result would be, or ought to be, a proportional diminution of our interest in the character and fate of those heroes. To appeal again to the analogy of our native minstrelsy : would not the conviction that our Wallaces, Hotspurs, or Robin Hoods, were mere imaginary beings, be accompanied by a great falling off in the poetical value of their exploits ?

Here, however, it naturally occurs, that the object of all historical inquiry is the discovery of truth ; that the question is not so much whether a conviction that the heroes of Troy were real persons would enhance the interest of their adventures, as whether the fact be or be not so. It were, therefore, as unreasonable for the literary historian to allow his judgement to be influenced in any such question by mere considerations of taste or feeling, as for the civil historian to allow his admiration of a particular people or individual to pervert his narrative of their actions, or his estimate of their character. But might it not be urged on the other side, that the very conviction which the perusal of the Iliad produces of the reality of its story is in itself a species of internal evidence in its favour ? Are we not conscious of an intrinsic harmony between the characters and events of the poem and the true genius of Greek heroic life, which marks out those characters and events as human chiefs and enterprises, with as broad a stamp of truth as our own early minstrelsy imprints on its men and deeds of renown in the semibarbarous ages of Britain?

There is one other class of mythical personages who here demand a few words of special notice, from the apparent anomaly of their being those who, as a general rule, have the least pretension to real existence, but who yet supply, in their purely figurative capacity, some of the most valuable details of primeval history. These are the Eponyme heroes or patriarchs who act as name-fathers or founders of countries, tribes, or cities. When, for example, we read that Dorus was son of Hellen, and ancestor of the Dorians, as his father was of the whole Hellenic race, we have an equal element of historical fact, whether the two patriarchs be taken as real or as symbolical personages. Hellen represents the whole more highly gifted portion of the Græco-Pelagic nation, who, spreading from their primitive seats in Northern Greece, finally acquired an ascendant throughout the continent south of the Thracian mountains. Dorus is the type of a martial subdivision of Hellenes, seated in remote ages in the rugged region of Pindus, whence they migrated southwards as conquerors of Peloponnesus. To these and other similar ramifications of figurative genealogy, the most fastidious commentators have not hesitated to attach importance, as representing the real vicissitudes of tribes and races.

8. In proportion to the obscurity which involves the historical ingredient of fabulous tradition, must be the vagueness and uncertainty of its chronology. Where the existence of men or events is questionable, no great benefit can be hoped from attempts to define the duration of their lives, or the order of their succession. The tenor of these researches will involve little or no reference to the details of mythical chronology prior to the Trojan war. With that epoch commences the most recent, and, in so far, the best accredited, period of the fabulous age of Greece. In treating of this period it will suffice to adopt the received system of reckoning, for the few prominent dates which even here can advance any claim to an authentic character. Such are the interval of about sixty years, from the fall of Troy to the Æolian settlement on the conquered territory, and of twenty years, between the latter event and the Dorian descent on Peloponnesus. This standard epoch will be taken according to the estimate of Eratosthenes, the most critical of antient chronologers, but without implicit deference to his authority, at 1104 B.C., being 328 years prior to the first Olympiad, as fixed in 776 B.C. The first standard date of the partially historical period subsequent to the Dorian conquest is the Ionian migration to Asia Minor in 1044 B.C. Far more important is the epoch of the final establishment of the Olympic games as the leading national festival of the Hellenic confederacy in 776 B.C. This epoch, it need scarcely be remarked, is acknowledged, by the general consent of modern critics, to rest on authentic evidence; and the quadrennial returns of the festival supply, henceforward, a more regular, though far from complete or certain, record of dates and events.¹

Pelasgians.

1. IT was an opinion universally received among the antients, that the Greek territory was originally possessed by the people familiarly called Pelasgians. Hence, in the popular legend, the primitive name of the whole country is said to have been Pelasgia, and the local traditions of each district commonly describe its first occupants as of Pelasgian race.¹ The term came, accordingly, to be significant of remote and venerable antiquity; and those tribes who in later times claimed by preference an indigenous origin, also asserted a superior purity of Pelasgian descent. The internal evidence of these traditions, combined with that derived from philological sources, indicates the people distinguished by this title to have been substantially the same race as the Hellenes or later inhabitants of the country. Both may be considered as sections of the great body of nations comprised by modern ethnographers under the name of Indo-Teutonic; who, in the infancy of society, issuing from their primeval seats in Central Asia, and spreading south-eastward over the Indian peninsula, and north-westward across the European continent, sent forth branches into those portions of it which jut into the Mediterranean sea.

The more accurate researches of the present age into the history of human speech have established, that the languages of those nations who, in antient or modern times, have been preeminent for extent and variety of intellectual powers, may be classed into comprehensive trees or stems, distinguished from each other by an essential difference, both in their elementary roots and their organic structure. Each of these stems subdivides itself into separate families, marked, in their secondary capacity, both as to roots and structure, by certain pervading features of affinity referable to a primitive common type. The subordinate members of these families again, according to the greater or less resemblance which those members, in the vicissitudes of the tribes by whom they were spoken, may have preserved to each other, fall to be ranked, respectively, as separate tongues, or as separate dialects of the same.

Of these original trees or stems of language, the most widely spread and most highly cultivated is that familiarly known, like the nations to which it was common, by the name of Indo-Teutonic. Among its families the most remarkable are, the Sanskrit, or primitive Hindoo; the Zend, or primitive Persian; the Teutonic, or Germanic; and that body of languages which, adopting the usage of the native authors, will here be entitled Pelasgic, comprising, with the several Greek dialects, many other varieties probably, of which no literary remains have been transmitted. The accuracy of this latter head of arrangement, or rather of the sense in which the term Pelasgic has been applied to it, will, it is hoped, be substantiated in the sequel.

The letter of the popular tradition, by specially characterising the Pelasgians of Arcadia¹ and Attica² as indigenous, would seem to place the earliest settlements of that people in Southern Greece. It is, however, more probable in itself, as well as more congenial with the spirit of the same tradition, that the primitive inhabitants of the Greek continent should have passed downward from its northern frontier to its maritime extremities, than that, landing on its outer promontories, they should have spread into the interior. A strong argument in favour of this view exists in the circumstance, that the oldest and most revered common sanctuary of the race was in the north, established, as usual in the early ages of Paganism, on the loftiest mountain ridge of the district preferred. This sanctuary was the oracle of the great Dodonæan Jove, in the rugged highlands of Thesprotia. Had the first seats of the Pelasgians been in Peloponnesus, that peninsula would doubtless have remained their sacred land, Taygetus or Cyllene their sacred mountain. The national divinity would hardly have been banished to a recent and dreary back settlement. This remote northern region, whether from the sanctity with which it was thus invested, or from its own inaccessible character, seems to have escaped the effects of those revolutions to which the rest of the Pelasgic land was subjected in after ages. Accordingly, while its inhabitants preserved to a late period, under the subsequent Hellenic ascendancy, their antient habits and privileges, Dodona and the Dodonæan oracle remained, both to Pelasgian and Hellene, the fountain head of their earliest and most sacred associations.

2. The tribe who dwelt around the temple, and were charged with the sacerdotal functions, bore the distinctive name, in Homer's time, of Selli or Helli.¹ This title was also common to other communities of northern Pelasgians, under certain varieties of form, betraying clear traces of the same etymology. The most remarkable of these varieties is that of Hellas, appropriated by Homer to the whole or a principal part of Thessaly², and which afterwards, becoming obsolete as a provincial term, was extended, together with the influence of the tribe from whom it was derived, to the whole continent of Greece. On the western coast, below Dodona, the names Ellopia, Hylli, Selleis, proper to a country, a people, and a river, afford evidence of the same national appellation in that region.¹ The Hylli, described by respectable authors as "Hellenes," also appear in Southern Greece as one of the three tribes of the Helleno-Dorian conquerors of Peloponnesus.²

Tradition is more uniform as to the fact of the name Hellas having been extended from Thessaly, together with the power of the Hellenes or Thessalian Helli, over Southern Greece, than explicit as to the circumstances under which that extension took place. Among the proofs of an early ascendancy of the former region may be urged, that Mount Olympus, originally no doubt but a favourite seat of the Thessalian Jupiter, had obtained, at the epoch of the Trojan war, a precedence in dignity over all the other sanctuaries of Greece, even over that of Dodona. In the obscure ages of Paganism, the rise and fall of religious establishments afford a fair criterion of the fluctuations of rank in the tribes to which they belonged. Thus in the Pelasgian period Dodona was the chief, or, according to Herodotus, the only, common sanctuary of the nation. On the rise of Hellenic power, the Olympian Jupiter obtained the highest honours. The dignity of his Thessalian sanctuary declined in its turn, from the period when a new tribe of conquering Hellenes transferred his worship, under the same title of Olympian, to the banks of the Alpheüs. The "lofty Olympus" now sank, comparatively, from an object of religious veneration, to one of mere poetical celebrity.

Specific notices of these changes are supplied by both Herodotus and Thucydides. "Formerly," says the latter author¹, "the inhabitants of Greece were not known by the common title of Hellenes. The different tribes, Pelasgians chiefly, bore each its proper appellation. But when Hellen and his sons, becoming powerful in Phthiotis, took other states under their protection, the whole race, through the alliance and influence of those heroes, came to be called collectively by their name." In conformity with this account, Herodotus² states that the Athenians, originally Pelasgians, had adopted the name and character of Ionians from Ion, a Hellenic chief to whom they had intrusted the command of their army. The Achæans and Ionians of Northern Peloponnesus, also indigenous Pelasgi, had a like tradition regarding the same hero; and the Æolian settlers in Asia Minor are similarly described as drawing their names from chiefs of Hellenic blood.³ These notices imply that the Pelasgians of Southern Greece, a less energetic people than those of the North, harassed by internal dissensions or hostile aggression, had invited their more warlike kinsmen to their aid, who, in return, exacted submission or vassalage, and ultimately extended their dominion over the whole Greek continent. Among the leading features of the Pelasgian character, an unsettled migratory spirit is always pointedly mentioned. It may hence be inferred, that many tribes, unwilling to submit to their new allies, crossed the sea in search of other habitations. Certain it is, that no record occurs of any great contest for supremacy, nor indeed of any actual warfare, between Pelasgian and Hellene. This furnishes another argument of the close affinity of the two races. The easy manner in which their political interests, manners, and language blend and coalesce, were scarcely conceivable in the case of nations of radically different origin.

The term Pelasgian thus became obsolete, as a generic title of the Greek nation. The dominant tribes, priding themselves on their distinctive names of Ionian, Achæan, Æolian, or, collectively, of Hellenes, dismissed the primitive common appellation; just as the Romans would have disdained, in the days of their Italian supremacy, to be called Latins. Afterwards, however, when the memory of these events had faded, the name Pelasgian continued to be applied, in an antiquarian sense, to the population of certain districts supposed to have remained more or less free from Hellenic encroachment. Hence the apparent anomaly, that, while tradition invariably represents the Hellene as the conquering, the Pelasgian as the subject race, yet several of the proudest states of Greece gloried in the latter title as indicating a superior purity of Grecian blood. In its more specific sense it was limited, from the age of Homer downwards, to certain tribes beyond the frontiers of Greece Proper, whose language and manners bore a resemblance to the Greek, though not sufficient to constitute them Hellenes; or who were held to have migrated in remote ages from Greece. This view, however, of a primitive common character in the aboriginal population, need not be understood necessarily to comprehend every individual people inhabiting the Greek continent prior to the Hellenic ascendancy. The Pelasgic land may have contained, in those unsettled times, various tribes of different race from the mass of its inhabitants; some of which tribes, when driven into other regions, may, in right of their former place of abode, have acquired the surname of Pelasgians, in common with their fellow-emigrants to whom it more properly belonged. Such may possibly have been the Leleges, Caucones, and other communities, who appear in later tradition among the early non-Hellenic occupants of Greece: but it is more probable that these were themselves Pelasgian tribes, who had obtained notoriety under their own peculiar titles.¹

3. These accounts of an early extension of the Hellenic name to the whole Greek nation, however universally received, seem yet but little in harmony with the fact, that in the earliest authentic standards of the Greek language, dating several centuries subsequent to the events in which the more extended usage is supposed to have originated, no trace of any such usage can be detected. By reference to these standards, so far is this generic application of the term Hellene from appearing as an immediate result of the ascendancy of Hellas Proper, or Thessaly, that the first symptoms of it are observable at a period when that region had forfeited the high character it enjoyed during the heroic age, and when its natives appear, in comparison with those of Southern Greece, rather in the light of Thracian barbarians than of lineal descendants of the Lapithæ or Æacidæ. This discrepancy between fact and tradition has been noticed by Thucydides.² That acute author, after alluding to the extension of the name Hellene, as a consequence of the dominant influence of the Thes-salian patriarch, adds, that yet, in the age of Homer, the title was still confined to the single district from

which it was originally derived. In order rightly to appreciate this remark, and the anomaly to which it refers, a few observations will be necessary on the poet's ordinary use of the term Hellene, and others of a like nature habitually occurring in his text.

The only names common in the Iliad to the whole Greek nation are, Achæan, Argive, and Danaän. They may all be traced to the influence of the Pelopidan or Atridan dynasty at the period of the Trojan war. The first was the proper name of the people over whom that dynasty more immediately reigned; the second was derived from Argos, its seat of government; the third from the earlier fabulous Argive rulers, the reputed foreign importers of the arts of civilised life into Southern Greece. "Hellas," on the other hand, with Homer, denotes, in its narrower sense, a province of Thessaly, the antient seat of the dominant "Hellenic" dynasty; and there are traces of an occasional extension of the name to the whole of that region. But there is no appearance of its employment in the same general sense as the three others above mentioned. The question then arises: How happens it that the titles Hellas and Hellene, derived from a hero or a tribe flourishing long prior to the Trojan war, should yet not be found in general use until several centuries subsequent to that event? Whatever may have been the early influence of the Hellenic race, the extension of their name, reserved for so much later a period, must be explained by a subsequent cause.

the Dorian

That cause, there can be little doubt, was the Dorian conquest of Peloponnesus, an event which produced important changes, both in the social condition and in the language of all Greece. From that event and its consequences dates the first distinct separation of the dialects, as they prevailed in later ages, with a more settled use of the proper names of the tribes by whom they were spoken. That the spread of the name Hellene was also a result of this revolution may be inferred from the fact pointedly noted by Herodotus, that the Dorians of Peloponnesus in his day claimed, apparently with his approbation, a superior purity of Hellenic character over their fellow Greeks. The Ionians, Athenians, Achæans, and Æolians, are with him aboriginal *Pelasgi*¹, who, from motives of policy or necessity, had adopted the Hellenic name. The Dorians, on the other hand, he describes as the genuine Hellenes, in direct line of descent from the eponyme patriarch of the whole race, through their ancestor Dorus, son of that patriarch.² It seems then, that these new tribes of Hellenic conquerors were in the habit of distinguishing themselves, by this honourable title, from what they considered the degenerate semi-Pelasgians among whom they settled. The same cause, therefore, which produced the extension to the whole nation of the names Achæan, Argive, Danaän, in Homer's time, the ascendancy of the dynasty to which each properly belonged, would here tend to the same effect. To the north of Thermopylæ the Hellenic name already prevailed. When spread over Peloponnesus, it would naturally extend to the intermediate district, and from the mother country to the colonies; all of whom, like their European kinsmen, retained the tradition of a former adoption of the character, if not the name, of Hellenes.³

4. Before offering any special remarks on the Pelasgic tongue in its relation to the classical Greek, a short notice will be desirable of those districts the inhabitants of which, in historical times, advanced a peculiar title to unmixed Pelasgian descent.

In Greece itself, besides the Athenians and several kindred states already noticed, the Arcadians¹ enjoyed an especial claim to this distinction, grounded, partly on their primitive simplicity of manners, partly on the ruggedness of their soil, which had preserved them from foreign invasion. On the north-western frontier, the Helli and other neighbouring tribes have above been cited as the oldest Pelasgian stock; and various small Pelasgian settlements are mentioned on the eastern coast of Thrace², the western shores of the Hellespont and Propontis, and the neighbouring islands of Lemnos, Imbros, and Samothrace.³ The Pelasgians of Asia Minor, of the islands of the Ægean, and of Italy, were considered as early colonists from Greece, driven by the encroach-nor for long after his supposed epoch, is also proved by the negative authority of Homer, equivalent in any such case to historical evidence. The word signifies the "Island of Pelops;" it being a familiar catachresis with the Greeks, especially the Dorians, to apply the term island to peninsulas, as for example in the names Chersonesus, Halicarnessus, and others. It may be presumed, therefore, that, after the fame of the Pelopidan power had spread to distant quarters, its central seat was known among the mountaineers of Doris as the "Island (or Peninsula) of Pelops." This title, when they took possession of the country, they might naturally continue to use as a memorial of their victory, in preference to that of Argos, which, as appears from Homer, the same district bore among the ejected inhabitants. Accordingly, the earliest author of any certain date who employs the new term, and that in the same triumphant strain above referred to, is Tyrtæus, the national poet of Sparta. *Frg. i. 4. ments of the Hellenes to seek new habitations beyond sea. It is however probable that many of those tribes were aboriginal settlers, portions of the great migratory body, which, on its first movement, may have struck off to the east or westward, while the main stream pursued its course in the direction of the Laconian promontory. On the coast of Asia immediately south of the Troad, Homer¹ mentions Pelasgians among the allies of Priam; and later authors describe the whole Æolian coast, with part of Ionia, and the adjacent islands of Chios and Lesbos, as once possessed by them.² In Crete also they are numbered by Homer³ among the five nations who jointly inhabited that island at the period of the Trojan war.

Of the Pelasgian tribes of Italy⁴ the most celebrated are those called Tyrrheni, or Tyrrhenian Pelasgi. By this title they are distinguished from the people of radically distinct character called by Latin authors Etruscans, by the Greeks also Tyrrheni, by whom the greater part of the Italian peninsula had been subdued before the first familiar acquaintance of the Greeks with its interior. In Greece itself, this title of Tyrrhenian Pelasgi was more immediately applied to a wandering race, said to have migrated from Italy at a remote fabulous period; and who, after various adventures in Thessaly, Bœotia, and Attica, finally removed to the coasts and islands of Thrace.⁵ In Upper Italy, Spina, at the mouth of the

Po, Ravenna¹, Pisa, and Cære, with the intermediate Tuscan coast from the Arno to the Tiber², and the inland towns of Cortona and Falerii³, claimed a Pelasgian foundation. From the Pelasgi of Latium Dionysius considers the Romans to have sprung, with a certain admixture of foreign blood; and, to the south, Pompeii, and other neighbouring towns of Campania, were also reputed of Pelasgic origin.⁴ The same character was assigned by early Greek historians to the Ænotrians, or primitive population of Lucania⁵; and, in later times, the agricultural serfs of the Hellenic colonies on that coast, the remains of the previous inhabitants, bore the distinctive title of Pelasgians.⁶ The antient geographical names of this region also vouch for a connexion with the opposite continent of Greece. A principal tribe of Lucania were the Chonians or Chaonians, whose name was common to a people of Epirus. The antient capital of the Lucanians was called Pandosia, as was that of the Molossians on the Greek coast. There was also a Caulonia in each country, and a notable river of each was the Acheron. These coincidences have received lustre from one of the last expiring gleams of the Delphic oracle, shed on the declining fortunes of the celebrated Alexander Molossus, who, shunning the supposed fatal city and river of his native country, met his death in the still more fatal region of the kindred coast.⁷ received, is yet far from being beyond the pale of controversy¹, has, in the preceding pages, been in a great measure taken for granted. It remains, by a somewhat more specific train of inquiry, to establish the existence of that affinity on a solid basis.

The relation between Hellene and Pelasgian, upon the view above adopted, may be illustrated by a parallel pair of terms in our own day: German and Teutonic. What is now familiarly called the German is the classical language of Germany with its various dialects. The German, however, is itself but the most cultivated variety of a numerous family of tongues, which, under the common title of Teutonic, comprises the Anglo-Saxon, Danish, Dutch, and others.² Similar was the connexion of the Hellenic and the Pelasgic. The latter was the family or tree of which the former was the most flourishing branch; and as the classical Greek, in historical times, offers numerous varieties of idiom, the same, it may be supposed, was the case with the degenerate or less cultivated growths.

¹ On the affirmative side see Müll. Dor. vol. i. p. 6., and Die Etrusk. Einl.; Clint. Fast. Hell. vol. i. p. 92.; Giese, Der Aeolische Dialect, i. 3.; Thirlw. Hist. of G. vol. i. ch. ii.; cf. Nieb. Röm. G. vol. i. p. 26. sqq. For the opposite view see Kruse, Hellas, vol. i. c. v.; Grote, Hist. of Gr. vol. ii. p. 345. To the authorities in favour of the common origin of the two nations may be added that of Lepsius (Ueber die Tyrrhen. Pelasger; conf. Annali dell' Inst. Archeol. 1836, p. 186.). But the Italic inscriptions selected by him as specimens of Pelasgian dialect seem to contain very faint traces, if any, of Hellenic etymology, and tend, consequently, but little to strengthen his argument.

² To pursue the analogy, the English, Dutch, and Danes would, in the classical sense, have ranked as "Pelasgians," in comparison with the Germans Proper, or "Hellenes" of the central country; and it might equally have become a question, in the Herodotean school of philology, whether the three former ought to be considered as Barbarous or as "Hellenic" races.

In turning to the authorities bearing on this opinion, the inquirer cannot fail to be struck with that neglect of critical philology which forms so prominent a distinction between antient and modern literature. As regards the grammatical treatment of their own language, the Greek critics equal, indeed, or surpass those of all other nations, in the subtlety of their speculations and the bulk of their commentaries. But with this national department of the science they were content. The study of foreign tongues never, either as an object of curiosity, or as an aid to historical investigation, formed with them a distinct class of pursuit. This is a peculiarity of Greek literary history which will require to be noticed more in detail hereafter. Attention is now directed to it, merely as bearing on the question immediately before us.

The Pelasgians were considered by the antients as standing to the Hellenes somewhat in the same relation as the Anglo-Saxons to ourselves. The Anglo-Saxon is a dead language, and a knowledge of it, consequently, is of little practical utility in the present day. Yet its study continues to be zealously prosecuted, as well on account of its philological as of its antiquarian interest. With the Greeks the case was different. The allusions in the extant classics to the Pelasgian dialects, spoken or extinct, are so scanty or so vague, as to prove that their affinities had never suggested matter for serious scrutiny. Philological evidence, therefore, of a tangible character, bearing on our present inquiry, fails completely. The substance however of the existing notices amounts, at least, to a general understanding, on the part of the Greek public, in favour of the views expressed in the previous pages, and which may be more distinctly stated under the following heads:

I. That the term Pelasgian indicates a primeval family of cognate tribes and dialects, from which the Hellenic people and language derived their origin.

II. While the neighbouring shores of the Mediterranean were occupied, from the earliest period, by races speaking a variety of radically distinct tongues, there existed no trace or memory of any language not essentially Greek within the boundaries of Greece itself.

III. Those portions of the Greek population who were admitted to have retained, with their primitive seats, their native character and speech unimpaired, were considered, in right of this qualification, genuine descendants of the old Pelasgic stock.

IV. The criterion for distinguishing, beyond the limits of Greece, a Pelasgic people from other alien tribes, was the resemblance of their language to the classical Greek.

6. It will here at once occur to the advocates of opposite views, that this assumed harmony on the part of the native writers is disturbed by a passage of Herodotus, which, while the most specific that has been preserved on the subject, seems also, on first view, at variance with the above theory. It has here been subjoined entire, as containing a considerable portion of matter vitally bearing on this whole train of inquiry.

Herodotus.

“What the Pelasgian language was, I cannot distinctly say; but, if we may judge from the Pelasgi who inhabit the town of Creston above the Tyrsenians, (and who were once neighbours of the people now called Dorians, for they formerly possessed the country since named Thessaliotis), or from the Pelasgians of Placia and Scylace on the Hellespont who were once settled among the Athenians, or from any other tribes originally Pelasgian who have adopted other names, if we may judge from these, the Pelasgians must have spoken a barbarous tongue. If, therefore, the whole Pelasgian race were of this character, the Athenian people, being Pelasgians, on being converted into Hellenes, must, also, have changed their language. For the Crestonians and Placians, while they do not correspond in dialect with any of the surrounding tribes, correspond with each other, which shows them both to have preserved the dialectical peculiarities by which they were distinguished when they migrated into those countries.

“But the Hellenic race, from its first existence, has always used the same language. Being originally weak when split off from the Pelasgians, it increased, advancing in power, from small beginnings, to a great multitude of nations, chiefly in consequence of many other barbarous tribes uniting with it.”¹

Did this passage stand alone, it might tend, no doubt, to invalidate the views here advocated. In connexion, however, with others in the same work, it assumes a different aspect. Apart from its historical importance, it also possesses value, from the lively manner in which it reflects some of the characteristic peculiarities of its author. On the one hand it displays that spirit of candour and diffidence in the discussion of obscure topics which forms a principal charm of his style; on the other, a certain vagueness both of argument and conclusion, consequent on the imperfection of the critical art, which may be considered less his own fault than that of his age.

Hence, however valuable in themselves, the statements it contains will be found but little in harmony with each other, and altogether at variance with those advanced in subsequent portions of his history.

The literal value of the passage, as affecting the present question, lies chiefly in the application of the term "barbarous" to the language of those Thracian communities, as compared with the classical Greek. Some commentators have understood the phrase to imply, not a different language, but merely a rude or corrupt Hellenic dialect. But this interpretation, though in some degree countenanced by parallel texts of Herodotus, is here scarcely admissible. The word is one, indeed, of very loose signification. In its origin it denotes, like some similarly expressive terms in our own tongue, simply harsh, discordant, or unintelligible. Afterwards it came to indicate whatever was opposed to Hellenic, either in speech, or, by a natural transition, in origin or manners; and may hence, in the familiar usage of classical times, be often translated "foreign," as the substantive "barbarian" denotes simply foreigner. It is also occasionally used, in its more primitive signification, to express anything rude or savage either in character or language, and in this sense is applied even to people of admitted Greek origin. Upon the whole however, in the spirit of the historian's general argument, there can be little doubt of his having meant to stigmatise the dialect of these tribes as a "foreign" tongue, in the literal sense, compared with his own. On the other hand, it is not to be supposed that his opinion was the result of any actual analysis of its structure or affinities, a task for which Herodotus was probably as little disposed as qualified; nor, consequently, is his evidence, even on the least favourable interpretation, sufficient to disprove its connexion with the Greek. The two may still have resembled each other as much as the Swedish the German, or the Spanish the Italian. In each of these cases the difference is such as to constitute, in the familiar sense, the one a foreign tongue, as compared with the other, although in each the critical inquirer discovers a close affinity. The vicissitudes which these Thracian tribes had undergone, during several centuries of migration, might alone suffice to alter their dialect to such an extent as would justify the expression of Herodotus.

Their
vagueness.

7. In applying their case, however, to the nation at large, the historian speaks somewhat diffidently. "If," he remarks in the sequel of the same context, "the whole Pelasgian race were of this description, the Athenians, being Pelasgians, on adopting the Hellenic character must have changed their language." He overlooks the question, whether it was not more likely that two petty tribes, wandering for centuries over the European continent, should have changed their language, than that an independant stationary Greek community should have undergone any such metamorphosis. The modern philologer must reason differently. With him the fact, admitted not only by Herodotus but by the general consent of antiquity, that the Athenians were an indigenous Pelasgian people, must amount to proof that the Pelasgic and Attic languages were substantially the same. There is no foreign element in the latter to warrant the belief of its having been subjected to any radical change not common to the other Hellenic dialects. The notion of so sudden a revolution in speech and habits as these Attic Pelasgians, with their neighbours the Achæans and Ionians, are supposed to have undergone "on the Hellene Ion being appointed general of their army," as elsewhere stated by the same Herodotus¹, is chimerical. In historical times, examples occur of provinces attached to a great empire abandoning their own tongue, and adopting that of the dominant state. But this can only be the result of complete subjection to a conqueror of more advanced civilisation than the indigenous race. No such conquest of Attica is, however, recorded in Greek tradition. Not only do all other leading authorities² bear testimony to the pure "Hellenism" of its inhabitants, both in character and dialect; but Herodotus himself³, in his usual candid spirit of self-contradiction, describes them in the sequel as the most antient race of autochthonous "Hellenes." The same title to indigenous Pelasgic origin, combined with Hellenism of manners and language, is pointedly extended by both Herodotus⁴ and Strabo⁵ to the Arcadians. The latter author further observes⁶ that the dialect of these mountaineers, owing to its close similarity to that which Dorian influence spread over the rest of Peloponnesus, came to be comprised under the common head of Doric. This correspondence between the language of the Pelasgian aborigines of the south, and that of the Dorian immigrants from the north, described by Herodotus as the genuine Hellenes, is in itself conclusive evidence of a primitive community of Greek character in the two races.

abundantly proves that, amid his crude speculations on these isolated Thracian tribes, he was himself under the habitual impression, common to the mass of his countrymen, that Pelasgians and Hellenes were radically the same people. Treating of the origin of the Greek religion, he observes¹ that "the names of such of the gods as were not derived from the barbarians were of Pelasgic invention." Here, therefore, Pelasgian and Barbarian are no longer synonymous, but distinctive terms. "The Pelasgians," he adds², "formerly sacrificed to the gods under no separate names, calling them generally Θεοὺς, as having placed in order (κόσμῳ θέντες) the universe." Here the Pelasgians are made not only to use the Hellenic name for the gods, but to form it out of another Hellenic root by a subtle exercise of verbal etymology. He then relates³, among other examples of "barbarian" influence on the early Greek religion, how "the Phœnicians, having carried off two priestesses of the Theban Jove, sold them as slaves, the one to the Libyans, the other to the Hellenes. The Egyptian woman, on her arrival in the district of Thesprotia, now called Hellas but then Pelasgia, becoming familiar with the Hellenic tongue, communicated her mysteries to the natives." The Dodonæan fable, where this priestess was figured by a black pigeon, he interprets as allusive to her "barbarous speech," which induced the natives on her arrival, "before she had acquired the Hellenic tongue, to call her the Pigeon, those who speak a barbarous language being held to chatter as birds." She could hardly have acquired the Hellenic tongue from a Pelasgian people, had the two languages been radically distinct. But without scrutinising details, it is plain that, throughout this whole series of passages, the terms Pelasgian and Hellene as applied to the primitive population and dialect of Greece, are so entirely synonymous with each other and opposed to barbarous, that unless Herodotus be understood, in writing this portion at least of his work, to have been under a full conviction of their virtual identity, his text is altogether nugatory. In another passage he pointedly calls the Dodonæans Hellenes, in the most specific sense, as distinct from the barbarous races to the north.¹

The Dodonæan sanctuary was long the most revered oracular fane of the Greek nation. Both Homer and Hesiod describe it as familiarly consulted by their heroes; but it can hardly be supposed that all civilised Greece was used to receive the divine commissions in an unintelligible dialect, from a barbarian priesthood. In those days, therefore, the Pelasgian ministers of the oracle must have been Greeks. Aristotle, accordingly, in recognising the identity between their title Helli and that of Hellene, acknowledges the common origin of the two races, describing the Dodonæan territory, with others the primitive Pelasgia, as the "most antient Hellas."² No classical author seems to have doubted that these ministers of Jove had, with their antient seats and privileges, maintained their language unimpaired. It is also evident, from the details given by Herodotus of his own intercourse with them, that in his time that language was Greek, as are the names of the three priestesses whom he mentions.

¹ IV. 33. The same is indirectly said of the Molossians (VI. 127.). It need scarcely be added, that the term Pelasgian is habitually and constantly applied by the tragic poets to the aboriginal Hellenic population of Greece.

² Meteorol. I. 14.

Pelasgi of Italy.

8. A no less decisive proof of the substantial affinity of the two races, or at least of the general conviction of classical writers on the subject, is the familiar manner in which the term Pelasgian is applied to colonies, settled in foreign regions at periods beyond the reach of authentic history, but distinguished from the surrounding nations by Grecian manners and language. Italy is the country which offers the most important illustrations of this usage. Unlike the neighbouring continent of Greece, which from time immemorial had been occupied by the same race, that peninsula was divided among tribes differing from each other in origin and speech, many of whom retained their distinctive character up to a late period. To the question therefore, what was the criterion for distinguishing the Pelasgians of Italy from their neighbours the Etruscans, Oscans, and Umbrians, the answer invariably recurs, their resemblance to, or identity with, the Hellenes. Spina, for example, at the mouth of the Po, is celebrated by Hellanicus, Dionysius, and others¹, as one of the earliest and most powerful Pelasgic settlements in that country. Strabo² however, in treating of the same city, calls it Hellenic, adding, in proof of the distinguished character it formerly bore as such, that it possessed a treasury at Delphi. The same author³ calls Cære, or Agylla, which he also states to have had its Delphic treasury, a Pelasgian city. That the term Pelasgian is here employed as equivalent to Grecian, appears from the popular fable he recounts of the change of the name Agylla to Cære by the Etruscans. These conquerors, on appearing before the place, called out to the people on the walls, demanding its name. Their address, not being intelligible to the Agyllians, was answered simply by the Greek salutation, Chaire, Hail; which word, the strangers, in their turn, mistaking for a reply to their question, adopted as the Etruscan title of the town. Both the story and the etymology are trivial, but the argument is not the less valid in favour of the prevailing conviction that the Pelasgians spoke Greek. The testimony of Dionysius, the author who treats at greatest length of the Italian Pelasgi, is no less conclusive. One favourite object of his great historical work is to prove that the Romans were of Hellenic origin; this he does¹ by deducing their descent from the Pelasgians. A people whom he calls Aborigines are described, after expelling the Siculi, as "coalescing with the Pelasgians and other Hellenic tribes," from which union sprang the Romans. The Pelasgians of Thessaly, from whom he derives those of Italy, are also characterised by him as "a Hellenic race" in language and habits.² Among their heroes he mentions Achæus, Phthius, and other patriarchal Hellenic chiefs; and, throughout his commentaries, the two terms Pelasgic and Hellenic are constantly used as identical, while the names of most of the Pelasgic cities of Italy which he enumerates betray a palpable Greek etymology.³

Aristotle¹ divides the Pelasgi of the "primitive (Dodonæan) Hellas" into two tribes, the Selli of Homer, and those "formerly called Græci, but now Hellenes." The latter, therefore, were, in Aristotle's estimation, a subdivision of the same people, who, while their brethren remained stationary around the oracle, migrated into Southern Greece, and extended their influence over the entire nation. A branch of the same Græci (which name also occurs like Pelasgi, though more rarely, as the poetical title of the whole race) were evidently the Pelasgian colonists of Central Italy, whom Dionysius, probably on similar grounds with Aristotle, brings from Northern Greece, and who retained, in their transmarine possessions, the old national title which became obsolete in the mother country. This seems the only explanation of the otherwise strange circumstance, that the familiar Latin name for the "Greek" nation should be derived from an obscure tribe of Epirus. In the same way may be explained the practice, so inveterate with the Latin poets², of calling the Greeks, even of the purely Hellenic age, Pelasgians; while the name Hellene rarely, if ever, occurs in their text in its generic sense.

over which the Pelasgic language may at any period have prevailed, is one requiring a nearer insight than we are ever likely to possess, into the relative degrees of affinity which may have subsisted between the classical Greek and any neighbouring dialects not recognised as Hellenic. The Macedonians, whose territory extended along the whole northern frontier of Thessaly, offer certainly, at the period when they first assume prominence in Grecian history, many of the distinctive characteristics of a Hellenic people. By some writers¹ accordingly, they have been classed as Pelasgians; while others, more strongly impressed with the non-Hellenic features of their character, stigmatise them as barbarians. Macedonia had, at a remote epoch, been colonised by Dorian adventurers from Argos², by whom the native tribes seem to have been first combined into one body politic, under a settled form of government; and there can be no doubt that the language of the court and the upper class was solely or chiefly Greek. The country appears, however, from the first to have been held by a mixed population; the interior by barbarous tribes, the maritime district of Pieria and Emathia, from the mouth of the Penetus to that of the Axios, by a Pelasgic race. Of Pieria this may be considered certain upon grounds stated in a subsequent chapter³, and the antient names of various Emathian localities also betray a Greek etymology. These were the countries first occupied by the Argive colonists, from which they extended their dominion, and partially, it may be presumed, their language, over the mountainous region to the westward.¹ Hence, although vestiges still remain of a barbarous element, the Macedonians certainly appear an essentially Greek people, in all material respects, at the epoch of their political ascendancy. Of the Thracian, Illyrian, and other more northern tongues, the little that is known leads to the inference that they were altogether barbarous.

Besides the tribes of Italy and Asia Minor specified as Pelasgic by the antients, the same character has been ascribed by modern critics, on speculative grounds, to other primitive nations of the latter region. The Trojans, it has more especially been urged, are represented in the Iliad as a people almost identical with the Greeks, in language, religion, and manners. No value can, however, attach to the argument, so much pressed by the advocates for this affinity, that the Trojan warriors are made by the poet to speak the same language, and frequently bear the same names, as his own countrymen. It is one which obviously proves too much; as equally tending to establish the dialects of distant Asiatic nations, Chalybians, Paphlagonians, even Phœnicians or Egyptians, to have been Greek. Poets in every age claim the privilege of giving foreign names a turn more congenial to native ears, and even of substituting new names from their own vocabulary, when occasion requires; and unless Homer had made his heroes of all countries converse in Greek, that is, mutually understand each other, he must have abandoned the composition of his poems. The same familiar intercourse which occurs in the Iliad between Greek and Trojan, also takes place in the Odyssey between Greek and Egyptian or Læstrygonian. An interpreter is here as little required as between the Tyrian Dido and her Trojan guest in the Æneid. It might, indeed, be urged, that, whatever be the case with names invented for poetical convenience, those of the principal heroes ought to have preserved some near resemblance to native originals. If this test be applied to the chief characters on the Trojan side, Priam, Hecuba, Paris, Hector, Pandarus, their names will scarcely be found referable to pure Hellenic etymology; while several of the older titles, Ilus, Assaracus, Dardanus, have an Oriental turn. Other, such as Erichthonius and Laomedon, are plainly Greek; but whether owing to poetical license, or the true genius of the Phrygian tongue, may be a question. Alexander would seem to be the Greek translation of Paris, as Xanthus, the "yellow river," that of Scamander. The correspondence pointed out by antient critics between certain elementary words in the Greek and Phrygian languages can prove but little.¹ The rule must rather be held to be the reverse of the exception. Tradition, however, may seem to afford indirect evidence of the Pelasgic origin of the Trojans; Dardanus, the founder of their state, being described in one account as a settler from Samothrace, in another from Arcadia, in a third from Cortona in Italy, all acknowledged seats of Pelasgic population.¹ Less plausible are the claims urged by modern writers in favour of the nations in the south and east portions of the Asiatic peninsula, Carians, Lydians, Lycians, to Pelasgic origin; an honour never conferred on them by the antients. Of their language but little is known. The extant Lycian inscriptions are unintelligible, though dating from a period when this region enjoyed the full benefit of Greek civilisation, and written in a variety of the Græco-Phœnician character.

In spite of the maritime power of the Phœnicians, Greek population and influence appear to have prevailed from the earliest period, not only in the islands in the immediate vicinity of Greece, but in more distant parts of the Ægæan. The Cyclades and Sporades must have been, in whole or part, Greek from a remote age; the seat of one of the most popular objects of national worship, the Delian Apollo, being established in the midst of the group. In Crete Homer² describes a mixture of tongues, the island being divided among five different tribes: Achæans, Cretans Proper, Cydonians, Dorians, and Pelasgians. It may be a question, how far allusion is here made to a mere diversity of dialects; how far the languages of the second and third tribes in the list, where alone a connexion with the Greek family is doubtful, are to be considered as distinct tongues. No trace however exists of any barbaric dialect among the Cretans of historical times.

1. It may be laid down as a universal rule, founded on the experience of all history, that no extensive social influence can be exercised by a civilised on a comparatively barbarous people, without a corresponding influence on its language. The traditions, therefore, concerning colonies settled in Greece by nations of different origin and more advanced culture, assume an immediate philological as well as historical interest in their bearings on this portion of our subject.

That the Greeks, before their first settlement in Hellas, had already made some progress in the arts of civilised life, is evinced by the fact, that the Hellenic terms expressive of many of those arts are common to other nations of the same original stock, established in widely separate regions. The terms themselves must, therefore, in each case, have been brought, with the objects or wants which they denote, from some primeval common seat of elementary culture. No value, consequently, can attach to the commonplaces which so often serve as introductory to researches into the early history of Greece, describing its inhabitants as a race of undomesticated savages, dwelling in caverns, and feeding on wild fruits, until trained by Oriental strangers to habits of industry and social life. Still, however, it seems to be established, by a strong body of native tradition as well as critical evidence, that foreign adventurers settled in Greece during its fabulous ages; that they contributed to the civilisation of its inhabitants, and exercised a proportional influence, however slight, on the native vocabulary.

The most celebrated of these colonies are those said to have been led by Cecrops to Athens, by Danaus to Argos, and by Cadmus to Thebes. The two former adventurers were, according to the popular accounts, Egyptians; the latter, a Phœnician. A third Egyptian settlement is that fabled in the legend of Herodotus to have been established at Dodona, in the person of a priestess of Jupiter Ammon. Another reputed Phœnician colony was that of Minos in Crete, an island which not only ranked from the earliest period as a Hellenic land, but rivalled the most favoured parts of the Greek continent in precocity of culture.

The historical substance of the legend relative to Phœnician settlement in Greece is supported by evidence, direct or circumstantial, such as can seldom be brought to bear on matters of remote Hellenic antiquity; and which, as involving a question of vital importance in the early annals of Greek literature, the origin of the alphabet, will receive its due share of attention in a subsequent page.

With the supposed Egyptian colonies the case is different. That Cecrops or Danaus, or the foreign navigators figured under these names, really were Egyptians, that is, genuine Misraimites or Chemites, as the popular legend bears, is a point of classical mythology which involves, when tried by the test of modern criticism, serious or insuperable difficulties. These difficulties are of two kinds, philological and historical. Those of the former class, while more immediately connected with the present subject, are themselves also perhaps the most weighty. They may be reduced to a single head, the absence of any such element of Egyptian in the Greek language as could not fail to have been apparent, had the influence exercised by the one people on the early civilisation of the other been such as it is represented in these traditions.

2. Few subjects offer greater obstacles to the classification of ideas under specific terms, than the affinities of human speech. There are probably no two languages, at least of the old world, however radically distinct, but present such points of correspondence as can hardly be explained otherwise than by assuming, at some remote period, a closer connexion between the nations by whom they are spoken, than can have existed since the settlement of those nations in the region where history first discovers them. Even where, on the other hand, the resemblance between two forms of speech is such as to admit of their being classed as mere dialects of the same tongue, there may frequently be detected in each an admixture of elements foreign to the general character of either. The philologers of the old school were used to explain these phenomena by the hypothesis of a primitive common language, confounded or corrupted into many, by a special dispensation of Providence, in the infancy of our species. Hence a variety of tongues, each retaining a portion of the original stock, and each subjected to changes in the subsequent vicissitudes of society. This theory, amid all the refinements of modern speculation, still remains, perhaps, irrespective of its sacred authority, as probable a solution of the enigma as critical ingenuity is likely to suggest.

Numerous, however, and complicated as are these modes of dialectical affinity, they may yet, as a medium for illustrating the parallel modes of national connexion, be brought under three more general and comprehensive heads: I. That slight correspondence of single words, solely or chiefly expressive of primary ideas, which is often observable in languages radically distinct from each other, and may be referred to the common origin of the human race, in some cases perhaps to accident; II. That close affinity of structure, as well as roots, which indicates a more immediate derivation from some secondary parent stock; III. Where the resemblance can be traced, after the full formation of each language, to the direct influence of the one upon the other, by colonisation, conquest, or social intercourse.

It is obvious that these various degrees may be blended or modified by incidental circumstances. Thus the second and third will both obtain where two nations, originally speaking cognate languages, are afterwards brought into closer social contact. Of this there are numerous familiar examples in every age. Again, it is clear that, where the third degree is traceable, it must, or may, be accompanied, to a certain extent, by the first; so that, in every such case, the amount of admixture arising from subsequent intercourse could only be accurately estimated by deducting what was more properly due to the remoter, more general cause.

The Egyptian and Greek languages are admitted not to belong to the same family, but are essentially distinct in character and structure. The degree of affinity, therefore, which would naturally be perceptible, assuming no mixture of the two to have taken place, would be that enumerated as the first class. But had the Egyptians, as the legend would persuade us, established dynasties in the fairest parts of Hellas, the case were different. Had they taught the Greeks the first principles, or more subtle observances of religion, trained them in the usages of domestic life, or the arts of war and government, traces of these benefits could not fail to have been preserved in a proportional amount of that secondary correspondence between the two vocabularies which represents social intercourse. No such correspondence, however, is observable. All that can be traced is of that elementary nature which may obtain between radically distinct tongues, where no such intercourse has ever been pretended.

3. But the arguments derived from philological sources are not the only obstacles to the credibility of this tradition. They are powerfully corroborated by the dissimilarity of the habits, social and religious, of the two nations, so long as each preserved its genuine character. Among the national peculiarities of the Egyptians, here more immediately in point, was a proverbial dislike to foreigners, an aversion to quitting their own country, or admitting the visits of strangers. In early ages, to eat meat with a Hebrew was an "abomination to the Egyptians;"

and Herodotus¹ asserts that they abhorred all foreign usages, especially those of the Greeks, to the extent of esteeming it a profanation to kiss the face of a Greek, to make use of a Greek knife or cooking utensil, or even to taste the flesh of an animal cut up with Greek instruments. The same author, who yet would have us believe that the Greeks derived all their elementary civilisation from this very people, dwells with admiration on numerous other peculiarities in which the religion and manners of Egypt differed from those of all other countries, but especially of Greece.² The Egyptians were divided into castes ; their religious ministers, whether of male or female deities, were exclusively men ; their clergy shaved their heads, beards, and other parts of their bodies ; and the whole male population considered the rite of circumcision indispensable to purity. They worshipped animals, embalmed their dead, wrote in hieroglyphics, and abhorred swine's flesh. In all these particulars the practice of the Greeks was the reverse of that of their supposed instructors. They knew no distinction of castes ; consecrated females to the highest sacerdotal offices ; their priesthood were neither shaved nor circumcised ; they burnt their dead ; knew none but alphabetic writing ; ridiculed animal worship ; considered pork among the first of delicacies, and an acceptable sacrifice to the gods.

Another important feature of distinction between the two races, as bearing on the present question, was the proverbial abhorrence of the Egyptians for maritime enterprise. Sea voyages were looked upon as sacrilegious, pilots and naval officers as infamous persons, and salt water as an impure object. The sea and the coasts of the Delta were emblems of Typhon, or the Evil principle; sea-fish and sea-salt were among the chief articles of unclean diet.¹ This feature of Egyptian character is confirmed by the whole testimony of antiquity, sacred and profane. In the detailed accounts of Egyptian power by the Hebrew prophets, the only circumstance of national greatness omitted is naval force. Neither ships nor maritime commerce are ever alluded to. Homer's negative evidence is equally strong. He covers the sea with Phœnician traders; and there are few coasts or islands of the Mediterranean but are represented by him as carrying on some species of navigation, whether for freight or piracy. But throughout his varied descriptions, although he brings his heroes to the shores of the Nile, he never hints at an Egyptian ship or an Egyptian traveller in any foreign country. It is, indeed, certain, that there were no seaports at the mouth of the Nile in early times; nor was the residence of strangers in the country permitted until the time of Psammetichus (650 B. C.), the first author of this, as of many other innovations on old national usage.²

The difference between the genuine Paganism of the Greeks and that of the Egyptians, notwithstanding the pains taken by speculative writers in every age to identify the two systems, is as broadly marked as that in the national character of the races. The affinities of polytheism admit, like those of language, various degrees of subdivision, upon closely analogous principles; and it is only from an ignorance or a misapplication of those principles, that the popular schools of mythology, from Herodotus downwards, have been accustomed to consider the Dodonæan Jove as an emanation from the Theban Ammon, or the Attic Minerva as sprung from the Neit of Saïs. For the better elucidation of this point, one of no trifling interest in the intellectual history of Greece, it will be proper to consider the various modes in which coincidences between the objects of worship in different countries might arise.

The first is that mysterious connexion of certain primitive cosmogonical fables, common, under various forms, to most of the nations of the old world, and which seem to point at some parent stock of tradition as well as of language.

The second comprises those incidental points of similarity inherent in the essence of all polytheistic systems, where the chief deities are but personifications of the objects which most forcibly affect the senses or the imagination; where, therefore, different races, in pursuing the same track, would naturally stumble on the same conceptions. It were indeed surprising, if, between the deities of love, of war, of agriculture, or of the vintage, as worshipped in different regions, there should not spontaneously occur near points of analogy, even among nations of widely different origin and character.

The third mode is where superstitions, already peculiar to one country, are directly transferred to another, by colonies, conquest, or otherwise. Here the resemblance, in name or attribute, can seldom fail to be so palpable as clearly to betray the source in which it originates.

In applying these criteria to any parallel features in the Paganism of Egypt and of Hellas, we must dis-embarrass our minds of the fanciful analogies of the popular pantheon; and, forgetting the incongruous compounds of Jupiter-Ammon and Horus-Apollo, place the Greek system, as figured in Homer, by the side of the Egyptian, as illustrated by the native monuments. No two sets of idols can well be imagined more distinct in name or character.¹ Any small amount of actual correspondence is plainly referable to the first or second of the above three sources. At a later period, when Egypt was opened to foreign settlers by Psammetichus, a close connexion by social intercourse was formed, which, in the Macedonian and Roman periods, amounted to an almost entire blending of the two pantheons.

4. It might indeed be asked, why should a proud people be so ready to acknowledge their most important national institutions to be the gift of strangers, rather than the fruit of their own invention, unless there were some real groundwork for the belief? The answer is to be found in the characteristic zeal displayed by the Greeks of later times to establish analogies between their religious rites and those, not only of Egypt, but of all other Pagan nations. This peculiarity may be attributed, partly to a disposition to classify and theorise, inherent in the subtle genius of the race; partly, perhaps, to some natural instinct, which led them, amid the darkness of their own polytheism, to acknowledge a principle of unity in the deity, and by consequence an aboriginal connexion between his popular types in different countries. Hence, as each of the surrounding nations had its own polytheistic system, they were seldom at a loss to discover a new variety of Jupiter, Apollo, or Minerva, in Thrace, Syria, Libya, or any other country into which their theological researches were extended. The same Venus whom they indentified with the Egyptian Athor was still more frequently derived from the Phœnician Astarte; and Jupiter himself, who is at one time styled Ammon, is at another as confidently surnamed Belus. Consistently, however, with the guiding principle of their speculations, it suggested itself, that, among these varied forms of the same divinity, some particular one must be the prototype of the others. The award of this preference to any one nation would naturally be regulated by its claims to superior antiquity of social culture; and the region which could not fail to occur to a Greek was Egypt. The serenity of its climate, the spontaneous fertility of its soil, its early advance in art and science, and the splendour of its monuments, all seemed to guarantee its title to be the fountain-head whence the rest of the world had derived the elements both of religion and art. The intimate relations established between the two countries by the settlement of Hellenic colonies in Egypt, about the period when the Greeks first imbibed a taste for antiquarian research, still further tended to secure to the claims of the Egyptians a decided superiority over those of other great empires to the eastward. The Egyptians, on their part, were not slow to turn to account dispositions so gratifying to their own vanity. Their priesthood, accordingly, on becoming acquainted, through the new settlers, with the native Greek traditions, interwove with them, as a means of cementing the alliance, numerous fictions, which every one moderately versed in the genuine Egyptian mythology must perceive at once to be completely repugnant to its real principles.¹ These remarks apply more or less to the analogies, real or imaginary, between the monuments of early art in the two countries. There are, indeed, few specimens of Greek art now extant possessing claims to date prior to the reign of Psammetichus, from which period Greek artists and men of science flocked to Egypt from motives of curiosity or study. But the style of the few, chiefly of an architectural character, to which a more remote antiquity can, with any certainty, be ascribed, bears no resemblance to the Egyptian.

5. It may, however, be urged, that giving full weight to the above objections, it were yet nothing incredible that a few adventurers from the banks of the Nile, possibly fugitives or outlaws, should have happened, in the course of ages, to seek refuge in Greece; and that, unless some such basis existed for the legend of Egyptian settlement, its antiquity or inveteracy would be difficult to explain. This view of the case may the more readily be admitted, that it is both reasonable in itself, and supported by a version of the legend which, if less familiar, is not less antient or well attested than that above examined, while open to no similar objection on historical grounds.

The most important event recorded in the early annals of Egypt is the invasion of its territory by certain warlike foreigners of Semitic race, Phœnicians or Arabs, as variously designated, who, driving the natives into the fastnesses of the Upper Nile, established and maintained, during several centuries, a distinct empire over Lower Egypt. Afterwards, the native powers, regaining the ascendant, subdued and expelled the usurpers, who took refuge, some in the parts of Asia whence they had issued, while others, flying by sea, settled on various coasts of the Mediterranean. The period of these latter events, amid the uncertainties of fabulous chronology, harmonises sufficiently with that at which the Egyptian colonisation of Greece is reported to have taken place. Accordingly, several respectable authors, prior to Herodotus the earliest organ of the popular version, described Danaus, Cadmus, and other Oriental colonists of Greece, as fugitives from Egypt, under virtually the same circumstances above recapitulated.¹ This, therefore, may claim to be the older and more authentic form of the tradition. With such a groundwork of fact, Egyptian priests and Greek mythologers would not be slow, under the influence of the prevailing prejudice, to convert the arrival of strangers from Egypt into a colony of native Egyptians. With respect to Danaus, even the details of the popular legend favour the above explanation. He is there represented as a usurper, or state criminal, driven from the shores of the Nile by the "sons of Ægyptus," literally, by the native Egyptians. He is also occasionally described as son of Belus, the chief deity and national hero of the Syrian or Phœnician races, whose name, in the Semitic dialects, signifies simply lord or king. Hence Danaus, son of Belus, as opposed to the sons of Ægyptus, may be understood to figure the Phœnician or so-called Pastor dynasty, expelled by the native princes. Cadmus is also described as sprung from a Phœnician dynasty, whose royal residence was the Egyptian Thebes ; or as a native of Phœnicia, but sailing from Egypt in company with fugitives from that country.¹ Hence the old historian Pherecydes makes him godson of Nilus.² Further indirect confirmation of this view is furnished by the testimony of Herodotus, the chief pillar of the Egyptian system, that whatever intercourse took place in these early times between Egypt and Greece was by means of Phœnician navigators. Advocate as he is for Egyptian art and influence, he never describes an Egyptian ship as having sailed from the Nile, either for Attica or Peloponnesus. On each occasion he is careful to bring his colonists in Phœnician transports.³

The philological data, so much at variance with the popular view, are no less favourable to that here adopted. While the Greek and Phœnician languages are as radically distinct as the Greek and Egyptian, the number of kindred words in the two former so far exceeds that which any law of primeval affinity could justify, as to afford strong evidence of a further admixture by subsequent intercourse. A considerable portion of these words denote objects or ideas connected with a comparatively advanced stage of society, such as the more rude might have borrowed from the more civilised people. Among them are various names or epithets of deities and mythological persons or places, not referable to Greek etymology, but significant and appropriate when tested by that of the Semitic dialects. They afford proof, consequently, not indeed that the Greek pantheon was imported from Phœnicia, but, at least, that the rites of the one system exercised influence on the other. The social habits, also, of the Phœnician or Canaanite races, instead of those broad points of discrepancy above noticed in the case of the Egyptians, are marked in many essential particulars by a great similarity to those of the Hellenes.

nician al-

6. But the conclusive and living testimony of early Phœnician influence on the Greek language and literature is the correspondence, in name and form, of the alphabetic characters of the two nations. This fact, apart from all tradition on the subject, amounts to historical proof that Greece was indebted for the art of writing to an Oriental source. Any more detailed remarks on her early progress in that art will be reserved for a future page. It will here suffice to offer a succinct view, first, of the elementary properties of the primitive Phœnician alphabet; secondly, of the modifications it underwent in its adaptation to their own purposes by the Greeks.

Attention must first be directed to a characteristic feature of distinction between antient and modern practice, in regard to this first or mechanical element of literature. The European nations of the present day are in the habit of designating, both in speaking and writing, each letter of the alphabet merely by the sound it represents; that is, in the case of a vowel, by its own simple sound ; in that of a consonant, with the addition of so much of some vowel sound as is necessary to vocalise its own. The old alphabets, on the other hand, had distinct names for each letter, some of them of considerable length, and comprising various other sounds besides that which the letter itself represented. Thus, what we call simply A, B, G, the Phœnicians named Aleph, Beth, Gimel ; and the Greeks, with slight variation from the original type, Alpha, Beta, Gamma. The source of this different usage is to be sought in the origin of alphabetic writing, or at least of that particular alphabet from which all those now used in Europe are either directly or remotely derived, and which bears internal evidence of having been originally formed on a hieroglyphic principle. This will be best illustrated by the analogy of the kindred art among the Egyptians. The Egyptian hieroglyphic was of two kinds: the one figurative or symbolic, where the character depicted represented an object or idea ; the other phonetic or sonant, when it represented a sound. It is the latter class alone which here requires to be considered. Each phonetic hieroglyphic was, in fact, an alphabetic character, expressing the vowel or consonant which formed the first element of the name of the pictured object. A, for instance, was figured by an eagle, achom in Egyptian ; B by a goat, ba ; and so forth. The foundation of the art among the Phœnicians was similar. The name of each letter was here also that of some familiar object, the first sound of which was the element to be represented. Thus Aleph, Phœnician for an ox, stands for A ; Beth, a house, for B ; Gimel, a camel, for G. It may hence be inferred, that, in its origin, each of these characters was, as in the parallel case of the Egyptians, a picture of the object itself. Accordingly, the primitive forms of some of them, as they appear in the more antient remains of Semitic writing, Beth, Teth, Jod, for example, are evident contractions of a rude figure of the objects, House, Serpent, Hand, which their names respectively denote.

There was, however, an essential difference in the system as reduced to practice by the two nations. The Phœnicians, advancing from the elements of the science to its perfection, limited their representation of each sound to one character. They thus produced a simple and determinate method of writing, applicable to all purposes, and the rudiments of which might be acquired by a few months' study of a child. The Egyptians, on the other hand, not only mixed up with this more practical mode of expressing their ideas various others of a purely enigmatic nature, but, even as regards the former, instead of restricting, like the Phœnicians, the representation of their phonetic elements to one familiar object, they admitted a variety of signs for each.¹ This singular people seem, in fact, in their system of writing, as of elegant art, not merely to have stopped short on the road to perfection. They were even at pains, by wilfully imposing shackles on its free exercise, to render that which ought to be the simplest and easiest of sciences, as a guide to all the others, itself the most complicated and mysterious.

of its letters, slightly modified, in the order in which they originally stood ; and the significant Semitic terms, Aleph, Beth, Gimel, Daleth, were transformed into the more euphonous, but really unmeaning, Phœnico-Greek barbarisms, Alpha, Beta, Gamma, Delta. These names, through the influence of Greek civilisation, have since become identified with the practice of this most essential of human arts in every age and country ; and how few of the millions who now use the "Alphabet" are aware that its name is a compound of the Phœnician words Ox and House, and, as such, a lasting memorial of the obligations under which modern literature and science lie to primitive Oriental ingenuity. While the names of the letters underwent little change, either in Greece or the East, their forms were subjected to considerable alteration ; so that between the classical Greek character and the latter Phœnician but slight resemblance is perceptible. The original community of form may, however, be traced in the more antient inscriptions of the two languages.

The Phœnician alphabet contained twenty-two letters. The whole of this number appears to have been adopted at once by the Greeks, but with some variations both of power and order, effected upon principles of analogy, affording further evidence of the antiquity and extent of the general correspondence. This will sufficiently appear from the subjoined comparative table. The first column represents the Phœnician alphabet according to its twofold value, as a representative of sound, and as a numeral system, to which latter purpose it was applied from the earliest period. The second column contains the whole number of letters ever in use among the Greeks. The first twenty-two of these are Phœnician, and in their original places, as corresponding each to its Oriental prototype; the remainder are of native Hellenic invention. The third column contains the classical Greek alphabet, as finally formed and settled out of the foregoing. The fourth column exhibits the Greek alphabet as a numeral system. The fifth is the Latin alphabet.

Its subsequent modification.
Vowels.

8. That the powers of the original characters, in their adaptation to a radically different tongue, should undergo alteration, was to be expected; and for one essential improvement the system was indebted to the Greeks. The old Phœnician or Semitic alphabets consisted solely of consonants. The pure vowel sounds, which equally rank as letters in the European orthography, were considered in the Oriental system but as subordinate aids to pronunciation, and were comprehended, like accent or metrical quantity, in the power of each consonant, upon principles with which the reader's intimate knowledge of his native dialect was presumed to render him familiar. But the more correct ear of the Greeks was not satisfied with this indeterminate mode of expressing sounds, which, in their etymology, were little less radical than the consonants, and, in a language so greatly dependent for its full formation on poetry and music, required to be no less exactly distinguished. In order, however, to procure this new class of elements, it was not found necessary to invent an entirely new set of characters. Several of the aspirate, or guttural letters of the Phœnician alphabet, though technically classed as consonants by Oriental grammarians, might more properly be defined as an intermediate order between pure consonant and vowel. The former character, accordingly, they forfeited entirely, as modified into what was called in the same system a quiescent state, where, sinking their proper power, they appropriated each to itself, in general if not in constant use, a particular vowel sound. They thus approached very nearly to what would be classed in the European alphabets as vowels, and lent themselves, by consequence, readily to the required object of the Greeks. These letters were the Aleph, He, Jod, Oin, and Vau. The first four the Greeks adopted as the simple vowel sounds, A, E, I, O. The fifth, which, from the analogy of the others, ought to have been converted into U, retained its original aspirate power as the Greek Vau, or, as it is familiarly called, the Digamma. For the pure U another character was invented, named in contradistinction to the Vau, or aspirate U, the Υ ψιλόν, and placed at the end of the twenty-two original letters.

In three cases, where the Phœnicians employed two separate characters to represent different modifications of the same sound, each pair, on being transferred to the Greek alphabet, underwent a commutation of power, and, in two of the three, a corresponding change of order. The first case is that of the Zain and the Tsade. The former of these letters, nearly equivalent to our Z, became the San; the latter, pronounced ts, the Zeta of the Greek alphabet. With the Greeks, however, the Zeta engrossed to itself the representation of both varieties of the Zed sound, and, usurping at the same time the place of the San, became the seventh, instead of, as previously, the eighteenth, in the order of letters. The San, falling into disuse altogether as a vehicle of sound, was banished to the end of the list, where it was employed as the sign of the numeral 900; the name being also altered in later times into San-pi, owing to some resemblance which was traced between its form and that of the Greek letter Pi. The second case is that of the Samech and the Schin, the fifteenth and twenty-first in the Phœnician alphabet. The former became the Greek Sigma; the latter the Greek Chsi or X. The two, in their new capacity, also exchanged places, the Chsi being transferred to the fifteenth, the Sigma to the twenty-first rank in the Greek arrangement. In the remaining case the Teth, representing with the Phœnicians the simple T sound, was converted into the Greek aspirate Theta; while the Thau, or aspirated T of the Phœnicians, became the simple T of the Greeks; each retaining its original place, but undergoing a slight alteration of name corresponding to that of its power.

The number of vowel signs in the Greek alphabet was subsequently increased from five to seven. The Eta, which at first, like its original the Heth, represented the aspirate or soft guttural, corresponding to the Latin H, was, from an early period partially, from Olymp. xciv exclusively, employed as long E, double of the Epsilon. About the same time a new letter, Omega, came into general use to represent the long O or double Omicron, and took up its place as last of the series.¹ The Vau, or Digamma, an important agent in early Greek orthography, less, however, as a principal than a subsidiary letter, retained much of its previous character of vowel-consonant, or, in the technical language of the Oriental schools, of quiescible letter. It was chiefly used as a liquid guttural or aspirate, somewhat akin to our English wh, to impart emphasis to the initial vowels of words, and possessed the power, with certain limitations, of creating metrical position. It fell, however, out of use in the classical dialects, in the course of their subsequent refinement, though retained in the local idiom of certain provinces up to a late epoch.² It also maintained its place as the representative of the number 6 in the numeral system. The Koppa was banished from the classical alphabet at an early period, its sound being, in the Greek modification of the system, so nearly identical with that of the Kaph or Kappa, that one letter sufficed for both; it occurs, however, in the more antiquated Doric and Æolic inscriptions. When totally disused as an element of sound, it continued, as with the Phœnicians, to represent the numeral 90, and was also employed in musical notation. After these various changes, the Greek alphabet presented its full complement of twenty-four letters and twenty-seven numeral signs, in the order familiar to every classical student.

the popular
the subject.

9. The results of the foregoing analysis are at variance, in many points, with the popular Greek traditions relative to the first introduction and subsequent augmentation of the Phœnician alphabet.¹ According to those traditions, the number of letters imported by Cadmus was sixteen only: α, β, γ, δ, ε, ι, κ, λ, μ, ν, ο, π, ρ, σ, τ, υ. To these Palamedes, a hero of the Trojan war, is fabled to have added four (ζ, θ, φ, χ); and the whole number to have been made up, towards the close of the sixth century B. C., by the poets Simonides and Epicharmus. The fallacy of these accounts is evinced by the correspondence above shown, both in regard to power and position, between the whole twenty-two Phœnician characters and an equal number of the more antient Greek. Besides, the three letters, Vau, Koppa, and San, are altogether unaccounted for in the vulgar legend, although as distinctly traceable as the others to their Oriental originals; while the Y-pilon, though plainly of Greek invention, is enumerated among the primitive Phœnician elements. The only letters for which the Greeks were indebted to their own ingenuity are the last five of their complete alphabet. The exact period of their introduction is obscure; and the whole further inquiry into the changes which these and other portions of the system may have undergone, prior to its full maturity at Athens in the xcvth Olymp., involves questions belonging rather to the province of the antiquary or epigraphist than to that of the literary historian.¹

The analogy between the two alphabets is further observable in their adaptation to arithmetical purposes. The numerals from 1 to 10 were in both systems represented by the first ten letters: in the Phœnician, according to their familiar order; in the Greek, the Vau, dropped as a purely alphabetic character, was retained as sign of the number 6. The remaining decimals up to 80 are, in both lists, represented by the ensuing seven elements. In the sequel, while the principle remains the same, the minor alterations in the positions of the Greek letters impede the closer

conformity of details up to the number 1000, where the correspondence recurs with similar precision.¹

writing.

In the application of the system to the combination of words and phrases, the Oriental nations of every period have been in the habit of writing from right to left. To this custom the Greeks, in the earlier period of their practice, also conformed, several of the older extant inscriptions being so written; others, however, of equal or superior antiquity, in the now familiar form from left to right, imply that from a remote period both modes were in use. A third method peculiar to the Greeks, and which remained in partial use down to the time of Solon, was where the lines proceeded from right to left, and from left to right, in alternate order. This was called the Bustrophedon, or "Turn-ox," method, from its resemblance to the course of the plough in the tillage of land. The now universal European practice seems to have completely superseded both the others about the period of the Persian war.

¹ See Matthiæ, Gr. Gram. § 1. 4.; Gesenius, Hebr. Gram. i. § 5. It is remarkable, however, that little or no trace of this mode can be discovered among the Greeks until a comparatively late period. The ordinary method, in classical ages, was the employment of perpendicular lines for units up to four, Π (πέντε) stood for five, Δ (δέκα) for ten, Η (ἑκατόν) for hundred, Χ (χίλια) for thousand, Μ (μύρια) for ten thousand; or, where the whole alphabet was used, its letters ranked in their familiar Hellenic order, as, for example, in the numbering of the books of Homer, where α is 1, ω 24. The other mode does not appear to have become general before the first century of the Roman empire. It is difficult, however, to understand how it could have occurred to the public of that age to adopt so apparently anomalous a system, if not sanctioned by previous custom. It is more probable that the Phœnician method had been employed in Greece from time immemorial, but confined to local or provincial, possibly to literary, as distinct from monumental, usage. The first extant traces of it are in the older Græco-Egyptian papyri; and, under the auspices of the Alexandrian grammarians, it finally became universal. Conf. Franz, op. cit. p. 346. sq.

STRUCTURE AND GENIUS OF THE GREEK LANGUAGE.

1. INFLUENCE OF SOIL, CLIMATE, AND NATIONAL CHARACTER ON LANGUAGE.—
2. PRINCIPLE OF FORMATION COMMON TO THE INDO-TEUTONIC TONGUES.—
3. CONTRAST OF THE SEMITIC AND CHINESE.—4. CHARACTERISTIC PROPERTIES OF THE GREEK BRANCH OF THE INDO-TEUTONIC STEM.

1. THE settlement of Oriental colonies in Greece produced no sensible effect on the character either of the language or the nation. The strangers appear in the tradition as few in number, refugees rather than invaders. Their national peculiarities were speedily merged in the common mass of native usage; just as the language and habits of the Norman chiefs of our own dark ages coalesced with those of the native Franks or Celts of the countries occupied by those adventurers. Hence, the foreign element, though distinguishable in the Greek vocabulary by the test of critical etymology, rarely if ever offends by any incongruity of sound or structure. The classical Greek tongue, therefore, in any remarks on its original genius, may safely be considered as a genuine uncorrupted scion of the primitive Indo-Pelasgian stock.

By writers on the early history of society, too much weight has usually been attached to the influence of soil, climate, or other physical accidents in the formation of national character; too little to the faculties originally stamped by Providence on different races. Innate qualities must here be distinguished from mere development, the vegetative power of the root from that of the soil. External causes may, where unfavourable, blight the germ of the indigenous plant; where propitious, may add luxuriance to its growth, or even bring the same seed to maturity in less congenial sites. But the effect produced must still depend on the materials on which the cause operates. A man naturally devoid of talent for painting will not become a skilful draughtsman merely by residing in a picturesque region; nor will a people naturally deficient in genius attain distinction in art or letters, merely by inhabiting a country favourable to their cultivation. Had the Hellenic race, in the course of its early migrations, fixed its abode among the wilds of Scythia, we might at this day have been under as little obligation to its artists or authors as to those of the Tartar tribes who now inhabit the same regions. Had Greece, on the other hand, in the vicissitudes of human settlement, fallen to the lot of a swarm of Huns, centuries of brilliant sun and balmy air would hardly have infused into them the spirit of Homer or Phidias. To take a nearer case of illustration: Did national genius depend in any essential degree on soil or climate, how happened it that the Lydian or Carian aborigines of the Asiatic coast, or the Samnians and Sicanians of the two Sicilies, were so deficient in those tastes and talents which the Greeks so brilliantly displayed in the same countries?

If, in the great scheme of Providence for the moral advancement of the creation, to every people, as to every individual, a distinct part has been allotted in the drama of temporal existence, the Greek nation may be assumed, long before its subjection to any secondary influences, to have been preordained the special instrument of perfecting those delightful arts which, while in themselves the most effectual means of softening the ruder element of our nature, afford the purest sources of mental enjoyment. The same Providence which formed the design adopted also the most efficacious means of carrying it into effect, by placing this favoured people under a bright but temperate heaven, in a fertile and salubrious land, offering in its interior every variety of scenery, from the softest amenity to the extreme of grand and terrible, and intersected by gulfs and arms of the sea, opening up a continued succession of inspiring prospects, with a boundless sphere of activity for the intellectual faculties. What has been said of the genius of the people applies equally to their language. The influence of local circumstances in promoting its harmony, richness, and flexibility, was limited to maturing those properties the germ of which was coexistent with the nation. General theories as to the direct operation of such causes are, indeed, belied by the experience of every critical linguist, which readily supplies examples of languages remarkable for euphony flourishing in rugged inhospitable countries, and of harsh and jarring accents among the aborigines of the most genial climates.

That the character of a language should correspond to that of the people by whom it is spoken is a more accurate doctrine, and one finely exemplified in the case of the Greeks. The origin of human speech is itself a mystery which no human ingenuity can be expected ever thoroughly to penetrate. The most plausible theory is, that words were at first imitative of the ideas they express, being called into existence to denote the objects by which man was surrounded, or the wants by which he was assailed. Accordingly, in every primitive tongue, numerous elementary terms are evidently the result of attempts to express ideas by some inflexion of the voice, between which and the idea itself there existed, or was imagined to exist a certain resemblance. In many cases where the thing to be represented was directly associated with some sound, the resemblance may be called real. Obvious examples occur in the names of various animals, or the terms expressive of their cries. But there are also cases where, though no such immediate connexion exists, ideas are yet closely associated with sound by a sympathy between the senses, which leads to the designation of objects remarkable for a certain quality as experienced through the organs of vision, touch, or taste, by words productive of a similar sensation on the organs of hearing. This sympathy extends to moral qualities, the varieties of which may be expressed by corresponding shades of softness or asperity, density or liquidity, in the sounds by which they are denoted. In proportion, therefore, as the perceptive faculties of a people are delicate and acute, will be the imitative precision of these elementary tones as developed through the above process. This sympathy between words and ideas, while an important element of beauty in every language, constitutes one of the chief advantages which original tongues possess over those of a derivative character, where, in the vicissitudes of mixture or corruption, any such harmony must, in a large proportion of cases, be extinguished.

But the excellence of a language depends even less perhaps on the expressive power of its primitive elements, than on their adaptation, infinitely combined and varied, to the more complicated ideas of which the fabric of human speech is composed. Harmony of sound must be subservient to that of form and arrangement. As, however, the musical organs and the intellectual faculties have no necessary dependence on each other, even where the previous stage of invention may have been accomplished under the best auspices, the further process of combination may be jejune and defective. Hence languages highly expressive in regard to sound are often deficient in point of structure. In order, therefore, to the attainment of the highest excellence, it is essential, first, that a language should be the original invention of the people who speak it; secondly, that this people should be gifted, not only with a fine sense of euphony, but with variety and extent of intellectual powers. These favourable circumstances were combined, in the case of the Greek, in a greater degree than in that of any other known language. While it is in all essential respects a radically original tongue, its mechanism, both in sound and structure, reflects all the harmony, versatility, and precision, which mark the genius of the race by whom it was spoken.

2. The foundation common to the Greek with other scattered members of the great Indo-Teutonic stem is a certain number of monosyllabic roots, expressive of primary ideas, and capable of being combined into other secondary forms signifying objects or ideas of a more complex character. The same process, carried through upon similar principles, in respect to these secondary forms, makes up the complement of the language. In the different stages of this process, words are also subject to internal changes, by the curtailment, augmentation, or alteration of their own letters or syllables, partly as a means of varying the sense, partly of modifying the sound, whether for the sake of euphony, or of its closer adaptation to the object to be expressed.

In so far as the words of this more complex order present the objects expressed each in its abstract or independent character, the above process is classed by grammarians under the head of Composition. Where this abstract character is modified, by reference to time, place, or circumstances, it is called Flexion.

Take, for example, the terms $\theta\epsilon\omicron\varsigma$, $\theta\epsilon\alpha$, $\theta\epsilon\iota\omicron\varsigma$. The primitive root may here be considered as the monosyllable $\theta\epsilon$, denoting the idea of Divinity in its simplest form. The addition of another primitive root, $\omicron\varsigma$, denoting male gender, gives $\theta\epsilon\omicron\varsigma$, a god; that of α , denoting feminine gender, $\theta\epsilon\alpha$, a goddess; that of $\iota\omicron\varsigma$, denoting quality or property, gives $\theta\epsilon\iota\omicron\varsigma$, divine. In all these secondary forms, the new idea subsists in its simple integrity, in the same abstract mode as the primary idea itself. But if any one of these derivatives be affected by other component elements, signifying a certain relation, such as possession, privation, propinquity, distance, between itself and some other idea extraneous to it, the word is then said to be subject to flexion. As an example may be taken the change of the last syllable of $\theta\epsilon\omicron\varsigma$ into the genitive $\theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$. Here the object is no longer contemplated in its independent capacity, but in its relation to some other object expressed or understood.

The whole body of primitive, and, with certain restrictions as to compass or euphony, even secondary roots of the Greek tongue, are qualified to enter, in one or other of the above modes, into the formation of new words. Those employed in flexion, comparatively few in number, and serving, under the same or slightly varied forms, for the modification of every word susceptible by nature of such influence, have become for the most part obsolete in their primary character. They have, as it were, forfeited their own independence, in order to give greater precision and effect to their power of varying and extending the influence of their fellows. The same remark applies also to a certain number of the more elementary class of roots employed in composition.

3. The above properties, common, more or less, to all the Indo-Teutonic languages, will be best appreciated by a comparison with the methods adopted by other radically distinct families of human speech for attaining the same objects. Of these families the most remarkable are, the Semitic or Aramaic, comprising the Hebrew, Arabic, Phœnician, and others, extending over the greater part of South-western Asia; and that less fully explored by European scholars, of which the Chinese is the most widely spread and highly cultivated variety.

the Semitic and Chinese.

The fundamental elements of the Chinese tongue are also monosyllabic roots. But their combination, both etymological and syntactical, is very different from that above illustrated; being effected neither by composition nor flexion, but by a simple juxtaposition of the primary terms which embody the whole complex idea to be expressed.¹

The distinguishing properties of the Semitic family are, first, the limitation of the radical elements of words to consonants, the vowel sounds being but a subsidiary mechanism for imparting to the others their articulate power; and, secondly, the prevalence of bisyllabic or trilateral roots. In the representation of complex ideas, the Semitic steers a middle course between the jejune dryness of the Chinese and the elegant versatility of the Greek. Repudiating almost entirely, in the creation of new terms, the Greek principle of composition, it resorts for the same purpose either to variations in the elementary roots by aid of the vowel sounds, or to the Chinese plan of juxtaposition. In flexion, on the other hand, although it admits of an extensive combination of roots, the subsidiary elements are far from blending with the principal word in the same easy spirit of coalition as in the Greek conjugations or declensions. Those elements have acquired accordingly, in the phraseology of the Oriental schools, the names of Suffix, Affix, and others similar, instead of that of Flexions as among Greek grammarians.

The superiority of the Indo-Teutonic principle has been generally recognised by critical philologists. The rich variety of expression which it secures, both in the first formation and the grammatical development of words and phrases, is but ill compensated, in the rival tongues, by greater uniformity of method and etymological precision. These latter qualities, always of somewhat questionable value when carried beyond a certain point, degenerate in the Chinese into tasteless monotony. Where certain ideas instinctively form themselves in the mind of the speaker into collective groups, as in the more advanced stages of Greek composition and flexion, it is obviously both more natural and more agreeable that they should, within certain limits of bulk or complexity, be offered to the apprehension in one animated body, than scattered before it in disjointed members. The number and variety of vowel sounds, which also form a distinctive feature of the Greek tongue, and which, neither immutably fixed as in the Chinese, nor, as in the Semitic, mere subordinate agents of the consonants, appear as active independent elements of the language in every stage of its developement, impart to it a harmony and fluidity, as well as power of expression, to which the others are altogether strangers.

4. The above characteristics, however, of the original Indo-Teutonic stem are far from being exemplified in the same degree, or under the same features of excellence, in all its branches. The superiority of the Greek may be said to consist in having preserved, abandoned, or modified the common properties, in the manner best calculated to bring every variety of idea most effectually home to the understanding. None of the sister tongues can compete with it in regard to sound; while, in several, the composite principle of formation has degenerated into little more than the Chinese expedient of juxtaposition.¹ Of the whole body, the Sanskrit is istics of the Greek

branch of the Indo-
stem.

¹ The facility which the Greek tongue offers for creating new terms, to represent the extensions of idea involved in the progress of society, is curiously contrasted with the sluggishness of the most cultivated modern languages, in their dependance at this day on the etymological aids of the Greek lexicon for the requisite additions to their scientific vocabulary. By far the largest amount of these additions consists notoriously of Greek compounds, invented to express objects or ideas unknown to the Greeks themselves. The expressive elegance of the classical formations appears the more striking as contrasted with the clumsiness of the parallel Germanic terms; compare, for example, Typography and Buchdrucker-kunst, Telescope and Fern-rohr, Hydraulics and Wasser-bau-kunst.

understood to have most carefully preserved, in their merits and defects, the peculiarities of the antient common type, and claims, therefore, to be, if not the parent tree, at least the oldest of its branches. The chief points of resemblance, accordingly, between the Sanskrit and the Greek are in the properties where the former is most to be admired: in fertility of composition and flexion, luxuriance of grammatical forms, and in the many delicate phases assumed by the primary parts of speech, frequentative, prospective, desiderative; reflecting a singular acuteness of the discriminating faculty, and affording in return a rich fund of materials for its exercise. While the Greek thus rivals her Oriental sister in variety of forms, she asserts, in respect to sound, a marked superiority over all the members of the family. The vowel sounds of the Sanskrit are comparatively monotonous, occasionally harsh and constrained. Those of the Greek are distinguished for variety and euphony. In the combination of consonants and vowels the Greek also exhibits the same happy blending of uniformity and versatility, the same just medium between redundancy and poverty, which characterise all the productions of Hellenic genius. The liquid fulness of the vowels is so tempered by the admixture of consonants as to exclude feebleness or tenuity, while the harshness resulting from undue accumulation of the latter, or from the juxtaposition of uncongenial sounds, is equally avoided; and the infusion of gutturals, aspirates, and other less euphonous elements, suffices to insure vigour without creating asperity. The language thus, as occasion may require, combines the sonorous dignity of the Spanish with the melody of the Italian, and the masculine energy

Another remarkable feature which distinguishes the Greek from all other European dialects is the extreme delicacy and subtlety of its metrical and musical developement. It is, perhaps, in the earlier stages of etymological formation that this property is most strikingly exemplified; in the distinction, namely, which obtained in familiar pronunciation between accent and quantity, and in the nicety of the laws by which the two were adjusted in their relation to each other or to the language at large. The closer analysis of these laws belongs, however, to the province of grammar or prosody rather than to that of literary history, and could at the best be productive of but little satisfactory result.¹ In the modern European tongues the distinction is unknown. Accent and quantity, the long syllable and the accentuated syllable, are, in the poetry of the present day, as identical as they were essentially distinct in that of Greece. In the absence, consequently, of either experience or analogy, the real nature of the relation between these two elements of prosody in the living Greek tongue, has been hitherto a mystery which no effort of modern scholarship is ever likely to penetrate.

One more characteristic of that tongue, which, in drawing these remarks to a close, still demands attention, and to which also no parallel can probably be found in any other cultivated language, is its anomaly. This feature may be classed under two heads: anomaly of structure and anomaly of syntax. The latter will be noticed in a future page. The former is familiar to the classical scholar in the elementary rules of his grammar: that no Greek verb possesses its full complement of forms derived from the same root; and that many of the verbs in most universal use are dependent, even for certain of their more fundamental forms, on radically distinct sources. This latter peculiarity is common, in some degree, to the other declinable parts of speech; while, in various departments of flexion and formation, even as exemplified in the same root, an equal disregard for uniformity is manifested. The original source of these and other similar irregularities can now be matter only of speculation. It might be assumed that the kindred roots originally possessed each its full complement of forms in the primitive common stock of Pelasgic idiom, as duplicates for the expression of the same or cognate ideas; but that, in the course of subsequent vicissitudes, a portion of those forms had fallen into desuetude. Or certain roots may once have been peculiar, also in their full state of development, to different dialects, blended in the same vicissitudes into a single one, which may have retained or rejected, in greater or less proportions, the forms previously proper to one or other of those older separate dialects. Be this as it may, it is somewhat doubtful how far this peculiarity, in the extent to which it prevails, may be entitled to the same unqualified approbation above bestowed on the other more prominent attributes of the Greek language. That it constitutes an important element of that richness and variety, in which it may also itself be said to originate, is certain : but it is perhaps open to question, whether those advantages be not often attained with too great a sacrifice of the symmetry and simplicity so essential to excellence in every production either of mental or mechanical ingenuity.

1. HAVING traced the history of the Greek language through the vicissitudes of the dark Indo-Pelasgic period to that of its final ascendancy as a national tongue throughout the Hellenic continent, we now proceed to consider the elementary stages of its literary culture.

The earliest traditional notices of the social condition of Greece, after the spread of Hellenic supremacy, describe that country as divided into petty patriarchal states, where tribes of high-spirited vassals yielded a ready, but not a servile, obedience to martial chiefs descended from the heroes under whose guidance their possessions had been acquired. This state of society was fostered by the natural features of the country, which marked out the boundaries of the separate principalities, and interposed barriers against mutual encroachment. Its full influence on the language, as exemplified in the distinction and cultivation of the dialects, was reserved for a later period. In these early times its beneficial effects are chiefly perceptible in cherishing the chivalrous spirit which supplies materials for epic minstrelsy, the foundation of all primitive literature. The separate communities, while presenting, in their relation to foreigners, the patriotic front of a national confederacy, were engaged in frequent wars among themselves, for the most part of a desultory character, and originating rather in points of personal right or feeling than in extensive schemes of ambition. The political state of Greece presents, in fact, at this period, a great analogy to that not long since prevalent in the Highlands of Scotland. The tribe over which the Greek king ruled was considered, like the clan of the Scottish chief, as one great family, of which the reigning dynasty was the oldest branch. In this way every freeman might consider himself a cadet of the royal house; and the free population, at that period, formed probably a greater proportion of the whole than in later times. The subsequent more systematic establishment of personal slavery, that blot on the institutions of civilised Hellas, seems to have reduced the numbers, while it corrupted the manners, of the citizens.

But this community of feeling was cemented by a still nobler tie, derived from the system of polytheism which sprang up among a people keenly alive to the influence of natural religion, but as yet unable to reason philosophically on its principles. Spirit or soul, capable of will and design, they perceived to be common to all rational beings; but having no definite idea of existence or action apart from material form, they figured the influence of the deity, or, in other words, every event or object beyond the apparent control of man, under corporeal agencies, working by means more potent indeed, but similar in kind to those by which mortals attain their ends. Hence, as the phenomena of the creation are infinitely varied, and often, to all appearance, in conflict with each other, these early theologers were led to embody each class of physical influence as a distinct personality, intrusted with a certain department of mundane affairs, with gradations of rank and power adapted to their respective functions. In this way they had celestial gods who presided over the higher organisation of the universe; infernal gods charged with the affairs of the world after death; and terrestrial, atmospheric, and marine deities superintending every conceivable operation of life or nature. The inferior members, consequently, of this pantheon were so little exalted above the rank of humanity, that the distinction between the least powerful god, agent of wind, flood, or other elementary influence, and the most powerful man, producing, by the agitations of his good or evil passions, effects quite as momentous to his fellow-men, becomes very trifling. By a natural extension of this graduated scale of agency, the divine and human natures became sexually connected. Illustrious men were commonly fabled of divine parentage, and occasionally, at their death, received divine honours. The ancestor of almost every tribe was sprung immediately from some deity, and through him his whole line of descendants participated in the divine nature. Hence the nation and their political pantheon appear in the light of one great physical commonwealth, with a succession of ranks, from Jove to the meanest of Hellenic blood. The only broad line of demarcation between human and divine was the mortality of the one race and attributed immortality of the other. But this distinction, important as it sounds, is more nominal than real. As the belief in a future state of human existence was an essential doctrine of the system, death was to man but a transition from one mode of being to another. The gods themselves, however, could not only be degraded from their celestial rank, and permanently thrust into the same region appointed for the after-state of humanity, but could suffer wounds, mutilation, and suspension of faculties, equivalent, as Plato admits¹, to the effects of death on mankind.

This connexion between the celestial and mortal nature was a principal source of the high perfection which epic poetry attained in Greece. The history of human genius, in all ages, shows its noblest flights to be connected with religious feeling, whether in the individual or the society to which he belongs. To inspire an Iliad, therefore, required a system raising the mind, as yet unshackled by social refinements, to a habitual communion, if not with the Deity himself in the higher sense, with his power, beauty, and glory, as exhibited in the nobler works of his creation. The influence of Greek religion upon Greek art is, perhaps, most tangibly exemplified in those conceptions of ideal beauty which, though first reduced to definite principles by the arts of design, originate with the poets, whose suggestions were embodied by the sculptors and painters of later times. The popular objects of worship, while figured as men, required to be personified in a manner worthy of the divine character. The Greeks therefore, selecting the elements of abstract beauty which their fine taste discerned in the human form, purged them from the blemishes which they also perceived to be inseparable from the most excellent living models, and so varied and blended them according to age, sex, or other physical accidents, as to shadow forth the most delicate peculiarities of person or attribute in the different deities. In this way the art, not only of idealising corporeal beauty, but of expressing soul and the nicest shades of passion and feeling through the medium of material form, was carried to a perfection of which no other people has ever so much as formed an idea, but from the examples transmitted by the Greeks.

era.

2. The influence of these favourable circumstances seems to have been first fully developed under the dynasty of the Pelopidan princes, during which a closer connexion of blood, interests, and manners appears to have prevailed among the dominant races of Greece than at any subsequent period. This connexion was riveted by a species of feudal sovereignty, which that dynasty is recorded, in the same traditions, to have exercised over most of the southern states; partly acquired through marriage, partly a tribute to their own superior power. Under their auspices the chieftains of the confederacy, without abandoning their spirit of individual rivalry, were induced to turn it in a nobler direction, and combine for the great national enterprise against a foreign enemy, recorded in the legend of the Trojan war. This was the brightest period of Grecian chivalry, which, if it did not produce the noblest masterpieces of heroic song, prepared, at least, the way for their production, both by improving the language of poetry, and supplying the poet with the finest materials for its employment. It was natural that, among the princely families over whom this bond of union extended, there should arise a common, or, as it were, court dialect, whatever vernacular idioms may have prevailed among their followers. Such accordingly, seems to have been that, since variously designated the old Ionic or Homeric, originally spoken in the dominant provinces of Central Greece¹, and which enjoyed, through the minstrels entertained at the courts of popular princes, a high poetical cultivation. This view of the origin of the epic language is confirmed by one of the most characteristic features of its composition, those numerous forms which, becoming obsolete in its own vocabulary on its subsequent modification into the later Ionic, are found proper to other dialects of a very different character. Such forms may be considered, partly as portions of the parent stock originally common to the Ionic with other less cultivated dialects, and retained in these, while rejected from the Ionic itself, in the course of subsequent vicissitudes; partly as the gradual infusion, into the standard poetical language, of forms not originally its own, on its extension into quarters where it was not indigenous.

3. During the century subsequent to the Fall of Troy (1184 B. C.), extensive changes took place in the dialectical as well as political relations of the Hellenic states. About sixty years after that event (1124 B. C.), dissensions among the Æolian tribes in Northern and Central Greece produced a large emigration from Bœotia and the neighbouring districts to the conquered coasts and islands of Asia Minor, already partially occupied by the sons or followers of the victorious chiefs.¹ This new settlement is said to have taken place under the guidance of a grandson of Agamemnon; but, as the colonists were chiefly of Æolian race, the expedition bears the familiar name of Æolian, and the region occupied that of Æolia. About twenty years afterwards the Pelopidan power was subverted, and the Peloponnesus overrun by the Dorians (1104 B. C.). This catastrophe was followed, at some interval (1044 B. C.), by a similar settlement of the greater part of the ejected population of the peninsula on the Asiatic coast to the south of the district possessed by their Æolian kinsmen.² Through these convulsions the ties, social and political, which had previously united the Hellenic nation were in a great measure dissolved, and the subsequent wider separation of domicile and interests interposed serious obstacles to their renewal. From this period accordingly, may be dated the more specific distinction of dialects which becomes so important in the subsequent stages of Greek literary culture. The Hellenic tongue, prior to that distinction, might be divided into two comprehensive varieties: first, the Ionic, indigenous in the more civilised states, Attica, the lowlands of Peloponnesus, and, probably, other coasts and islands subject to or politically connected with these provinces; secondly, the Æolic in the wider sense, embracing the whole remaining body of less cultivated dialects. The latter, indeed, comprised subordinate modifications, differing from each other little less than from the Ionic. Still however, the general resemblance to each other, observable in the dialects of those countries where the old ruder speech continued to prevail, the Bœotic of Central Greece, the Æolic of the Asiatic colonies, that of the Arcadian highlands, and the Doric of Pindus afterwards spread over Peloponnesus, was such as to cause them all to be classed under one general head, sometimes of Æolic, sometimes of Doric, in the familiar usage of the critical schools.¹ That the Ionic, also, originally comprised secondary forms of dialect may be inferred from the account given by Herodotus of those prevalent in his own time among the Ionians of Asia.² We possess, however, in this case no positive knowledge, either from traditional or literary sources, of any so marked a distinction as between the varieties of the Æolic or Doric.

The Asiatic variety of the Æolian dialect, established by the Æolo-Bœotian colonists in the isle of Lesbos and on the opposite coast of Asia, came, in the sequel, to be its popular standard, having been, after a lapse of some generations, carried to high perfection by the Lesbian school of lyric poetry. The language of the mother provinces of Central Greece appears to have undergone no sensible alteration. The prevailing tradition³ is, that the Æolian migration was caused by the irruption into Bœotia of a kindred tribe from the neighbouring plains of Thessaly; who, expelling the previous inhabitants, themselves afterwards appear under the same title of Bœotians given by Homer to their predecessors. The same Æolian dialect must, therefore, have been common to both, and continued so, under such slight variation as time or local circumstances may have produced, after their separation. In Attica the antient population, with its pure Ionic idiom, remained undisturbed.

In Peloponnesus, the change of inhabitants was accompanied by a corresponding revolution of dialects. A remnant of the old Achæan population kept its ground on the narrow stripe of territory between the Corinthian Gulf and the Cyllenian mountains; and some other petty tribes of Ionians here and there, submitting to the conquerors, retained their possessions in a state of vassalage.¹ But the language and habits of the subdued race became, in later times, more or less assimilated to those of the dominant states. Elis², on the north-eastern coast, was assigned to a body of Ætolian adventurers who had joined the Dorian armament on its passage through their country. As the previous dialect of both Ætolia and Elis was Æolic, no essential change was here produced. The Arcadian mountaineers preserved, together with their independence, their proper Æolian tongue; which, itself closely akin to that of their new Dorian neighbours, had not participated in the culture of the expelled tribes.³ The districts immediately occupied by the Dorians were, Argolis, Laconia, and Messenia. In the sequel, their conquests, with their language, were gradually extended over Corinth and Megara to the Attic frontier, and subsequently, by settlers from Epidaurus, to the neighbouring island of Ægina.

sought refuge among their Ionian kinsmen of Attica. Afterwards, under the auspices of Athenian leaders, they crossed the Ægean, and occupied the coast of Asia southwards from the Æolian settlements, as far as the headland of Miletus, together with the adjacent isles of Chios and Samos. Here they appear, in later times, under the distinctive name of Ionians. Their subsequent celebrity under this title, and the still greater celebrity of the metropolitan state on the opposite continent under those of Athenian and Attic, caused the first of the three, in after ages, to become so exclusively restricted to the colonies, that the terms Athenian and Ionian, or Attic and Ionic, instead of being identical, as with Homer, were henceforward pointedly distinct. The south-western extremity of the same Asiatic coast, with the adjacent islands, was afterwards occupied by Dorians¹, attracted chiefly from Sparta by the existence, if we may trust Homer², of a previous colony established in Rhodes by a son of their national hero Hercules. The Dorians seem also, at a very early epoch, to have acquired an ascendancy in Crete. The language and institutions of that island offer, accordingly, at the remotest period of which authentic notices have been preserved, a close resemblance to those of the Dorian states of Peloponnesus.

It belongs to the history of Greek colonisation, rather than Greek literature, to follow out in detail the subsequent migrations from the different Hellenic states to which so many flourishing commonwealths along the various shores of the Mediterranean are indebted for their origin. It will be sufficient, in the

4. The old Epic dialect exhibits the efforts of a nation, pre-eminently gifted with poetical and musical genius, and as yet neither aided nor shackled by grammatical refinements, to embody its conceptions in the most expressive and most harmonious forms. That this dialect is, in a great degree, of poetical formation, its own internal evidence betrays. Many of its most characteristic features originate in a tendency to adapt the structure of words to the exigencies of the hexameter verse, the earliest, and for long the only measure in which the Greek poets are known to have composed. This is a peculiarity foreign to the process by which languages are cultivated in our own age, or to what may appear, on first view, the natural process in any age. The generality of mankind do not discourse in verse; nor, therefore, does it seem likely that the mere fashion of the poets, in the choice of their numbers, should supersede the spontaneous flow of words dictated by the convenience of social intercourse. The phenomenon, however, is explained by a somewhat closer insight into the earlier stages of Greek literary culture. In all ages poets assume to themselves a certain privilege of varying the sound of words from that authorised by familiar usage. But, in a language yet unsettled, as was the Greek at this period, and where poetry was the only style of composition, not only is greater scope afforded for such license, but the variations themselves are more apt to become permanently incorporated in the popular vocabulary. The case is different in more advanced stages of literature. Languages are there polished through the medium of prose composition. Poetry, indeed, there also asserts its own peculiar privilege. That privilege, however, now consists, not so much in innovation, as in adherence to antiquated forms; and, as a general rule, the language of poetry receives its laws from that of prose, upon which metrical usage cannot be said to exercise, in its turn, any serious influence. But, in the flourishing age of the Homeric dialect, prose, as a branch of literary composition, was unknown, while poetry was perhaps more universally popular than at any subsequent period. Under these circumstances, poetical usage could not fail to exercise an extensive influence even on the vulgar tongue, and numerous forms, originating in the convenience of popular recitation, to become inveterate in the language of ordinary life.¹ Nor is it in the old Ionic alone that this influence is observable. It may also be traced in other elementary stages of Greek poetry, where a particular branch of composition obtained a powerful hold on the popular mind. What first raised Athens to distinction in the republic of letters was the invention of the regular drama, in the dialogue of which the iambic trimeter verse, hitherto used chiefly in epigrammatic or didactic composition, was adopted, as a happy medium between the sonorous roundness of the heroic rhythm and the less defined periods of familiar discourse. There may, accordingly, be traced, in the formation of the classical Attic out of the old Ionic, an influence of the iambic measure, inferior, perhaps, in degree, but similar in kind, to that exercised by the hexameter some centuries before, in moulding the Ionic itself from the ruder speech of earlier times.

During the long separation of interests between the two bodies of the same Ionian race consequent on the Dorian revolution, the previous common dialect was subjected in each to other changes, offering an interesting analogy to those in their national character. In the Asiatic colonies many causes conspired, not only to soften the ferocity of the old heroic spirit, but to diminish the sense of political independence, and promote effeminate habits. The enervating influence of Oriental luxury, with which they were brought into closer contact, was aided by a seductive climate, increase of commerce and wealth, and by their position in regard to the powerful nations of the interior, whose favour they were under the frequent necessity of courting, and towards whom they latterly stood on the footing of vassal to liege lord. The best criterion for judging of the parallel change in their language, during the interval between Homer and Herodotus, is a comparison of the dialect of the poet with that of the historian. In the former, the energy and simplicity of the heroes by whom it was spoken are tempered only by such harmony of numbers as was necessary to adapt it to the higher poetical style. In the latter, an accumulation of short and slender vowel sounds, with abbreviations of the more sonorous diphthongs, and the rejection of many of those lesser asperities which impart tone and vigour to a naturally melodious tongue, have superinduced a certain liquid tenuity, amounting, at times, to languor, which renders it no less inferior to the old Homeric¹ as a poetical idiom, than to the Attic in its adaptation to prose literature.

Among the European descendants of the Ionian race, opposite causes produced as opposite effects. In Athens, with a less rapid advance in science or wealth, a complete political independance was accompanied by greater integrity of manners. The importance of that state, as a member of the old national confederacy, was also increased by the rivalry into which she was brought with the new Dorian dynasties. It was under these circumstances that the intellectual powers of the Athenians, naturally of the highest order, were called forth: combining acuteness of conception with fertility of invention and purity of taste, they exhibit, during the flourishing ages of the republic, all the proper excellences of Hellenic genius in the highest perfection. Similar were the changes in the antient common dialect. They consist, chiefly, in the retrenchment of redundancy, whether in sound or expression, in so far as was consistent with euphony on the one hand, and with perspicuity on the other.² The Attic dialect accordingly, as finally formed upon these principles, offers the most excellent model of a language for the familiar usage of social life, or the more practical and intellectual branches of literature.

² Of that admixture of other less-cultivated dialects, or even foreign tongues, to which Xenophon (Rep. Attic. II. 8), and after him Thiersch and Matthiæ, ascribe the change from the old Ionic to the Attic, as little trace can be discovered in the classical standards of the latter dialect, as in those of the more recent Ionic. The changes in each case are solely, or chiefly, intrinsic. Hence Strabo (p. 333.), and with better reason no doubt, commends the Attic dialect for its purity, which he ascribes to the fewer temptations the rugged barren soil of Attica held out to the visits of strangers.

Somewhat parallel is the case of the Æolian tribes on the different sides of the Ægæan. The colonists of Lesbos, and of the neighbouring Æolian coast, united with the taste for sensual enjoyment common to their Ionian neighbours, a peculiar fervour and excitability of temperament. There sprang up among them, accordingly, a school of lyric poetry pre-eminent above all others in impassioned composition, especially that of the amatory or voluptuous order. The adaptation of their language to such subjects naturally involved a refinement of the old rustic features which it retained in the mother country. This was effected, with little sacrifice of its native simplicity, partly by softening down its ruder asperities, partly by an infusion of more liquid forms from the Homeric fountain head of pure poetical idiom.

5. Although, in the course of these vicissitudes, the old poetical Ionic, as carried to perfection by Homer, became obsolete in vernacular usage, various circumstances combined to secure for it, as the common language of epic composition, an extensive influence on the culture of all the other dialects. In those districts of Greece where the late revolutions had not produced a total change of inhabitants, its antient popularity continued to operate in its favour. Among the new settlers the same causes did not exist, or could not be expected to prove so efficient. The Dorians, inhabiting previously a remote frontier of Hellas, and little connected with the great body of the nation, had taken no part in the war of Troy, or in other common enterprises of the Æolo-Ionian races ; nor, in their more limited sphere, does the same taste for legendary poetry appear to have prevailed among them. Still, however, as the spirit of local jealousy declined, in the mutual interchange of Hellenic associations, even the Spartans were not only led to recognise the poetical value of the Homeric dialect, but are said to have been the first among the states of European Greece to adopt the poems of Homer, in public use, as their standard text-book of heroic achievement.¹ It was a natural consequence of this early ascendancy of the Homeric idiom, as the sole language of literature, still more perhaps of the excellence of its models of style, that much of its phraseology should be infused into other branches of composition where different dialects were preferred. It continued accordingly, in all time coming, as the standard type of pure Hellenic diction, to exercise a most beneficial influence on the language at large. The rule which Macchiavel lays down for the renovation of states, and which is equally applicable to all other creations of human intellect, "to refer them to their first principles," was here in constant operation. The Ionic of Homer thus became a sort of common dialect, the forms of which, judiciously selected, impart dignity and variety to all the others. Although this influence is chiefly observable in poetical composition, it may yet be discerned by the critical eye, acting, less directly but no less advantageously, on the classical prose of every period.

6. This adaptation of the different dialects to literary purposes, keeping pace with the rise of new styles of composition, is a peculiarity which distinguishes the literature of Greece from that of all other nations. The division into dialects is itself a feature common to the Greek with every other language spoken through an extensive region. Varieties of tribe, soil, or climate, must always tend in some degree to vary the mode of combining or pronouncing the same radical forms. In all other cases, however, in the annals at least of European literature, circumstances have led to the establishment of a single dialect of each tongue as the language of letters and polite society, the remainder being restricted to vulgar or provincial usage. In Greece the case was different. Each of the leading dialects there claimed and enjoyed the same advantage of literary culture. It will be proper here to examine the causes of this distinction, which has scarcely hitherto received such share of attention as its importance deserves.

Where a nation, speaking the same language under a variety of dialects, is united at the period of its first advance in civilisation in one body politic, the formation of a classical or court idiom results naturally from the necessity of a common medium for the promulgation of the laws, the distribution of justice, and the exercise of public oratory or military command. The preference awarded to a particular dialect is here usually to be sought in the influence of the seat of government, or in some other early moral or political superiority acquired by the tribe to whom it was originally proper. The political state of Greece at the period in question afforded no room for a preference of this nature. The nation was divided into many independent communities, with no such predominance of any one state as could entail a corresponding ascendancy of its language. The case might have been different, for example, had the Pelopidan family, in the preceding period, succeeded in establishing a permanent sovereignty over any considerable portion of Greece. The poetical Ionic might then have become, and remained, the exclusive language of letters. The overthrow of the Pelopidan dynasty by the Dorians both checked the rising civilisation of Hellas, and dislocated the machinery by which its progress had hitherto been regulated. When, with the settlement of the new state of society, the process recommenced, the common spirit of Hellenic patriotism, though no way diminished throughout the mass of the nation, was more divided among its members, and more concentrated in each within the sphere of its local interests. This feeling of separate independance was heightened soon after by the abolition of monarchical power, and the establishment of republican institutions throughout the Hellenic states. In Europe the Spartans, Athenians, and other leading powers were actuated by a rivalry little short of what usually prevails between foreign nations. The Asiatic colonies formed distinct confederacies, but slightly connected with the mother country. Not only in these more important bodies politic, but in other flourishing commonwealths which successively arose in different corners of the Mediterranean, scope was now given for a spirit of individual nationality, to which no parallel can be found in any other age. The number of free citizens, who alone formed the state, was in each community but limited, and all were, by privilege and habit, personally engaged in the work of government. But the language was an essential portion of the state economy. The importance attached to the art of public speaking rendered its cultivation indispensable to whoever aspired to political eminence. The more popular branches of composition were also closely connected with religious solemnities, many of which were common to local Amphictionies, or confederacies of kindred states, assembling periodically in common sanctuaries for their celebration¹; a practice contributing still further to individualise the cultivation of the local language and literature. All these circumstances, while they secured in each community the maintenance of its own dialect, tended to prevent that of any one attaining a marked ascendancy over its fellows. The abandonment of the mother tongue, and adoption of a foreign medium either of public or social intercourse, from deference to the superior power or talent of a neighbour, would have been a compromise of the national honour incompatible with the spirit which animated those republics. Another material cause of the same effect was the variety and extent of the national genius, coinciding with an equal variety of favourable media for its exercise. Among the moral influences above adverted to, as tending in other cases to promote the preference of some particular dialect in a national literature, the most important, perhaps, is the appearance, in some one province, of a number of writers whose genius and popularity have caused their works to be adopted as standards.¹ In Greece an extension of the same cause produced an opposite effect. As the different branches of composition were invented and matured, such was the fertility of native talent, that in different districts authors arose pre-eminent in some particular style. In this way, each member of the republic of letters, while willing to appreciate the genius of its neighbour, honourably maintained the independance of its own.

7. It resulted further, from the same causes, that as the sphere of literary pursuit was enlarged, the general rule of an exclusive preference of its native idiom by each community admitted of great modification. As the varieties of dialect were met by a corresponding variety of taste or talent, certain styles of composition came to be considered the more immediate province of one dialect than of another. The character of a particular dialect might be in itself better adapted to a particular style. The tribe by whom the dialect was spoken might have been that with whom the style itself originated, or whose authors were its most approved standards. Even local circumstances might procure for particular dialects a preference in subjects connected with the common public ceremonial of the confederacy. Hence different departments of literature ultimately established, out of so great a variety of materials, a mode of expression proper to themselves, without any compromise of patriotic feeling, or any sacrifice of the just rights of the mother tongue. The Doric became the favourite language of the higher branches of lyric composition and of the primitive schools of philosophy; the Æolic of the amatory ode: the old Ionic retained its former privilege in regard to the epic style and hexameter verse; while the new Ionic and Attic were preferred in elegy, satire, the drama, and the more popular departments of prose.

Appropriation of different dialects to different styles.

Herodotus offers a lively example of the ease and freedom with which men of genius, in the youthful stages of Greek literature, followed the bent of their own judgement in the choice of a vehicle for their thoughts; a native of the Dorian Halicarnassus, settled in an Athenian colony founded at a period when the Attic dialect was already in a forward state of cultivation, he yet prefers the Ionic for the composition of his history. The reason is simple. The genius of his own Doric was little adapted for elegant prose; nor had the Attic as yet become popular in that style. Of the few prose authors who had hitherto treated the general history of Greece, the more popular were Ionians, so that the public was already familiar with their dialect in such subjects. Herodotus, therefore, not being ambitious of striking out any independent course of his own, preferred it. A few years afterwards Thucydides appeared, the first of a succession of illustrious Athenian prose writers; and, from this and other causes, the Attic soon obtained an almost universal preference in every branch of prose composition.

8. As a consequence of the same principle which led to the adaptation of certain dialects to certain classes of writing, the whole body of dialects came to be considered as a common literary property; and men of inventive genius sought, by combining the characteristics of several, to enliven or ennoble their favourite styles. In this way new varieties sprang up, distinct from the spoken language of any part of the nation. The Dorians, for example, at an early period, took a lead in the higher departments of choral poetry. Partly owing to this circumstance, partly to their local influence in the Olympian and other great national festivals, their dialect acquired a preference in the triumphal odes which graced those solemnities. The genius of the pure Doric, however, was deficient in the harmony essential to its poetical perfection. The leading authors, therefore, in this branch of composition, formed for themselves a new species of lyric dialect, by engrafting upon the Doric the more musical forms of the old Homeric. This is what is now called the Stesichorean or Pindaric. About the same period the chorus of the Dorian dithyramb, when transformed into that of the Athenian tragedy, underwent a similar modification, by a blending with the native Attic. Hence another beautiful variety of poetical idiom. So delicate was the sympathy established in the subsequent refinements of Attic taste between idea and sound, that even the different turns of expression, in the same departments of composition, were marked by corresponding shades of dialectical form. When, for example, in the drama, messengers are introduced recounting at length the details of remarkable events, where, consequently, the dramatic gives place in some degree to the epic character, the usual Attic idiom and Iambic measure admit of forms peculiar to the Homeric dialect and hexameter verse as the proper language and rhythm of narrative poetry.¹ Even in the mixed idiom of the chorus may be distinguished a greater infusion of Æolo-Doric forms where the train of sentiment assumes a loftier character, and of Attic where a more familiar tone prevails.¹

By this varied application of its rich stock of materials, the Greek language afforded a freedom and scope to the exercise of literary genius, to which nothing parallel can be found in any other age or country. A language restricted to one definite classical standard can hardly be well adapted to every class of composition. The same musical softness which favours the flow of poetical numbers must, in a proportional degree, be prejudicial to the gravity of historical narrative and philosophical disquisition, or to the terseness of forensic eloquence. Had Demosthenes possessed no other medium for giving vent to his Philippics but the Ionic of Homer, or Plato composed his Republic in the Æolic of Sappho, their works, whatever their intrinsic excellence, must have sacrificed a portion of their external charm to the comparatively inappropriate dress in which they would have appeared. This may be further illustrated by the example of modern nations distinguished for talent in every department of letters. The French tongue has produced a comic writer equal, to say the least, to the chiefs of the Attic humorous drama: but, in the higher walks of poetry, neither genius nor art can overcome the obstacles to a corresponding degree of excellence interposed by the sound and structure of that language. The finest conceptions couched in harsh or discordant accents can no more constitute perfection in poetry, than in music the sublimest airs sung by a weak and tuneless voice. The same general remark applies more or less to all the other European tongues, that, in proportion as they may be adapted to one style of composition, they are unfavourable to another. But in the cultivated Greek dialects we possess the masterpieces of several languages rather than of one. It were difficult to imagine a vehicle of expression better suited to the varied powers of the Epic muse, than the old Homeric; to the tenderness of amatory complaint, than the Lesbian Æolic; to the mingled gravity and impetuosity of the triumphal lyre, than the Doric of Pindar: or to the precision and energy of dialogue, prose narrative, and oratory, than the Attic of Aristophanes, Thucydides, and Demosthenes.

9. The above remarks apply chiefly to the flourishing ages of Greece, when a spirit of independance animated the institutions of every state, and the breast of every citizen. With the decline of the national character, the establishment of a dominant influence in the political commonwealth was attended, as in other ages and countries, by a corresponding effect in the republic of letters. The preponderance of Attic genius had procured a certain ascendancy to the Attic tongue, even prior to the subjection of Greece to the Macedonians. One great object of this semibarbarous power, from its first rise into importance, was to establish a claim to the pure Hellenic character, and, by consequence, to promote Hellenic habits and associations among its subjects. As the most effectual means of attaining this end, they adopted the Attic as the court dialect, took the literature and science of Athens under their especial patronage, and established them as models in the new schools founded under their own auspices. Alexandria thus became the metropolis of arts and letters, and the Attic, as it prevailed in that court, slightly modified by provincial peculiarities, the classical dialect of the whole Hellenic world. The other dialects, however, were not entirely abandoned. The old Ionic maintained its exclusive preference in heroic poetry. Nor did the existence of such models as Herodotus or Pindar fail to secure a certain number of followers in the branches to which they had given lustre. Still, however, the use of all the older dialects became, from day to day, more a matter of imitation than of spontaneous custom. The states which longest maintained a political independence were the Sicilian republics. The Macedonian sway, to which the whole of Greece Proper, with her colonies to the eastward, had been more or less subjected, never extended to those commonwealths. Perhaps, indeed, their most flourishing age was that of the decline of the mother country. Their literary history supplies, accordingly, another illustration of the close union between the destinies of the Greek language and of Greek national independence. It was during this period, when Sicily in fact stood alone as the representative of the original genius of Hellas, that her poets carried to perfection, as its last expiring effort, one of its liveliest and most characteristic creations, the pastoral or bucolic style of lyric poetry, and with it another spirited variety of the Doric dialect.

1. THE influence of the same causes which promoted the culture of the separate dialects may be traced on the language at large, in rendering it as faithful a reflexion of the genius of the whole nation as each dialect was of that of the individual tribe. The distinction between the language of letters and the vulgar tongue, so characteristic of modern civilisation, is imperceptible or but little defined in the flourishing age of Greece. Numerous peculiarities in her social condition tended to constitute classical expression in speaking or writing, not, as with us, the privilege of a few, but a public property in which every Hellene had an equal interest. Among these peculiarities may be especially noticed the freedom of social intercourse which prevailed among all ranks of citizens, owing partly to their republican institutions, partly to their natural vivacity of temper and devotion to public amusements, of which literature formed an important element; the industrial arts being chiefly confined to slaves, and attendance on the council, theatre, or gymnasia the only occupations suitable to the dignity of a Hellenic freeman. During many ages, oral recitation, in the absence or limited use of writing, was the sole or chief, at every period a common, mode of publication. Works of genius, even of the highest order, were addressed, not to an exclusive class, but to the citizens at large ; were recited on solemn occasions, and often approved or condemned by the voice of the assembled multitude. To this popularity of the national literature may be ascribed in great part that richness and freedom of expression, which constitutes so great a charm of the Greek writers of the best period. In the choice of their phrases, they were guided rather by their innate sense of euphony and propriety, than by deference to any artificial standard. Whatever was custom, was equally entitled to become rule. Not that critical discrimination was excluded, but the rejection of a word or phrase merely as a vulgarism, without reference to its intrinsic merit, could hardly, in the nature of things, take place in the flourishing ages of Greek letters. Much of this variety of expression, in the syntactic element of the language, may be traced to that ascendancy of the imaginative faculty which marks the earlier stages of literary culture. An author, warmed by his subject, expressed his ideas in the order in which they spontaneously offered themselves, without arresting their flow to consider how far that order was strictly grammatical. Nor, had he himself observed the irregularity, would he have deemed its correction an improvement, satisfied that the train of association in the mind of the audience would harmonise so nearly with his own, that they would be as little disposed to cavil as he to amend.

The elementary rules of grammatical concordance are everywhere substantially the same. If, therefore, the structure of each language were regulated by strict laws of analogy, there would be little or no scope for variety, in connecting the ideas of which words are the representatives. It is, in a great measure, through the anomalies of syntax, that the working of thought in the individual or national mind is exhibited. But this shadowing forth of individual character is an important element of spirit and originality of style, which must be extinguished by any systematic reduction of popular usage to grammatical analogy. Against the danger of freedom degenerating into license or obscurity, native Greek taste proved an effectual safeguard. It is this inexhaustible diversity of modes of expression, the analysis and classification of which, under the technical heads of Ellipsis, Pleonasm, Anacoluthia, Syncope, and so forth, have exercised the ingenuity of grammarians for the last two thousand years, but which can no more be reduced to any fixed rules than the varied intelligence in which they originate.

2. These peculiarities of the Greek tongue are traceable mainly, no doubt, to the genius of the people, partly however to the difference, formerly pointed out, in the circumstances under which Hellenic and modern literary culture took their origin. The former arose in the bosom of the nation, and was matured by the unaided efforts of native genius. Its standards of taste were the produce of the talents common to all, not of the educational acquirements peculiar to a few. Numerous masterpieces in the higher walks of poetry had been composed before the familiar use of prose writing, and the most esteemed models of both styles before the first attempts to reduce grammar to system. This process was reserved for a period when original talent was already on the decline, and professed critics attempted, by giving uniformity to classical usage, to check the progress of corruption. In the other European languages, from the Latin downwards, this order was reversed. Their culture was, from the first, carried on upon imitative principles. In the one case the rules were derived from the standards; in the other, the standards were framed after the rules. The classic literature of Rome originated with native Greeks, and the Latin language was cultivated by reference to the laws of Greek grammar and prosody. The first step taken, on the revival of taste in our own middle ages, for refining the "vulgar tongue" (as the spoken language was called, in contradistinction to the barbarous Latin of the schools), was to apply to its productions the rules devised by the antient sophists for sustaining the decrepitude of the classical dialects. Its more advanced stages of culture have been the result of a long course of artificial training and careful separation of the classical from the vernacular phraseology. Many modes of expression, calculated to impart energy and variety to style, and to which the Greek dialects would have given full prominence, have been proscribed by the tyranny of grammatical criticism as inelegant, or lie hid as vulgarisms in the provincial idiom. Our literary dialects may be compared to gardens of select plants, many of them exotics, nurtured by scientific training, and carefully separated from the wild growths by which they are surrounded. The Greek language may be likened to an extensive pleasure-ground in a favoured climate and diversified soil, comprising every species of wild and domestic vegetation in endless variety and luxuriance.

The equal distribution of literary culture among all classes of Greek citizens was also favoured by the originality of their language, above noticed as one of its most important attributes. The etymology of its words being, with rare exception, contained within itself, the terms which represent even complex ideas connected with the more abstruse sciences were reducible, by a more or less consistent train of analogy, to certain elementary roots, conveying through their sound some general apprehension of their sense to the understanding of the least learned. But in mixed or corrupt languages, such as most of those of modern Europe, a large portion of the vocabulary can convey, to the majority of persons who use it, no more definite impression than results from the habitual association of a certain sound with a certain idea, which would, to them, have been equally well represented by any other sound. No Italian or Frenchman can possess a scholarlike knowledge of his own tongue, but through a familiarity with the Latin; no Englishman, but through an acquaintance with Latin, French, and German. In each case, a nearer insight into the native etymology requires also some tincture of Greek letters. The language of modern science is, to all but the accomplished linguist, a species of cabalistic dialect, in its origin chiefly Greek, and mainly dependant on that tongue for its further developement. In Greece, on the other hand, every man that could read and write possessed all the elementary education requisite to enable him, according to his talent and opportunities, to tread at once the higher walks of literature, or dive into the mysteries of science.

Advantages
on the side of the Greeks.

3. The literature, like the language, thus grew up from infancy to maturity, a vivid reflexion of the genius of the people. That pedantry of scholastic learning and spirit of imitation which pervade our own republic of letters were completely excluded. The national taste alone prompted the various branches of composition, which arose, were matured and subdivided, with the parallel stages of ethic and social developement. Their materials were drawn from purely national sources. The vicissitudes of domestic history furnished a copious store of subjects in which every Hellene had a personal interest, and a varied mythology repaid the fancy to which it owed its own birth with an imagery as richly varied. Among the advantages resulting from this union between the genius of the nation and of its literature was that close sympathy between author and subject, so essential to excellence in every branch of art. Let us imagine two poets of equal talent, each charged with the composition of an ode in celebration of a glorious victory; the one a citizen of the triumphant state, who had borne a part in the war, the other a foreigner, who had heard of the adventure but by distant report. There can be little doubt which of the two poems would be most distinguished by poetic fire. The rule applies more or less to every other popular class of composition, and extends from the author to the audience, who enter far more readily into a subject founded on domestic history or manners, than one borrowed from nations of whose habits or language they know nothing but through historical or antiquarian research. Nor is the influence of this association limited to the age in which a composition appears, or the public to whom it is addressed. A work, either of history or fiction, emanating from the country and times in which the scene of action is laid, acquires a far greater hold on the public, even of other times and regions, than one by a foreigner on the same subject. No history of the Persian or Peloponnesian war, by a modern author, can awaken the same interest as the narratives of Herodotus or Thucydides. In poetry this power of association is still stronger. The supernatural agency of classical fable delights in the page of the native writers, because we feel that, however foreign to our own belief, it represents that, real or poetical, of the author, his heroes, and his public. In a modern poem on classical subjects it becomes comparatively insipid, because, though in unison with the belief of the heroes, it is foreign to that of the author or his public. But the same heathen mythology, in a modern adventure, not only fails to warm, but actually freezes the imagination, because we feel that it is equally foreign to the belief of the author, his heroes, and his public.¹ It is in the literature of Greece alone, among the nations of civilised Europe, that the full power of this association is perceptible. No study of foreign history was there required to create or appreciate the higher works of genius, no deference to foreign rules of criticism, no initiation into the mysteries of a mythological machinery transferred by the labours of the antiquary from remote ages to a state of society at variance with its spirit. A Roman, in order to understand the elegant authors in his own tongue, required to be more deeply versed in the annals of Greece than of his own country. In the present age the sphere of acquirement necessary to form an accomplished man of letters has been still more widely extended, and many of the noblest productions of modern literature are uninteresting or unintelligible to all but the upper rank of educated men.¹

¹ Of the value of this source of interest in a national literature few modern nations seem to have had any clear conception. The subject, which with the Greeks was the soul of the action, has in our own age been too often considered but as a species of raw material for the art of the dramatic experimentalist. It is like the block of marble, out of which the modern sculptor, with an equal neglect of the spirit of Greek art, and an equally servile adherence to its practice, hews Apollos, Mercurics, Ariadnes, instead of applying the principles transmitted through the antique models to the execution of national works. Hence that pedantic reproduction of Medeas, Meropes, Phædras; where the question with the author or the critic is, not so much whether the work be calculated to speak home to the feelings of the audience, as how far the poet can claim to have successfully competed with Euripides or Racine in the art of adjusting dramatic combinations. Shakspeare uttered a happy, though involuntary, satire on the classical European drama, in his famous lines,

That he should weep for her.”

There can, indeed, be as little tragic sympathy between the benches of a Parisian pit and the distresses of a Hippolytus or Antigone, as between the polished boots and starched cravat of the audience, and the diadem, buskin, and chlamys of the performers.

4. Whatever difference of opinion, therefore, may exist as to the essential value of antient and modern learning, the claim of Greece to originality and extent of spontaneous invention is unquestionable and paramount. To her belongs the exclusive honour of creating and maturing a system of literary polity for civilised Europe; of having originated, classed, and regulated the various departments of composition; and furnished, in each, standards, by the study of which the efforts of every people who have since successfully cultivated the elegant arts have been awakened, or their progress directed. In no other country has any advance been made towards the higher stages of excellence independently of Greek models, or of the impulse communicated directly or indirectly by Greeks. Were it, therefore, proposed as a point of speculative inquiry, whether, had the Hellenic nation never existed, or had its works of genius been annihilated on the rise of the Roman ascendancy, the present dominant races of Europe would have stood higher in the scale of literary culture than the other nations of antiquity before their subjection to Hellenic influence, the decision, if referred to the test of experience, must be in the negative. This may at first view seem a startling conclusion. When we consider the actual extent and variety of our intellectual resources, so far surpassing those of the antients in their most enlightened epochs, they appear so entirely our own, that, even admitting the whole fabric to rest on a Hellenic foundation, the consciousness of our existing superiority might still incline us to assume that, in the absence of all foreign aids, the spontaneous efforts of modern genius would have attained a similar eminence; and that too without any sacrifice of native originality at the shrine of classical antiquity. "The advantage of the Greeks," it might be urged, "is to be ascribed rather to the favour of destiny, which allotted to them a primary, to ourselves a secondary, stage in the march of improvement, than to an innate superiority of inventive talent. Our own civilisation being thus grounded on a previous social system, the adoption of the models transmitted by it became unavoidable." The question, however, arises: How happens it that the same nations, who, after coming into contact with Greek art and science, displayed taste and talent for their cultivation, should not have spontaneously put forth that talent in their previous independent capacity? On behalf of our Teutonic ancestors, there may reasonably be pleaded their comparative remoteness from the older fountain heads of elementary civilisation, and the absence of other local advantages enjoyed by the countries on the Mediterranean. Another case, however, more immediately in point, is that of the Romans, through whose medium chiefly Greek science has been distributed to the rest of Europe. The example of this distinguished people shows that a high amount of attainment in legislation, agriculture, and the essentially useful arts, has no necessary connexion with elegant pursuit; and that nations who, when supplied with a first story, may be qualified to raise excellent fabrics, would have been incompetent themselves to rear them from the foundation. Rome was mistress of a great empire, had attained the climax of her social prosperity, and a proficiency in all the practical arts of life, before a single native fruit of her imaginative talent can be adduced above the rank of the popular ballads common to all semibarbarous tribes. It required a familiarity with the classical models of Greece, consequent on the subjugation of that country, to engraft on a naturally barren stock the nobler productive powers which were indigenous among the Greeks; and the first improvers of Latin style were naturalised Hellenes. But the races who have since held sway in Europe can hardly lay claim to any innate superiority of taste or genius over those of antient Italy. If the Romans showed such incapacity to advance without the aid of the Greeks, under circumstances little less favourable than those in which the Greeks did every thing for themselves, we can have no right to assume that the barbarians who overran the Roman empire, if equally left to themselves, would have done more than the Romans. In both cases there is the same deficiency of native resources, with the same disposition to respond to the stimulus when applied from the proper quarter. Hence the remarkable contrast, that while it is even now matter of dispute whether the most illustrious Greek poets, whose works still form the acknowledged standards of the art of composition, so much as knew the use of letters, the restorers of literature in modern times were men of profound classical learning.

5. The principles of ideal beauty in art or literature, though founded on certain primary laws of harmony and propriety, have no separate existence in themselves, apart from the works in which they are embodied, and which an approved excellence has caused to be adopted as models. Nor is the observance of those principles in individual cases essential to excellence. Power of expression and originality of conception, even under rudely digested forms, still possess

their value. Literary merit accordingly, in this general sense, is far from being peculiar to Greece, or to writers on whom the influence of Greek culture is perceptible. We find much to admire in the literature of various other antient races, of the Hebrews for example, or the Indians ; but we reject their compositions as models for ourselves. The masterpieces of the Greeks, on the other hand, are appreciated, not only for their individual excellence, but for the elementary laws of art which they embody. Further evidence of the exclusively Hellenic origin of these laws exists in the fact, that while they are acknowledged by the reason or critical discernment of other nations, they are not, as a general rule, congenial to their taste. Hence the modern authors most distinguished for originality and power are those who have least conformed to them. Thus Milton is more chaste but less original than Dante, Tasso than Ariosto, Racine than Shakspeare, Canova than Michel Angelo.¹ It is only where, in the same individual or the same people, the dictates of natural taste lead to a spontaneous coincidence, that both elements of perfection can be united. Among the Greeks alone this happy union is to be found, for their purest standards of style are also their noblest productions of original genius.

digenous in Greece, exotics in all other regions? They consist in the just blending of force and elegance, of symmetry and variety; in the adaptation to the several departments of composition, in prose or verse, of their proper style, limits, and class of subjects, so as to avoid the opposite extremes of meagreness or diffuseness, or the offensive collision of heterogeneous elements. They require, especially in works of a higher class, that happy relation of parts and unity of whole, which alone can insure grandeur of effect; order and perspicuity in the general distribution of the subject; and a just mixture of conciseness and amplitude in the details. In poetry they consist in that triple rule, so finely laid down by Milton, that it should be "simple, sensuous, passionate," in idealising its subjects, without sacrifice of their truth and reality; in the distinction between elevation and bombast, fervour and extravagance, in the ebullitions of passion; between richness and profusion in embellishment or imagery. These excellencies may often be found individually exemplified in the productions of nations to whom the influence of Greek culture has not extended; but never united, still less reduced to system, by the spontaneous practice of native authors and the approval of the native public.

Throughout the above remarks, a distinction has been made between the terms Principles and Rules. While in the elegant arts, as in justice and morality, there are certain fundamental laws, of universal application, the particular rules in each case may, and ought, to vary with the difference of time, place, and circumstance. However excellent may be the principles inculcated in the Greek standards, as their substance resolves itself into a general observance of propriety, it follows that an adherence to any specific rule or practice of Greek art, where the circumstances in which it originated no longer obtain, may be in as plain opposition to Greek principles, as the wildest aberrations of barbaric genius. A servile adherence to the letter rather than the spirit of antient usage has been productive, accordingly, of many injurious effects in modern literature. For example, the principles of tragic composition transmitted by the Greeks are: that the subject should be dignified in itself, and possess a hold on the sympathies of the audience; that the characters should be conceived in the spirit of the age and state of society from which they are derived; that the action should be perspicuous and united, not overloaded with personages or incidents; and that grotesque admixtures of heterogeneous materials should be avoided. These are laws invariable in themselves, and applicable to the higher class of dramatic composition in every country. The specific rules of Greek tragedy, on the other hand, the rigid adherence to the unities of time and place, the preference of mythological subjects, the employment of a chorus, and others connected with peculiarities, social or religious, under which the Greek drama was matured, have been found inept or incongruous on the modern stage.

6. It has been customary, in certain recent schools of criticism, to justify the irregularities of great modern writers, as reflecting the genius of the age or country in which they flourished. As a general rule, no doubt, literary works must be judged with reference to the circumstances under which they were produced. But this rule is subject, like others, to exception, or it would strike at the root of all critical distinction. What is in itself faulty may be palliated, but can never become excellent by any force of circumstances. The same law applies in literature and art as in morals or politics. What would be enormities in the conduct of an English gentleman might hardly provoke censure in an Arab sheikh or a Turkish aga. In like manner, the inflated style which we call Oriental is congenial to the taste and character of the Eastern nations; and this, by imparting to it a certain interest of association, renders it less offensive than in European literature: but no such consideration can ever render it an excellence; otherwise the quaint doggerel of the middle age chronicle might contest the palm with the narrative of Hume or Robertson. In the same critical school, modern composition has been divided into two branches, under the titles of classical and romantic. The characteristics of the former are defined as a greater or less adherence to the Aristotelian unities, with a general preference of subjects or imagery borrowed from antient history or mythology. The romantic style, on the other hand, derives its materials from modern history, or treats them rather according to the dictates of national taste than to theoretical rules of propriety. The distinction is in itself ingenious and well founded. Not so, however, the inference with which it is usually coupled: that the Principles by which each style is, or ought to be, guided are different; as if there were a species of literary excellence essentially distinct from what the Greeks have taught us. The principles of Hellenic art are of universal application, to the literature of Italy or Spain, of France or of England; and, however the admirers of the romantic school may profess to disregard or repudiate them, still, if its own productions be impartially tested by them, its merits will be found to be in unison, its defects as surely at variance, with what they inculcate.¹

For example, the properties to be chiefly admired in the romantic drama, subjects derived from indigenous sources, spirited portraiture of character, and vivid representation of passion and feeling, are all in strict harmony with the laws of classical composition. Its defects, again, the little regard for unity of action, and entire contempt for that of time or place; the confusion of incidents, inconsistencies of geography or chronology, and burlesque admixture of the serious and ludicrous, are plain violations of the laws, not merely of Hellenic, but of all elegant art. While, on the other hand, the merits of the modern classical drama consist chiefly in the absence of those blemishes which disfigure its rival, its own defects are owing mainly to a slavish observance of the letter, in breach of the spirit, of the rules by which it professes to be guided.

7. The literary historian must not, however, be led, by any partiality for his own subject, to underrate the intellectual culture of other times, as compared with that which it is his immediate province to treat. Nor, certainly, is such the object, or, if rightly estimated, the general tendency, of the above remarks. The distinguishing characteristics of an age or nation cannot be fully appreciated but by the contrast of parallel cases, in which the same phenomena are either wanting or exhibited in a different form. We have hence been led to compare the fundamental features of Hellenic literature, its purity and originality, with the equally fundamental feature of modern culture, its spirit of imitation. But this advantage on the side of the Greeks, is well counterbalanced by the superiority of our own state of society in amount and variety of attainment: nor can there be a stronger proof how finely the springs which regulate the progress of human events work together, than the fact, that to the absence of those very causes which operated so favourably in the case of the Hellenes much of that superiority may be traced. The same exclusive national feeling, and conscious intellectual power, which concentrated and sharpened the inventive faculties of the Greeks, by leading them, at the same time, to condemn all other nations as barbarians, tended to stifle or to blunt that zeal for historical research which might otherwise have been expected from their acute and speculative disposition. On the other hand, the very obligation under which the modern nations were placed, in rearing their own social fabric on a classical basis, to study other tongues, and investigate the affairs of other countries and ages, has been the primary source of that enlargement of ideas which distinguishes our literary culture from the exclusive system of the Greeks. To this obligation is due, more especially, the spirit of enlightened philological pursuit, altogether peculiar to modern times, the benefits of which, in every department of science, are incalculable. The invidious line of distinction between Greek and Barbarian has been succeeded by the establishment of one great intellectual commonwealth; the subdivision of which into separate provinces, differing in language and political interests, but united by a common zeal in the pursuit of knowledge has produced effects in Europe at large analogous to those above traced in Hellas to the subdivision of her tribes and dialects. It has fomented a spirit of enlightened rivalry, where all are as anxious to excel as ready to rejoice in the success of others. Scientific investigation has been directed into new channels entirely shut up from the ancients; and the lives of large classes of men, with large portions of national wealth, are devoted to the cultivation of the language, literature, and arts, not only of Greece and Rome, but of every other nation with which geographical discovery or antiquarian research has made us acquainted.

Each state of society, therefore, has its own proper privileges and advantages, and those which the present enjoys are undoubtedly greater and more varied than ever fell to the lot of any other: a purer system of religion and morals, clearer views of the rights and liberties of man, and a far greater proficiency in all the arts of real utility or necessity. Contented with these our just claims to preeminence, we may safely concede to the Greeks those which, with equal right, appertain to them: originality of inventive genius, purity of taste, and an intuitive perception of the beautiful and the sublime in imaginative art, peculiar to themselves among the nations either of ancient or modern times.

ACCREDITED WORKS OF THIS PERIOD.

1. THAT metrical composition should have preceded prose by several centuries in Greece may, on first view, appear a reversal of the natural order of invention. The more simple and spontaneous mode of expression ought, it might seem, to take precedence of the more studied and complicated. Experience, however, proves the contrary to have been the case wherever the progress of literary culture has remained free from external or artificial influences; and a little reflexion will show that such is the natural course of things. The faculties through which literary talent is exercised or appreciated are twofold, the Fancy and the Judgement; the former of which is always in the ascendant in the primitive stages of society. Literary productions therefore, in order to command the attention of a simple people, must entertain and excite rather than instruct. But the language of colloquial discourse possesses in itself no peculiar charm; and that refinement of it which constitutes elegant prose, with the taste for its enjoyment, belongs to a more advanced stage of social culture. To captivate the fancy alone, it has been found necessary to embellish the language of common life, by combining the ideal dignity of expression and sentiment which constitutes the substance of poetry, with the harmonious cadence of metrical numbers which constitutes its form.

But, in the infancy of society, other circumstances conspired to render rhythm not only an agreeable, but an essential element of popular composition. The essence of all literature is permanence. Without this, the highest efforts of genius in prose or verse were mere transitory effusions, like the fireside tale of wonder, or the burst of occasional oratory to which excited feelings give vent in the ordinary intercourse of life. When preserved and transmitted, those efforts first assume the character of literary monuments. But, even if prose composition were to the taste of a barbarous age, its transmission, by the aid of memory alone, would be scarcely possible, or would require an exertion to which no primitive people could be expected to submit. Rhythm, on the other hand, both facilitates the task of committing to memory, and affords such aid to the powers of retention, as to supply the place of writing in the absence or little prevalence of that art. Hence it will be found that, among all barbarous nations, the first literary productions are of the metrical order: whether hymns in praise of their gods, or epic poems recording the genealogy and exploits of their heroes.

Poetry then is the basis of all intellectual culture. It is the first step by which our nature raises itself above the physical impulses to which we are subject in common with the lower order of creation, the first attempt to embody thought in a connected and permanent form ; and it were difficult, probably, to discover any race of men so nearly on a level with the brutes, that some species of ballad or song has not been current among them. The origin of this art therefore, among the Greeks, may be considered as coëval with their existence. Its higher cultivation, however, can only be dated from the epoch when the establishment of Hellenic ascendancy had imparted consistency and permanence to a national language, and provided subjects calculated to awaken a nobler vein of poetical inspiration.

Every art, in its earliest state, must be assumed to exist in its simplest form, and limited to its most elementary objects. The simplest forms of the poetical art are the Epic and Lyric; the one describing the actions, the other descanting on the praises of the objects celebrated. Attention will be directed to the special properties of each, and their respective claims to priority or importance, in connexion with the more strictly historical period of their cultivation, where the existence of real works and authors offers tangible material for commentary. The poems of either class which the Greek legends ascribed to the primitive bards were chiefly of a religious tendency. It seems, however, more probable, that in this, as in every subsequent period, human affairs supplied the principal subjects of celebration. A few Pæans, or sacrificial hymns, would suffice for the service of the deity or his altars; but the calls of human vanity would be less easily satisfied. Those legends may, however, possess historical value, as figurative of that union between poetry and priesthood which characterises all primeval civilisation. Poetry was not only the vehicle by which invocations were addressed to the gods, and oracular edicts, or moral and religious maxims to the people, but was itself considered a species of divine inspiration. While, therefore, poets were likely to become priests and prophets, men of superior intellect would, even where not naturally favoured by the Muses, be led to cultivate the poetical art, as a means of securing influence over their fellow-citizens. Music and poetry were also, among the primitive Greeks, inseparably connected. Hence, in their traditions, the character of poet is usually found to combine those of musician, priest, prophet, and sage. Even in the more recent historical form in which it appears in the page of Homer, the office of bard is identified on some occasions with that of sage or counsellor.¹

Thrace and Thracians
of the
age.

2. Several of the earliest and most celebrated of these gifted personages, Orpheus, Thamyris, Eumolpus, and others, are in the popular legend designated Thracians. To this account, taken by the letter, as referring to the nation familiarly bearing that title, importance has been attached by the school of critics who derive all the elementary civilisation of Greece from foreign sources. On the admission that these minstrels really were Thracians in the above sense, we must assume, as essential to the performances recorded of them, either that Thrace was formerly inhabited by a Greek population, or that the poets themselves, if foreigners, possessed a perfect knowledge of the Greek tongue. In the former case their foreign origin would consist but in name. The latter view, on the other hand, coupled with the extensive influence ascribed to them, would imply a great superiority of the Thracians of those days over the Hellenes in elementary culture.

That a few solitary individuals, travelling into a foreign land, should have thoroughly mastered its language, and founded a national school of poetry and music, were scarcely credible, unless the arts which they taught had already reached a comparatively advanced stage in their own country. But the whole tenor of authentic history repudiates the notion of any such precocity among the indigenous tribes of Thrace. They were, in every historical age, a proverbially barbarous people, and their language a barbarous tongue, with as little pretension to literature as they themselves to taste for its cultivation. It seems incredible therefore that the Hellenes, a people surpassing all others in brilliancy of inventive genius, could have been indebted for the improvement of their own language, and the first rudiments of the art of composition, to a foreign race who were never able to advance a step in the same direction at home. These considerations tend to destroy the whole value of the popular accounts, taking the terms Thrace and Thracian in their familiar sense.

Among the more plausible attempts to solve the Pieria. difficulty is the hypothesis, that the Thrace alluded to in these fables was the district of Pieria, situated on the north, or Macedonian side of Mount Olympus, and in so far comprehended within the limits of Thrace in the wider sense of the term.¹ This district, bordering on the sanctuary of the Hellenic Jove, and a favourite seat of Apollo and the Muses, may reasonably be supposed to have been possessed in these times by a Hellenic population, spreading over both sides of the divine mountain. But the case admits of another, and perhaps more satisfactory explanation. It is certain that, in the mythical geography, a tract of country on the frontiers of Bœotia and Phocis, comprehending Mounts Parnassus and Helicon, bore the name of Thrace. In this region the popular mythology also lays the scene of several of the most celebrated adventures the heroes of which are called Thracians. In the fable of Itys and Philomela, Tereus, king of Thrace, marries Procne, daughter of Pandion king of Athens: but his court and palace, with the tragical events that followed, are placed in Phocis. On this apparent anomaly Thucydides, in allusion to an Odrysian chief of his own time, called Teres, has the following commentary¹: "This Teres has no connexion whatever with the Tereus who married Pandion's daughter, nor were they natives of the same Thrace; for the antient Tereus dwelt in Daulia, in the country now called Phocis, but then inhabited by Thracians. It was, indeed, more probable that Pandion should form an alliance with a neighbouring chief, than that he should have sought a husband for his daughter at a great distance among the Odrysians." This remark equally applies to Orpheus and the other supposed Helleno-Thracian bards. It is more probable that the Greeks should have sought their early poets and musicians within the bosom of their own country, than among northern barbarians. The connexion, in this elegant fable², of the nightingale with the

² The version of it, however, here preferred by Thucydides is evidently of later Attic origin. In the legend of Homer, the name of the metamorphosed heroine's father is Pandareüs, Atticised in Thucydides into Pandion; that of her husband, Zethus. Odys. τ. 518.

Hellenic Thrace, is in itself an obvious figure of an early preeminence of that region in poetry and song.

In this way may be elucidated various other Nysa. Thracian chapters of Hellenic mythology. The worship of Bacchus, a Bœotian deity, is described as having met with great opposition in his native province. Among its fiercest opponents was Lycurgus, designated king of Thrace, but who is evidently, like Pentheus in the same series of fables, a type of the resistance offered by the Bœotian chiefs to the spread of those extravagant orgies. The "divine Nyseian mountain" therefore, down which Homer¹ describes the God with his attendants as pursued by Lycurgus, and which the license of later mythology has transferred, not only to the barbarous Thrace, but to Syria, Arabia, India, and elsewhere², is to be sought at Nysa, a district of Mount Helicon, to which Homer applies the title of "preeminently divine,"³ and where there was, in later times, a sanctuary of the God.⁴ Pausanias⁵, while expressing the same opinion as Thucydides regarding the Thrace over which Tereus held sway, also makes the "Thracian" bard Thamyras virtually a Phocian. He assigns him for mother a nymph of Parnassus called Argiope. His father Philammon is described as a native of the same region, son of Apollo by the nymph Chione, and brother of Autolycus, its celebrated robber chieftain.¹ The divine grandsire is obviously here but a figure of his own sacred region; the grandmother Chione, as her name bears, of its snow. Others call the latter heroine Leuconoë.² The names of these heroines, Leuconoë, Argiope, Chionis, are all but so many varied modes of typifying the same "snow-white" Parnassus. This view of the "Thracian" character of these sages becomes the more plausible, if it be remembered that the region of Central Greece, in which the Hellenic Thrace was situated, is that from which, first or chiefly, the seeds of elementary culture were propagated throughout the nation. Here tradition places the first introduction of the alphabet. Here were also the principal seats of Apollo and the Muses. In the heart of the same region was situated the Minyeian Orchomenus, the temple of the Graces, rivalling Thebes herself in the splendour of her princes and zeal for the promotion of art. Among the early masters of poetry or music, not vulgarly styled Thracians, the most illustrious, Amphion and Linus, are Bœotians. Nor was this region of Central Greece less favoured in respect of its religious institutions. It was not only the favourite seat of Apollo, the Muses, and the Graces, but the native country of the Dionysiac rites, zeal for the propa-

The remaining particulars of the birth of Thamyris appear to be inventions of later fabulists, to account for the anomaly of a Phocian poet being also a Thracian. His mother Argiope, it is said, disowned and persecuted by her seducer, took refuge, when pregnant, among the Odrysians. "Hence," says Pausanias, "how Thamyris came to be called a Thracian." — iv. xxxiii.

While, therefore, the adoption of either a Pierian or a Phocian Thrace, as the birthplace of the earliest school of Greek poetry, obviates the difficulty of its barbaric origin, the hypothesis of some closer bond of connexion between the population of the two districts is also favoured by the fact of each containing one of the two most celebrated sanctuaries of the Muses, and by the correspondence in each between the names of several principal localities.¹

3. In the list of fabulous Greek poets or musicians, the most illustrious names are those of Amphion, Orpheus, Philammon, Eumolpus, Musæus, Pamphos, Linus, Thamyris, Olen, Olympus. The biography of these mysterious personages belongs to the Greek mythology, rather than to the history of Grecian literature. A short notice will here suffice of the principal legends concerning them, and of their imputed

The name Thrace is itself a significant term, indicating the geographical character of each district, a substantive form, namely, of the adjective Trachea (τραχέα), "rugged," by the customary enallage of the mute and aspirate letters. This epithet, in whichever of its varieties suited the local dialect, was precisely that by which a rocky wooded mountain district, bounded by a tract of fertile plain, would be designated, as contrasted with the vale or champaign country below. Thus the Parnassian, or Heliconian Thrace was the mountain region bounding the Boeotian plain; the Olympian, or Pierian Thrace was that to the north of the still wider plain of Thessaly, whence the name afterwards spread to the whole region lying north of Hellas; just as the term Asia spread from a single valley of Lydia to the whole great eastern continent, or that of Italia from a small corner of Magna Græcia to the entire Italian peninsula. Another mountain region on the southern frontier of Thessaly was named, with slight dialectical variety, Trachis; and various other districts, in different parts of Greece, received the same or similar appellatives from the same natural peculiarity.

influence on their favourite branches of composition.¹ To the first eight in the list a Hellenic, or, what is equivalent, a Thracian character belongs. The last two names, Olen of Lycia and Olympus of Phrygia, figure the influence of the neighbouring Asiatic school of music on that of Greece.

Amphion.

Amphion is described by Homer² as son of Jupiter, by Antiope, daughter of Asopus the chief river of Bœotia, and, with his brother Zetus, as founder and fortifier of Thebes the Bœotian metropolis. These notices entitle him to rank as the most antient Helleno-Pelasgian patriarch of that district. Cadmus consequently must be considered in Homer's legend, not as the founder, but as the later colonist of Thebes. The infancy and early youth of Amphion, owing to circumstances connected with the mystery of his birth, were passed in the obscurity of a shepherd's hut on mount Cithæron. Here he attracted the notice of Apollo, from whom, or in other accounts from Mercury or the Muses, he received the gift of a lyre, with so brilliant a faculty of using it, as to have collected the stones for the building of his city, and raised them to their places in the walls, by the fascination of his music.³ This the interpreters of fable expound, aptly enough, as signifying that, by the persuasive eloquence of his muse, he induced his countrymen,

4. The traditions concerning Orpheus, with a Orpheus. greater popularity in the later mythology, have less the character of genuine archaic legend than those relative to Amphion and some other of his fellow-bards. It is remarkable, considering the lustre which has since attended this name, that no mention of it should occur in Homer, Hesiod, or other most antient poetical authorities.³ Whilst Amphion represents the popular genius of primeval poetry, Orpheus may be considered as the type of its religious or sacerdotal element. Accordingly, the mystical school of composition which sprang up towards the commencement of the Attic period of literature, simultaneously with a new and abstruse philosophy, connected itself inseparably with his name as its mythical founder. The works which passed vulgarly current in Plato's time as Hymns of the "Thracian" bard were probably some of the more esteemed productions of Onomacritus, Cercops, and other scholars of the time of the Pisistratidæ, celebrated for the concoction of such spurious compositions.¹ What may have been the primitive germ or spirit of the Orphic poetry, contemplated even in this light, it were fruitless to speculate, owing to the number and heterogeneous nature of the doctrines² embodied in the mass of mystical effusions afterwards comprised under the same title. The increasing celebrity of Orpheus, as inventor of the sacred or sacerdotal hymn, led to his becoming a sort of popular type of the lyric poetry at large of the mythical age. The legends concerning the marvellous influence of his art on gods, men, and animals, in the various adventures where, with even more than the usual contempt for consistency which characterises mythical chronology, he is made to figure, especially during the Argonautic expedition, surpass in number and extravagance those narrated of any other Greek minstrel.³

According to the general outline of these traditions, Orpheus was son of the muse Calliope and of Œagrus, a Thracian river god, or some other equally mysterious father, and disputes with Amphion the merit of first instructing his countrymen in the use of the lyre. That the Thrace possessing the most equitable claim to his nativity was the Pierian region, appears as well from the occurrence of a Pierus in the list of his ancestors¹, as from his Thracian tomb² (for various other countries claimed one) being shown within its bounds. His descent to Hades in search of his mistress Eurydice, where he lulled Cerberus to sleep, bewitched the inhabitants of the gloomy region, and softened the stern bosom of its sovereign by the melody of his notes, with the subsequent sad termination of his amorous adventures, forms an elegant and pathetic chapter in the book of classical fiction. The fury of the Thracian Mænads, to which he fell a sacrifice, is attributed in the more accredited legend³ to his opposition to the Dionysiac mysteries, for which Pentheus, Lycurgus, and other heroes of the Hellenic Thrace were similarly punished. In other accounts he is represented as instrumental to the establishment of the same Bacchanalian ceremonies.⁴ At his death his head and lyre, floating down the Hebrus, were conveyed beyond sea to the shore of Lesbos⁵, where they were preserved and cherished as the source of the brilliant flow of lyric composition for which that island was distinguished. This tradition is an evident figure of the passage of lyric genius, with the Æolian migration, from the western to the eastern shore of the Ægæan ; and may also seem further to illustrate the connexion between the Pierian and the Bœotian Thrace, the latter being the mother country of those colonies.

Philammon.

Philammon of Delphi was son of Apollo and the Parnassian nymph Chione, and father of the "Thracian" Thamyris. He was the reputed founder of the first musical solemnity at Delphi, and author of a hymn on the birth of Apollo, as also of various musical compositions. He was also distinguished as a warrior in defence of the Pythian sanctuary against an assault of the Phlegyans.¹

Thamyris.

Thamyris, his son by the nymph Argiope, and whose Parnasso-Thracian origin has already been illustrated, is chiefly celebrated for the adventure recorded of him by Homer.² Having challenged the Muses to a competition in his favourite art, and being defeated, he was punished for his presumption by the loss, not only of his poetical talent, but of his eyesight.

Eumolpus.

5. Eumolpus and Musæus, like Orpheus and Thamyris familiarly designated Thracians, act a prominent part in Athenian fable. The former, in the more popular accounts, was son of Neptune and the nymph Chione, already mentioned as mother of the Parnassian Philammon, but here described as an Attic, not a Parnassian heroine.³ After various youthful adventures, Eumolpus appears as a powerful "Thracian" sovereign, ally of Eleusis, then an independent state, in a war with Erechtheus king of Athens.¹ He is also made, in the sequel of this legend, founder of the Eleusinian mysteries, and ancestor of the sacerdotal family of Eumolpidæ, who, both in Athens and Eleusis, enjoyed the chief superintendence of the solemnity. . This account, however, is by no means in harmony with that of the Homeric hymn to Ceres, a mythical authority of much prior age to those whence the above details are derived. In that poem Eumolpus is described as a patriarchal chief of Eleusis, who, with four other leaders of the local aristocracy, affords hospitality to the goddess in her wanderings, in gratitude for which she appoints their city the depositary of her sacred rites. Several works, in epic measure it would appear, passed current under his name, on subjects connected with the worship of both Ceres and Bacchus.²

Musæus is variously designated son of Orpheus, Musæus. Linus, and Eumolpus.³ Of the latter he is also occasionally made the father, while his only recorded mother is Selene, or the moon.⁴ He usually ranks as a Thracian, sometimes however, from his fame and influence being chiefly connected with Attica, as an Athenian. His name, derived from that of the Muses, seems an obvious type of the early influence of those goddesses upon Athens. Visionary as his own person may be, the poems attributed to Musæus assume a definite reality at an earlier period than those of any other author of the same class. From Herodotus¹ we learn that a collection of them, apparently of an oracular character, was extant in the time of the Pisistratidæ; and that Onomacritus, one of the literary clients of that family, was banished by Hipparchus for surreptitiously inserting among them compositions of his own. The spurious additions, however, seem to have enjoyed a greater popularity and permanence than the original works; for Pausanias² considered all the poems current in his time under the name of Musæus, with the exception of a single hymn to Ceres, as forgeries of Onomacritus. The most specific account of the religious creed of Musæus is a statement of Plato³, that he made the happiness of the blessed in Elysium to consist in perpetual feasting and intoxication, a doctrine which certainly affords no very favourable impression of his system, either of morality or religion. His mythical dignity receives an important accession from the honours paid him by Virgil⁴, who represents him in the Shades surrounded by a crowd of disciples, his authority over whom is figured by the superior height of his stature. This seems to imply that the Latin poet attributed a greater extent or reality to his influence, owing probably to his connexion with Athens, than to that of the other sages or civilisers of primitive Greece.

Pamphos.

Pamphos, of whose nativity no notice has been transmitted, is sometimes associated with Orpheus, sometimes with Musæus, in the exercise of his poetical functions, the chief scene of which, as in the case of the latter poet, was Attica. Hymns attributed to him, in honour of Jove, Ceres, Diana, Neptune, Cupid, and the Graces, were sung in the Eleusinian rites, in conjunction with those ascribed to Olen and Orpheus.¹

haps, the one in whose favour even the popular accounts advance the slenderest claim to real personality, while the agency of which he is the symbol displays itself in the most palpable forms. In his symbolic capacity he appears as the Eponyme genius of plaintive music. His name, in the same symbolic sense, was common to a mournful song or ode performed in his honour, which will demand its due share of attention in a future chapter on the Orders of Greek lyric composition.² Any further details therefore, relative to himself or his art, will be reserved for that portion of our subject.

the list, are the only two, setting aside the letter of the Thracian legend, to whom tradition assigns a foreign origin. The former, who ranks as the earliest and most illustrious priest and poet of the Delian Apollo, is variously designated a Lycian and a Hyperborean. The Lycian version of his origin seems the more antient, being that adopted by the older authorities who notice him. In his sacerdotal character he may be claimed equally by both nations, as representing certain mysterious elements of Apollo's worship, connected on the one hand with the coast of Lycia, on the other with some undefined region of Northern Europe.¹ The Lycian Olen was considered by Herodotus as author of the more antient hymns performed in the Delian festivals; and at Delphi the same honour was assigned him in his Hyperborean character.² Bœo, a celebrated priestess of that sanctuary, pronounces him, in two oracular lines, to be not only the most antient of Apollo's prophets, but of all poets, and inventor of the hexameter verse, the foundation of Hellenic poetry.³ His hymns were also sung in the Eleusinian festival.⁴ This reputed influence of the Lycian poet on the sacred music of Greece, is indirectly figured in other primitive traditions of a connexion between the two countries and their Apollo worship. In the Iliad Apollo appears as an essentially Lycian god, patron both of Lycia Proper and of another tribe of Lycians on the Hellespont. Among his Lycian attributes, one of the most prominent was that of "Lycean," or "Wolf-Apollo," embodying the more terrible features of his character. Under this title he was also worshipped in the Argolis⁵; and the coincidence stands in close connexion with other local legends, embodied by Homer in his episode of Prætus and Bellerophon, concerning an intercourse between Lycia and the Argolis in mythical times. The remarkable monuments of primeval sculpture and architecture, still extant at Mycenæ in the latter region, and bearing obvious reference to the rites of Apollo⁶, were

The Asiatic origin of Olympus², or of the art he represents, is still more plainly indicated in the fables concerning him, than that of Olen in the Lycian legend. The chief or only musical instrument in early popular use in Greece, and at all times that most congenial to Hellenic taste, was the lyre, or harp. The flute enjoyed an equal preference among the nations of Asia Minor, from which country it was first brought into more general practice in Europe. The accredited author of its introduction was Olympus, who stands alone accordingly, among his Hellenic fellow-minstrels, in his preference of wind to string instruments. His birth-place is variously assigned to Phrygia, Mysia, and Lydia, but his reputed master in musical science, Marsyas the Phrygian, seems to connect him chiefly with the former region. The Greeks, however, distinguished two Olympi : the fabulous musician of the ante-Homeric period, and a real artist of the same name and country in later times, to whom, as will more fully appear hereafter³, were ascribed many author of this work. He is now convinced, however, that the lost heads of the animals sculptured on the gate of Mycenæ were those of lions, not wolves, as he had once conjectured. He has been led to this conviction chiefly by the near resemblance of style which he has observed between the Lycian lions recently lodged in the British Museum and those of Mycenæ, especially by the extreme smallness of the head, which forms so marked a characteristic of the Lycian figures. This latter peculiarity, while proving that there would have been room for the heads of the Mycenæan lions, if of similar dimensions, in the space allotted them, supplies also an additional evidence of the connexion between the two schools of primitive art. Other still more pointed evidence of this connexion is traceable in the decorative architectural details of the monuments of each country ; upon which, however, this is not the place to enlarge.

of the more important inventions in the higher branches of music. The elder Olympus, therefore, may be considered but as a mythical reflexion of his real successor, called into existence to impart archaic dignity to an art of comparatively recent cultivation in Greece.

Bacchus.

7. It is remarkable that, while Apollo is at all periods of Greek tradition the patron deity of poetry and music, the legends of these primitive composers connect them chiefly with the worship of Ceres or with the kindred rites of Dionysus. This is the case with Orpheus, Musæus, Eumolpus, Pamphos, Thamyris, and probably Linus. In respect to Amphion and Olympus no special preference is recorded. Olen is the only one of higher celebrity who appears as an unqualified devotee of Apollo. The other legendary minstrels connected with the worship of that god, such as Philammon of Delphi and Chrysothemis of Crete, founders of the Pythian chorus, or Phemonoë the Pythoness, who disputed with Olen the invention of the hexameter verse, are of inferior and local fame. This peculiarity is explained by the circumstance, that the Dionysiac and Eleusinian rites were more immediately connected with those rural and agricultural festivities, which in all ages first acquire public importance and popularity.¹ It was natural therefore, that in the general tendency of Greek tradition to combine the early efforts of elegant art with religious ceremonial, the patron deities of those festivities should enjoy a priority, more especially in Central Greece, where religious poetry appears chiefly to have flourished. The whole of that region teems, in the popular mythology, with the turbulent enthusiasm of the Bacchic and Eleusinian orgies, so favourable to the flights of lyric inspiration. The musical rites of Apollo seem, in Greece itself, to have been first indebted for their higher culture to his Dorian worshippers. The only spot where they appear with any degree of lustre in mythical times is Delos, where Olen asserts accordingly the honour of his patron deity.

Another inference suggested by this catalogue of primitive authors is the early ascendancy of Æolian genius in poetry and music. With the exception of the two foreigners, Olen and Olympus, they all, whether as Thracians in the sense above illustrated, or as Bœotians, belong to the Æolian family. Circumstances already noticed tended, it is true, in the course of national advancement, to obtain for the dialect of the Ionians a certain preference as the language of poetry; yet, as regards individual authors even in that dialect, it will be found that, while the influence of several of those fabulous Æolo-Thracian minstrels is described as chiefly exercised at Athens, a central seat of the purest Ionism, or in Peloponnesus¹, the later Æolians claim the honour of giving birth to both Homer and Hesiod, to the latter indisputably, to the former by a large preponderance of evidence. This priority, both as to invention and excellence, is maintained throughout the whole of the poetical period, in the more ideal branches of composition, musical and poetical, by Terpander, Arion, Alcæus, Sappho, and Stesichorus. In those branches which connect themselves more nearly with the objects and interests of real life, the Elegy and Iambus, for example, the more subtle and reflective Ionian genius, in the muse of Archilochus, Callinus, and Simonides, asserts its superiority.

Slender as may be the claims of these legendary bards to a substantial personality, they may at least be considered as representing the early improvers of Grecian poetry, who paved the way for the perfection in which it appears in the page of Homer. As their talents are reputed to have been so largely devoted to the service of the altar, it might seem natural, among a people so studious of antient religious observance, that some of their more esteemed compositions in honour of popular deities should, by the priesthood of the sanctuaries, have been secured a chance of permanent preservation. That works under the name of Musæus existed in the time of Pisistratus has already been stated. Herodotus also mentions hymns of Olen, and Plato¹ cites passages of Orpheus with apparent confidence. Aristotle² however, a higher authority in such matters, while recording his disbelief, not only of the genuine character of the poems attributed to Orpheus, but of their accredited author's existence, ascribes them to one Cercops, a Pythagorean philosopher, or to the same Onomacritus above noticed as the falsifier of Musæus. He quotes the poems of Musæus in one place without comment, in another as his reputed compositions.³ Plato cites them frequently⁴, and without qualification. As to the works now extant under any of the above titles, their own internal evidence has led modern scholars to a unanimous conviction of their comparatively recent origin. Even with the popular public in the best epochs of Greek literature, the names of these mythical poets were seldom seriously connected with poems of greater extent or variety of character than a few hymns, metrical oracles, and didactic pieces, moral or sacred. The longer, more elaborate compositions, such as the Argonautica and Lithica, vulgarly ascribed to Orpheus, seem first to have obtained their spurious honours at a very low period, for the history of which consequently, such critical notice as they demand will be reserved.

POETICAL PERIOD.—EPIC POETRY.

CHAP. I.

INTRODUCTION.

1. CHARACTERISTICS OF THE POETICAL PERIOD. EPIC AND LYRIC STYLES ALONE CULTIVATED.—2. THEIR DEFINITION AND ORIGIN.—3. WORKS COMPRISED UNDER EACH HEAD.—4. PROPOSED MODE OF TREATMENT.

Characteristics of the

1. THE period treated in the following book extends from Homer, or the origin of the Homeric poems, down to the LVth Olympiad (560 B.C.), the epoch at which Pisistratus usurped supreme power at Athens. It has been styled poetical, because the works it produced, in so far as known to fame, belong exclusively to that style of composition. It might also not improperly, in contradistinction to the purely mythical era, be entitled historical, as treating of living works, and authors advancing a solid claim to real personality.

Although prose writing must have been more or less generally practised, during this period, for purposes of utility or necessity, the notices of any attempts towards its cultivation as a branch of popular literature are obscure and doubtful. Its origin will, therefore, form more appropriate matter of investigation at the future stage of this history where it asserts an equality with the sister Muse, or even an ultimate ascendancy, in popularity and influence.

The whole poetical literature of Greece was familiarly classed by the native critics under three comprehensive heads: Epic, Lyric, and Dramatic. The compositions of this period fall to be considered under the two former alone; the Drama, like prose writing, being yet so completely in its infancy as not to supply material for a separate subdivision.

Epic and lyric styles alone cultivated.

2. The term Epic, in its literal acceptation, denotes what is narrated or recited; Lyric, what is sung to the lyre. This, however, like some other similar distinctions invented at a later stage of the arts to which they apply, will be found defective in regard to the origin or more flourishing epochs of those arts. Epic poems were, during the earlier and better days of Greek heroic minstrelsy, chanted to an instrumental accompaniment little less habitually than lyric odes. The latter epithet might therefore, in so far, appear as applicable to the Iliad and Odyssey as to a song of Sappho or an elegy of Mimnermus. The distinction is, however, justified even in its extension to this early period, by the more artificial nature of the accompaniment, and the more vital connexion between the music and the words, in the one than the other case. This may be illustrated by the analogy of the Italian opera, where the recitative, with its few harmonious chords struck at appropriate intervals, stands to the aria in a relation similar to that of the epic to the lyric department of Greek poetry.¹ The nicer distinction of terms may have originated about the period when lyric composition first acquired importance as a branch of cultivated literature ; epic poetry being then on the decline, and the practice of its musical recital gradually falling into disuse.¹

The origin of both styles is lost in the mists of antiquity. The earliest efforts in each are probably simultaneous, in every imaginative people, with the first steps in civilisation. The rudest attempt to embody in an attractive form the narrative of an interesting event was an epic poem. The first simple effusion of praise or gratitude to a god or hero was a lyric ode. That both branches were popular in the age of Homer appears from the indirect evidence of his works. To the lyric order belong, in the Iliad, the Pæan, the Dirge or Funeral Lament, and the Hymenæal Chorus²; in the Odyssey, the songs with which Calypso and Circe enliven the labours of their loom.³ Lyric was also the music of the vintage feast, and that which accompanies the dance of Dædalus on the shield of Achilles.⁴ Of the Pæan two varieties may be distinguished. The sacrificial or convivial Pæan⁵, performed at the banquet in honour of the restoration of Chryseïs to her father, appears to have been sung in parts by a chorus of youths, divided into companies and responding to each other. The triumphal or processional Pæan⁶ is sung by the Greek warriors, on their march back to the camp bearing the corpse of Hector. In the Dirge over the body of Hector¹ in the Trojan palace, professional bards officiate as a chorus to the chief mourners, who successively relieve each other in their melancholy functions.

As Epic, on the other hand, may be classed, in the Iliad the celebration by Achilles of the "glorious deeds of men;"² in the Odyssey the narratives of the exploits of Ulysses and other heroes of the Trojan war by the court bards of Scheria and Ithaca. The description of the sack of Troy by Demodocus, as epitomised by Homer³, offers many essential features of a finished epopee.

But although in point of origin these two branches of composition may be classed as coeval, the Epic invariably enjoys a priority of cultivation, wherever the progress of letters, as in Greece, is spontaneous and free from secondary influence. This is a consequence of the more direct medium through which it appeals to the sympathies, as will be made apparent by a somewhat closer definition of the respective properties of the two.

Epic poetry may be defined as essentially historical or descriptive; Lyric poetry as speculative or discursive: the former deals with facts and events, the latter with feelings and opinions.

The mass of mankind however, in all ages, are more interested in the study of facts than of opinions, in listening to accounts of great or marvellous adventures, than to commentaries on the admiration of which they may be deserving. What is here true of the less educated class in every age, applies to the public at large in a primitive state of society. But, besides the pleasure of reciting or hearing, the anxiety to perpetuate constituted another powerful cause of this preference. Epic poetry, apart from its pleasantness, possessed, as the popular chronicle of events, a superior utility to the sister branch of art; and that utility was inseparable from its permanence. There was no similar inducement to preserve an outbreak of enthusiastic emotion relative to a particular person or transaction. Novelty was perhaps, in such cases, more desirable than repetition. The superior credit enjoyed by the Epic Muse with the primitive public is evinced, accordingly, by the fact of her compositions having been preserved, in considerable mass, from a period of antiquity several centuries prior to that of the earliest extant specimens of pure lyric art.

The difference of the mode in which the two styles are embodied corresponds to that of their characters. In the epic an exclusive preference is given to prolonged metrical forms in harmony with the continuity of the narrative. The lyric offers a greater subdivision, and more varied combination of numbers, adapted to its more lively and versatile expression of thought or feeling.

comprised under each head.

3. Under these two general heads of Epic and Lyric have here been comprised various works but partially marked by the proper features on which the distinction above drawn depends, and which might therefore appear, in a more accurate classification, to require a separate allotment. To the Epic head, for example, have been referred the Works and Days of Hesiod, and the Homeric Hymns. The former poem, in a more artificial age of literature, would be assigned to the Didactic rather than the Epic style.

At the period, however, in which this distinction of terms takes its origin, and indeed, more or less, throughout the flourishing ages of Grecian art, the phrase Epic familiarly denotes any descriptive or narrative work, anything told or recited, as distinct from sung or dramatically represented. All poems of the former class were embodied, accordingly, by preference in hexameter verse, as the standard epic rhythm, the employment of which hence became, in its turn, the popular criterion of the epic style of a work. As referred to this test, consequently, the "Works and Days" was an epic poem. The Homeric Hymns, on the other hand, might seem, both in right of their title and their subject, to belong to the Lyric order. The epic character however, in the narrower sense, really predominates in these poems to such an extent as, apart from any technical law of criticism, to warrant the arrangement here adopted. Besides the Hymns, certain other minor hexameter compositions, usually classed, with the Hymns, under the title Homeric, and not devoid of pretensions to respectable antiquity, have, although partaking in no similar degree of the narrative style, been comprehended under the same general denomination of epic poetry.

From deference to a parallel law of custom, various works have been embraced in the Lyric head of subject, which, on a more subtle principle of distinction, might appear to belong more properly to the epic. The Elegiac measure for example, though in its origin and early use familiarly ranked as lyric, was frequently employed in narrative or didactic poems of considerable compass. It may indeed be considered as an intermediate stage between the one style and the other, being compounded of purely dactylic elements, with such modification as was requisite to adapt the old heroic hexameter to compositions of a more fugitive nature. The Iambic trimeter on the other hand, appropriated, during its earlier stages of cultivation, to the same class of poem as the elegy, and like it comprehended under the general head of lyric poetry, possesses epic qualities only inferior to the hexameter. These qualities, combined with a certain rhetorical spirit and smartness peculiar to itself, obtained for it at a later period a preference in dramatic poetry, similar to that enjoyed by the hexameter in the primitive epic minstrelsy.

Upon the above general data therefore, the whole Greek literature of this period may be classed as follows :—

I. Epic composition, comprising, in addition to heroic poems properly so called, every work in hexameter verse possessing reasonable claims to date prior to the LVth Olympiad.

II. Lyric composition, comprising every poetical work not embodied in hexameter verse, and by consequence, the whole elegiac and iambic, in addition to the melic and choral poetry of the period.

! Proposed mode of treatment.

4. Each class will be made the subject of a separate treatment. This mode has here been considered preferable to that of interlacing the contemporary history of different branches, which is sometimes followed in more advanced stages of literature. The connexion between the two, or influence of one upon the other, is indeed comparatively slight. In the earliest times epic poetry was alone cultivated. It had reached its perfection, and was falling into decay, prior to the age from which the oldest specimens of lyric composition have been transmitted. As a general rule each style had its own distinct set of authors, who rarely, if ever, trenched on the province of each other. The maturity and lustre of the elder more dignified Muse had but little effect in promoting, more perhaps in retarding, the progress of her more youthful and sprightly sister. Still less influence had the youth and vigour of the latter in sustaining the old age and decrepitude of her predecessor. The vicissitudes of each were chiefly owing to causes connected with the general progress of society, to be duly considered in their proper place.

Homer,
Hesiod, and
poets.

1. THE oldest monuments of Hellenic minstrelsy extant in historical times were two voluminous bodies of epic poems. The one comprised works in the nobler heroic style, recording great events or enterprises, and characterised by extent of subject and unity of treatment; the other was limited to compositions of narrower scope or inferior order, genealogies of men and gods, narratives of the exploits or adventures of individual heroes, and illustrations, didactic and descriptive, of the affairs of ordinary life. The works of the former class, amid the obscure origin of the greater part of them, passed generally current, together with some minor poems marked by a certain resemblance of manner, under the name of "Homer." Those of the second class, for similar reasons, were in the same general way ascribed to "Hesiod." The remaining epic productions of this period, not properly falling within either denomination, may be comprehended under a third head, of Miscellaneous epic poetry. The claims of the two latter classes, either in respect of their own merits or their influence on Greek literature, are of secondary importance, and must for the present be postponed; those of the former class demand an immediate and extensive share of attention.

At the remotest epoch to which the notices of their existence extend, not only the Iliad and Odyssey, but a large portion of the remaining more elaborate specimens of primitive epic art, were, as already stated, popularly ascribed to "Homer." In the progress, however, of critical inquiry, those two poems obtained, at first in the opinion of more competent judges, afterwards with the Hellenic public at large, an exclusive title to that distinction. The remainder were connected with the names of other early poets, or were classed as anonymous. Their claims to celebrity appear, indeed, to rest as much on the nature of their connexion with their great prototypes, as on their own intrinsic value. If we may judge from the somewhat slender data at our disposal, comparative mediocrity would seem to have been the characteristic of the greater part of them. Neither the whole, nor an integral portion of any one of them, has been preserved, and the passages cited by extant Greek authors from their text are unfortunately but rare and scanty. Their titles, however, with the historical notices of their contents, amounting in various instances to a detailed epitome of their action, show them to have been composed with the view of enlarging and completing the series of legendary annals of which the Iliad and Odyssey had already engrossed two important stages. The Thebaid, Epigoni, and Cypria brought down the history of the Achæan race of warriors, from the epoch at which it first took the lead in the Grecian confederacy, to the opening of the Iliad. The Æthiopis, Lesser Iliad, Ilii Persis, and Nosti, filled up the space between the conclusion of the Iliad and the commencement of the Odyssey. That portion of the whole series of events which the original Homer had treated, was studiously avoided by the authors of these supplementary works. They were not, however, equally respectful towards each other, nor were the limits of their several subjects so accurately marked out as to exclude, in occasional instances, a treatment of the same event in different poems. This whole chain of epic narrative constituted what is called, in later times, the Epic or Homeric Cycle; under which name it is understood to have been indebted for a more methodical redaction to the Alexandrian grammarians. These compilers are supposed, by selecting such among the duplicate chapters as appeared, either in point of merit or continuity of subject, to deserve a preference, and discarding the rest, to have imparted a more complete continuity to the series; which, when so arranged, extended from the origin of things to the generation immediately prior to the Dorian irruption. That event, as formerly remarked, was tacitly adopted, by the courtesy of Greek literature, as the limit between the heroic and historical age.

Assuming as a basis the unanimous judgment of the best native critics, who set apart the Iliad and Odyssey as the only genuine productions of the great original master, around which the remainder were clustered like satellites round two brilliant stars, we shall now enter upon the separate inquiry into their origin and history.

2. Epic poetry, as the reflexion of that twofold instinct of our nature, to perpetuate, and at the same time adorn, the memory of great men or remarkable events, comprehends every species of metrical narrative, from the simplest ballad to the Iliad. The epic poem however in the nobler sense, or Epopee, as it is technically called, represents a more advanced stage of the art. It may be considered as the combination of a number of those insulated subjects into one comprehensive whole.¹ The poet of the one class may be likened to the mason skilled in constructing a wall, chiseling a column, or throwing an arch; of the other, to the architect of a spacious building. Although therefore the Iliad and Odyssey are held, and probably with reason, to be, in their individual capacity, more ancient than the oldest poems ascribed to Hesiod, they represent an order of work of more recent origin. How far their accredited author, even admitting their still disputed claim to original integrity, is entitled to the sole honour of so noble an invention, may be questioned. No art arrives at perfection by a single effort; and there is more truth in the remark of Cicero, that as there were men of valour before Agamemnon, there must have been poems of considerable bulk before the Iliad, than in the more familiar adage of Horace to the opposite effect. That such earlier poems have not been preserved is no argument that none ever existed, or even that they were not worth preserving.

Origin and definition
of the Homeric
epopee.

¹ In this distinction various critics, ancient and modern, would discover a figurative etymology for the name Ὀμηρος, deriving it from δημιον and ἔπος, to combine or connect, as indicating the first accredited author of any such comprehensive epic production. Eustath. ad Il. Proem. p. 4.; conf. Welck. Ep. Cycl. p. 125. sq.; Bode, Gesch. d. Hell. Dichtk. vol. I. p. 259.

If the Demodoci whom Homer celebrates be not real personages, they represent at least a class more ancient than the poet who describes them; and one of them is introduced as author or reciter of a comprehensive and complicated epic poem. The natural effect of the appearance of two such works as the Iliad and Odyssey in a primitive age, when the art of writing was unknown or little practised, would be to supplant, and probably extinguish, those previously current. There was here no remedy for any temporary neglect on the part of the public, and poems once erased from the tablets of the memory were lost for ever.

Of the origin or author of either work, the only authentic source of knowledge is their own text. It seems difficult to understand how, among a people so proverbially studious of the memory of the past, all accurate record of the source to which they were indebted, not only for their most popular work of genius, but for their most esteemed text-book of early history and religious doctrine, should, in the course of a few generations, have become extinct. This appears the more surprising, when we consider that, from the earliest period at which notice occurs of the poems, the veneration in which they are held is accompanied by an equal spirit of curiosity relative to their author. Hence, while their study was the basis of the more elegant branches of literary criticism, the efforts to penetrate the mystery of their origin became the foundation of the historical department of the same art. During five and twenty hundred years this inquiry has occupied the subtlest investigators of every age. On no other similar subject have more strange or conflicting theories been proposed, more voluminous commentaries expended, or a keener spirit of controversy displayed; on none, perhaps, has the lavish exuberance of speculative inquiry been more barren hitherto of positive results.

The usual custom of literary criticism enjoins that the article devoted to each author should commence with some notice of his age, birthplace, and character. The peculiarities of the present subject render it necessary, it need hardly be said, to reverse this order. Homer exists but in his poems. They supply the only authentic materials for his biography. The history of the work must here, therefore, necessarily precede that of the author.

3. The earliest extant allusions to the Iliad and Odyssey are chiefly of an indirect nature, citations namely, or paraphrases, of portions of their text, by poets of more recent date but also of high antiquity. The "Shield of Hercules," ascribed to Hesiod, is borrowed, and in many parts servilely copied, from the episode of the "Arms of Achilles" in the 18th book of the Iliad. On the Chest of Cypselus at Olympia, executed probably not later than the eighth century B.C., were sculptured in relief, and illustrated by brief poetical inscriptions, various adventures of each poem, with so close a correspondence in the particulars as to prove the artist's familiarity with their text.¹ The engagement between Agamemnon and the Antenoridæ was represented precisely as in the 11th book of the *Iliad*²; and the shield of the Greek commander was inscribed with a verse bearing pointed reference to Homer's description of it in a previous passage of the same book. another compartment was the scene of the Odyssey¹ where Ulysses and Circe retire to rest. The four waiting-maids of the goddess are mentioned in the lines annexed, as engaged in the same functions assigned them by Homer. The delivery of the arms by Vulcan to Thetis², and the drive of Nausica from her father's palace to the shore³, were portrayed with equal fidelity to the Homeric original. The poems of Archilochus and Tyrtæus offer similar traces of familiarity with those of Homer. Allusion also occurs, at an early period, to a race or society of Homeridæ at Chios, who claimed descent from the poet, and hereditary privileges in connexion with his works.⁵ The first actual mention of the name Homer occurs in a verse of Xenophanes of Colophon⁶, who lived towards the close of this period, and describes the poems as in his day the standard manual of elementary instruction. Even at this early epoch they seem to have furnished material for critical redaction and commentary. Xenophanes himself treated in several of his works of the comparative age and merits of Homer and Hesiod.⁷ The labours of Pisistratus of Athens and his coadjutors, to which so much importance has been attached in the modern schools, will be more fully considered in the sequel. Contemporary with these Attic scholars was Theagenes of Rhegium, whose commentaries on the poems and their author were esteemed by later critics, and whose various readings, or those of the edition he followed, are cited by the Venetian scholiast.¹ From this epoch downwards the notices of Homer and his works are of constant occurrence. It does not, however, always plainly appear how far the title "Homer" is limited, in the citations of this period, to the Iliad and Odyssey, how far it may not extend to the other Homeric works above described. Callinus², the very ancient elegaic poet, (B.C. 700), is said to have attributed the Cyclic Thebais, Pindar³ the Cypria, to "Homer;" and a similar practice, extending to other poems of the Cycle, prevailed at a much later period in popular quarters. Herodotus, the first extant author who uses the terms Iliad and Odyssey, is also the first who distinctly sets apart those two poems as genuine works of Homer, and discards the claim of others, especially the Cypria and Epigoni, to any such honour.⁴

4. The public recital of the poems appears to have prevailed throughout Greece from a remote period. The place with which tradition first connects it is Chios, an island advancing special claims to be considered the birthplace of Homer, which claims were supported by zeal in preserving and cultivating his works. At Sicyon, as Herodotus⁵ informs us, the practice was abolished by the tyrant Clisthenes (about 600 B.C.), from jealousy of the superior glory reflected by the poems on the neighbouring rival state of Argos. The first public honours awarded them in Sparta are dated by the best authorities from the age of Lycurgus, by whom they were established in that republic, as a national text-book of martial instruction.¹ In Athens, their public rehearsal is alluded to generally by Isocrates² and others, as of remote antiquity, and was indebted to Solon for improved regulations in the mode of performance.³ Its introduction into Syracuse is attributed to Cynæthus⁴, a Chian Homerid of the age of Pindar. The origin and primary import of the title Rhapsodist, familiarly borne by the performers in these solemnities, is obscure. The generally received etymology is that which characterises them as Stitchers or Botchers of poems. The allusion here is partly to the irregularities of which they were guilty, by disturbing the proper order of the text in their recital; partly to their imputed interpolation of matter from their own stores; partly, perhaps chiefly, to their habit of prefixing or subjoining to the original poems, or parts of poems, dedicatory prologues or epilogues in honour of the deities with whose festivals such public performances were connected. Others⁵ derived the name from the staff, or wand of office (rhabdos, rhaps), which distinguished the professional reciter of later times from the original poet. While the latter sang, solely or chiefly, his own compositions to the accompaniment of his lyre, the rhapsodist, bearing a laurel branch or wand as his badge of office, rehearsed, without musical accompaniment, the poems of others. The former interpretation is the more plausible; for whatever degree of value may have attached to the services of this fraternity, a certain degree of sarcasm seems, at every period, to have been connected with their name. From it derives that of Rhapsody, originally applied to the portions of the poems habitually allotted to different performers in the order of recital, afterwards transferred to the twenty-four books, or cantos, into which each work was permanently divided by the Alexandrian grammarians.

5. It seems doubtful how far this widely extended popularity may have contributed to maintain the purity of the text. The Iliad and Odyssey were the acknowledged standard or digest, as it were, of early national history, geography, and mythology. It came, therefore, to be considered essential to the dignity of each tribe or race, in later times, that honourable mention should be made in those poems of their cities or heroes; and such as were overlooked endeavoured to save their credit by the surreptitious insertion of passages creditable to themselves, or by condemning as spurious those which conferred honour on a rival. The professional officiousness of the rhapsodists also led them, in the mode already noticed, to tamper with the text, although more importance, probably, has been attached to this source of corruption than it deserves. The existing notices of these practices refer chiefly to the commencement of the sixth century B. C., when the closer connexion between the different Hellenic states, the consequent increase of international rivalry, and rapid extension of literary taste and resources, afforded new temptations, with new facilities, for such license. The results appear, not only in the number of various readings preserved by commentators, but in the citation, by respectable authorities, of passages of Homer now no longer to be found in his text.¹ Some of these quotations have been referred, with apparent reason, to those other ancient poems which still continued, in popular usage, to be classed under the head of Homer or Homeric. But, even with this allowance, there would remain a certain number for the Iliad and Odyssey.

Perhaps, however, these varieties are not exclusively owing to the license of editors or rhapsodists. Another and a purer source, hitherto unnoticed by critics, might be a corresponding variety in the genius of the original author. Without here entering on the much agitated question, how far the early transmission of the poems may be due to the art of memory, how far to that of writing, it may at least be admitted that the chief means of their general promulgation was by open recital. Whatever may have been the case with a few curious repositories of the text, the public at large was a listening rather than a reading public. But, even in our own age, the author of a popular work, after its first publication, usually finds cause for alteration or correction, and avails himself of a new edition for that purpose. It may however safely be assumed, both that such variations would occur in equal or greater numbers to a poet of Homer's age and character, and that he would be still more ready to give effect to them. Even without any change in the substance of his narrative, he would naturally be disposed to diversify the details of illustration or description to suit the taste of different audiences; and such variations, transferred to the memory or the written copies of different portions of the public, would give rise to controversy, which was the original, which the interpolated text.¹

Entire copies of works of so great compass would also, during the earlier period of their circulation, amid the imperfection of the mechanical element of literature, be comparatively rare. Each rhapsodist however, would be desirous to possess in manuscript, those portions at least in the recital of which he chiefly excelled. This would lead to the circulation of garbled or imperfect editions. Such piecemeal transmission, both in rehearsal and writing, is accordingly mentioned, by the earliest critical authorities on the subject, as one chief cause of confusion or corruption.

But to whatever sources those floating varieties may be traceable, it became, with the advance of literary culture, the more desirable to check the license in which they originated. This object could only be effectually attained by establishing, with the common sanction of the nation, in so far as it could be procured, a standard text of the national poet.

¹ See a remarkable passage of Goethe (Briefwechsel zw. Schiller und G. vol. III. p. 71.), where he draws a parallel between various texts of Homer stigmatised by Wolf as recent interpolations, and passages of his own poems added by himself on subsequent revision, for the purpose of elucidating his subject or improving his style.

And here the practice of rhapsodism, if on the one hand it may have been a source of corruption, was instrumental in providing a remedy, by suggesting to the different states where it prevailed the compilation, under public auspices, of complete editions for the use of the festivals. Many such accordingly were extant in later times, under the title of Civic, or State editions. For this service the Athenian public was indebted to the joint labours of Solon and Pisistratus. Solon is described as having checked the prevailing irregularities of recital, and forced the rhapsodists to adhere to the regular order of the text¹; Pisistratus as having collected or compiled the poems, previously in a state of disorder, into a single body or volume.² The earliest edition however, of which mention occurs in later times coupled with the name of an individual redactor, is that of Antimachus of Colophon³, a contemporary of Plato, and himself a poet of some celebrity. Aristotle⁴, besides a tract entitled "Homeric Difficulties," no longer extant, and the commentaries interspersed in his miscellaneous works, also prepared an edition of the Iliad for the use of his illustrious pupil Alexander, who carried it, inseparable from his person, in a precious casket; hence its familiar name, the Edition of the Casket. The proper execution however of this task, was beyond the resources of any single editor, however great his personal qualifications. It required a succession of efforts, under a combination of favourable circumstances, such as did not take place for several generations subsequent to the age of Aristotle.

6. The decline of original genius in Greece was simultaneous with that of freedom and political virtue. From the epoch of the Macedonian supremacy the national talent, deprived of that creative power by which it had hitherto been animated, was directed to the imitation of the more perfect ancient models, and, by consequence, to a studious analysis of the principles on which their excellence depended. The arts of grammar and criticism, which had hitherto formed no separate branch of literary pursuit, now became one of the most popular, and the poems of Homer the favourite subject for its exercise. Alexandria, under the auspices of her munificent sovereigns, took the lead in this, as in every other walk of literature: and to the labours of her succession of able masters, we are mainly indebted for the purity and integrity in which the standard monuments of Greek poetical genius have been transmitted to posterity. The zeal of the Ptolemies for the encouragement of learning placed at the disposal of its professors all the aids which wealth and power, often arbitrarily exercised, could supply. Neither pains nor cost were spared in collecting the more ancient and authoritative copies of Homer from every part of the Hellenic world, while the vast library amassed at Alexandria afforded all the incidental resources for the prosecution of such studies. Among the older texts collated by the Alexandrian editors, the Massilian, Chian, Argive, Cyprian, Sinopic, Cretan¹, and Æolic², called collectively the "Civic" or "State editions," to distinguish them from those by "individual editors¹," seem to have stood in the highest estimation. No distinct notices have been preserved of their relative antiquity, or the special ground of their reputation. The Massilian and Chian appear to have been considered of best authority. The Chian was doubtless that authorised in the old Homeric school of recitation established in the city from which its name is derived. The Massilian was also probably of Ionian origin, transported from Asia by the Phocæans into their Gallic colony, either on its first foundation in 600 B.C., or by the refugees from the parent city, when destroyed by the Persians sixty years afterwards. The others may also be presumed to have been similarly compiled under national auspices.

The more detailed account of the lives or labours of the Alexandrian grammarians belongs to another portion of this history. A succinct notice of their services in regard to Homer will here suffice. It must be borne in mind that their entire compositions are now lost, but the copious notices of their views, contained in the extant scholia, afford sufficient data for estimating both the real and comparative value of their treatment of the poems.

The most distinguished names are those of Zenodotus, Aristophanes, Aristarchus, and Crates. The claims of Zenodotus² to celebrity consist chiefly in his having been the founder of a school, and prepared the way for better things. He also enjoys the credit of having compiled and arranged the collective works of the national epic poets.¹ His commentaries on Homer display little either of correct judgment or insight into the genius of his author, and his treatment of the text of the poems was proverbially arbitrary and licentious. Nearly contemporary with Zenodotus, the poets Aratus² and Rhianus³ undertook editions of Homer. That of Rhianus remained in good credit in the subsequent schools. The labours of Aratus seem to have been confined to the Odyssey, and, if completed, obtained but little authority, no appeal being made to his readings in the extant scholia. The answer of Timon the Phliasian, to the question proposed to him by Aratus as to the best mode of reestablishing the genuine text, sheds light on the state of Homeric criticism at this period. His advice was, to procure and collate ancient copies without regard to those then in circulation.⁴ This want was supplied for behoof of Zenodotus by his patron Ptolemy Philadelphus, to whom the Alexandrian library was chiefly indebted for its rich store of standard codices of Homer, as of other leading Greek poets. Zenodotus was succeeded, as head of the Alexandrian school, by his pupil Aristophanes⁵ of Byzantium, a scholar of better judgement and more accurate learning. He was the first who started doubts of the genuine character of the latter part of the Odyssey, placing the termination of the poem at the 296th verse of the 23rd book.⁶ This view was also favoured by his successor Aristarchus⁷, the critic of highest fame and authority among the antients. To him the public were indebted for what afterwards constituted the standard text of both poems, the same, it is understood, which, with subsequent modifications, has been transmitted to the present day.¹ The merits of Aristarchus, like those of the great majority of professional grammarians in every age, consisted rather in acuteness of verbal criticism, than in refinement of taste or the faculty of appreciating the higher excellences of his author. A large portion, however, of his speculations were devoted to this more delicate branch of his art. With much audacity in censuring and condemning, or in suggesting additions and improvements from his own stores, he yet appears to have confined those liberties to his commentary, rarely if ever venturing on any serious alteration of the text not justified by competent authority.

Chorizontes, or Separatists.

7. During, or shortly prior to, the time of Aristophanes, the opinion was started as to the separate authorship of the Iliad and Odyssey.² Its first proposer was a certain Xenon, concerning whom, beyond the simple fact of his having originated this theory, history is silent. The only adherent of his views recorded by name was Hellanicus, a disciple of the school of Zenodotus. Their doctrine was controverted by Aristarchus, but seems otherwise to have obtained little attention, still less approbation, among the antient critics. During the subsequent virulent controversies on almost every other point, no difference of opinion is here recorded between the chiefs of opposite sects. The notices of such difference in any quarter consist but of incidental references by the scholiasts to the Chorizontes, or Separatists, as the followers of Xenon were called. Seneca¹ mentions the question as one of the unprofitable subtleties which amused Greek sophists; while Longinus, the most genial of all the later Homeric critics, in treating at large of the difference of subject and character in the two poems, makes no allusion to so much as a doubt of their common authorship.

To the sect of Aristarchus was opposed that of Crates² of Mallos, founder of a rival school of grammarians at Pergamus, under the auspices of Attalus, sovereign of that state. He was author of an edition of the poems, and, however inferior in general popularity, was no unworthy antagonist of the great Alexandrian. Of the readings of the text recorded as having been disputed between the two, those of Crates are frequently entitled to a preference, and some have been preferred accordingly in subsequent editions. He also numbers among his adherents several leading grammarians of later times. His speculations on the age and life of the poet are marked by originality, occasionally tending to paradox.³

In early times the only subdivision of the text was by heads of subjects, or rhapsodies, as some of the more comprehensive heads were called, embodying the parts usually allotted in the public rehearsals to different performers.⁴ Thus what is now comprised in the fifth and a portion of the sixth book of the Iliad was called the "Prowess of Diomed." The ninth book was named "Litæ," or the "Supplication." The second contains the "Dream," and the "Bœotia" or "Catalogue." The present division into twenty-four books of unequal length is attributed to Aristarchus.¹ In the edition² of Crates, however, the text (of each poem, it may be presumed) appears to have been divided into but nine books; each, consequently, of more than double the average bulk of those of Aristarchus. The method of Crates was in conformity with that adopted in the other Homeric poems supposed to have been similarly subdivided by the Alexandrian critics. The Thebais and Epigoni contained each seven books; the Cypria eleven; the Æthiopis five; the Lesser Iliad and Nosti each four. Although no exact notice is extant of the entire length of any one of these works, there can be little doubt, from the existing abstract of their contents, or the general allusions of the antients, that they were of sufficient bulk to admit of their cantos containing an average number of lines double that allotted to each of the four and twenty Aristarchean rhapsodies. The same method was followed by Apollonius Rhodius, himself an Alexandrian grammarian, in his Argonautica. The arrangement of Aristarchus was therefore a departure from the ordinary practice. But his boundless authority in the later schools secured his method universal acquiescence, and that of Crates seems to have been limited to his own edition.

The labours of succeeding grammarians during the better days of classical literature, of Dionysius Thrax, Didymus, and others, shed but little additional light on the text or history of the poems. They were confined, in great measure, to controversies between the adherents of the rival schools of the Alexandrian era, or to vindications of the opinions, and revisals of the editions, of their respective chiefs. To the middle or lower ages of the Byzantine empire belong the whole or greater part of the extant scholia, which are chiefly valuable as affording access to the views and opinions of authors of a better period.¹

8. During the first few centuries after the revival of letters, modern classical scholars were content to acquiesce in the prevailing doctrine of the ancient public, which, while restricting the honour of emanating from Homer to the Iliad and Odyssey alone, among the poems that formerly claimed it, admitted them both as his genuine integral works. But towards the end of the 17th century certain novelties of opinion began to transpire, tending to place the whole question in a light different from any in which it had been contemplated by the leading ancient critics.² (The first attempt to combine these speculations into a methodical form is contained in the Scienza nuova of Giambattista Vico. This eccentric Neapolitan was an original thinker of no ordinary stamp, whose opinions, as remarkable for novelty and ingenuity as deficient in solidity, overlooked or neglected in his own day, have, in various instances, anticipated theories destined to obtain for their more recent propounders the fame of original discovery. In a treatise upon Homer, embodied in the above-cited work, there occurs, among many valuable remarks, mingled with an equal amount of error and paradox, the following passage: "Herein we must admire the hand of Providence, that at a time when alphabetic writing was not yet invented, men should sometimes discourse in verse, which, by the aid of rhythm or metre, might facilitate the action of the memory in more effectually preserving the vicissitudes of national history. . . . Homer left none of his compositions in writing, as we are told by Fl. Josephus, in his Tract against Apion: but the rhapsodists went about singing the books separately, some one some the other, at the feasts and public solemnities of the Greek cities. The Pisistratidæ first divided and arranged, or caused to be so arranged, the poems of Homer into Iliad and Odyssey, whence we may judge what a confused collection of materials they must previously have been."¹ (This extract contains the germ and substance of that theory which, nearly a century afterwards, reproduced and extended, with all the array of profound scholarship, in the form of an elaborate dissertation, obtained its author a first rank among historical critics, and became the foundation of a new school of classical research.

The publication of Wolf's Prolegomena, or Prefatory Essay to the Iliad, in which his views were developed, took place during a crisis in the intellectual as well as political destinies of Europe. A bold spirit of speculative inquiry was then abroad, the valuable effects of which, in exploding error and prejudice, have been too often counterbalanced by the spread of groundless or mischievous innovation. While the antiquity or universality of any doctrine was a powerful attraction to sceptical assault, few but such as were fenced on all sides by impenetrable barriers of demonstrated fact were safe from the danger of falling, at least a temporary sacrifice to zeal for some conjectural novelty. Wolf himself professed the scope of his argument to be rather to subvert the antient fabric of opinion, than to erect any solid edifice in its place; and the result has justified the accuracy of the figure. The publication of his essay may be compared to that of a pamphlet containing specious revolutionary doctrines in a hitherto tranquil state, at the moment when the minds of men were ripe for political change. Unanimous in rejecting their old form of government, scarcely any two citizens can agree as to that to be adopted in its stead. A period of discord is followed by one of anarchy, and that, in its turn, by a gradual inclination to revert to the former system.

Wolf's views, partly also suggested by the elegant and ingenious essay of Robert Wood¹, are in so far an extension or modification of those of Vico, that he ascribes, in more positive terms than the Italian critic, the previously undigested materials of each poem to a variety of authors; and assumes them to have been, not only first arranged, but first committed to writing, by Pisistratus. This latter service Vico, most preposterously, supposes to have been first rendered them by the Alexandrian grammarians. Beyond these general heads, it is not very easy to gather Wolf's precise doctrines, from the vague and often self-contradictory mode in which they are stated. Sometimes he speaks as if each work contained a primitive kernel of epic unity, enlarged by an extension of the main subject, or the addition of episodes, in its gradual descent to posterity, but not digested on any consistent plan prior to the days of Pisistratus. Elsewhere each seems to be considered as a chaos of unconnected elements, first compiled and adjusted by the same Attic hero of each version of his fluctuating theory. At other times he attaches importance to the question, whether the two poems are by the same Homer or different Homers, which would seem at least a virtual admission of each being substantially by a single author. In one place he altogether denies the familiar use of writing for literary purposes prior to the age of Pisistratus; in another he allows that its benefits may have been extended several centuries earlier to the works of other Greek poets, but not to those of Homer; a hypothesis the very reverse of what all reasonable probability would seem to justify.¹ The only specific facts by which he can be said to abide are, that the component elements of each poem, whether by few or by many authors, neither possessed any such epic continuity as they now exhibit, nor were committed to writing, until those services were rendered to them by Pisistratus, about the middle of the sixth century before Christ.

9. If the opinions of the master were so unsettled, harmony among his disciples could the less be expected. His extreme view of a total denial of written preservation to Homer, up to so recent a period, by his fondly admiring countrymen, and to Homer alone among their early poets, found but few supporters. Nor was the title of Pisistratus to have first imparted epic consistency to the poems very generally recognised. The basis however of the theory, that they were neither committed to writing till long after the period of their composition, nor originally composed in their integral form, obtained a general acquiescence. While the historical arguments, on which Wolf principally laid stress, ascribing the functions of first compiler as well as writer to Pisistratus, were disregarded, the internal evidence, as it was called, of discrepancy in matter or style between different parts was more prominently put forward. The favourite field for critical acumen now became the analysis, or rather dissection, of the text; and a large portion of the scholarship of the age has been exhausted in efforts to prove, by a very pointless, for the most part, and tasteless course of hypercritical subtlety, that the works which had hitherto been admired and honoured by the greatest critics of every period as standard models of epic art, were but an ill digested chaos of originally unconnected atoms, teem-

A certain encouragement was held out to this style of commentary by the circumstance of its being in some degree countenanced by ancient example. (In the infancy of Greek critical art, when its object was rather to appreciate the higher attributes of genius than detect its petty blemishes, the surpassing excellence of the Iliad and Odyssey led to their being set up as a type of absolute perfection in poetical composition. The admiration of the work was transferred naturally to the author. The production of two such poems seemed to require, not only an original genius of the highest order, but a great proficiency in the technical rules, and an ample store of the aids, of grammatical and rhetorical science. The principles of this school are concisely stated in one of its own trite aphorisms: that "to wrest the thunderbolt from Jupiter, the club from Hercules, or a line from the text of the Iliad was an equally impossible undertaking."² By a natural reaction, this enthusiasm provoked, in the maturer stages of grammatical science, no less zealous endeavours to detect flaws in these boasted models of perfection. Although there appears no intention on the part of any school of ancient criticism to dispute a general unity of plan in the poems, still, wherever it seemed that a phrase, verse, or integral part, could be spared without an entire sacrifice of poetical continuity, it seldom failed, in some quarter or other, to be condemned as an excrescence on the original fabric, whether an afterthought of the poet or a corruption of transcribers and rhapsodists. In the minor details of the text

there were no limits to this license. Taking, therefore, into account the extension given to the same system in our own time, it might safely be pronounced, that, were all the portions so stigmatised by successive generations of critics to be discarded, the fate of the poems would resemble that of the picture exposed in the market-place, with a request that each passing dilettante would draw a brush through the part that appeared to him defective. The consequence was, that in a few hours not an entire feature could be distinguished.

In spite, however, of these aberrations of taste or judgement on the part of his disciples, it cannot be denied that Wolf conferred a real benefit on classical science, by opening up the field of rational scepticism which has inherited his name. The popular view of the history of the poems demanded, no doubt, in the absence of all authentic notice of their author, a more searching scrutiny than it had yet undergone. The composition of two works of so elaborate a structure in the semibarbarous period from which they were held to emanate, was in itself a striking phenomenon. While the mode or extent of their committal to writing at the same early period was involved in much obscurity, their preservation in so perfect a state, unwritten, appeared little less than a miracle. Nor could it be overlooked that, amid a general unity, their text offered discrepancies of detail which, though certainly not greater than can be detected in similar works of civilised epochs, held out legitimate handle for speculation. The full discussion to which these various points have, during the last fifty years, been subjected, in themselves and in their bearings on others of collateral interest in Greek philology, if not productive of any conclusive settlement of the main question, has certainly proved of infinite benefit to the general cause of classical criticism.¹

The data for regulating the judgment in all such inquiries may be classed under two principal heads: I. Historical authority, comprising, besides the testimony of native authors, the balance of tradition, of received opinion, and of general probability: II. The internal evidence of the poems themselves. These two sources of knowledge are indeed often so closely interwoven as scarcely to admit of their being treated altogether independantly of each other. It will yet be proper, for method's sake, to keep them in as far as possible distinct. The internal evidence is now admitted to be by far the most important, the only basis indeed of any sound conclusions. It will, therefore, be analysed hereafter in considerable detail. The historical evidence possesses, however, a prior claim on attention.

HOMER.—ORIGIN OF THE POEMS.—HISTORICAL DATA.

1. AUTHORITIES CONCERNING PISISTRATUS AND HIS COMPILATION.—2. VARIETIES OF THEORY BASED ON THOSE AUTHORITIES.—3. SILENCE OF THE EARLIER CLASSICS. ARGUMENT FROM THE CYCLIC POEMS.—4. WHAT WERE THE POEMS OF "HOMER" "COLLECTED AND ARRANGED" BY PISISTRATUS.—5. JUST ESTIMATE OF HIS HOMERIC LABOURS.

1. IN the modern schools, the "Homeric question" resolves itself into two main heads of speculative inquiry: first, whether the Iliad and Odyssey are to be considered as each in its integral capacity the work of a single author: secondly, how far, allowing this to be the case, both poems are to be ascribed to the same author. It is to the former head alone that the historical class of evidence can be said to apply. The other, or as it is technically called the Separatist question, can hardly be said to offer materials for such investigation, being alluded to by the ancients but as a subtlety of one or two commentators of no authority, whose views were repudiated or contemned by the best native critics. It is on grounds of internal evidence that so great importance has been attached to the Separatist doctrine in our own times, and upon these grounds alone it will here accordingly fall to be considered.

Authorities
concerning Pisistratus
and his compilation.

With the above limitation, the historical element of the inquiry concentrates itself around the tradition concerning the services rendered to the poems by Pisistratus and his family. This is owing partly to the importance of those services, partly to the peculiar prominence assigned them throughout the late discussion. Of the Athenian usurper himself no mention occurs in connexion with the works of Homer, in the text of any writer of the best days of Greek literature; but a passage of the Platonic dialogue¹ which bears as its title the name of "Hipparchus," son and successor of Pisistratus, and which is the earliest extant authority on the subject, ascribes to the same Hipparchus, not only the first establishment at Athens of the public rehearsal of the poems, but their first introduction into that republic. This account is however so grossly improbable in itself, and so contrary to all other more reasonable data, that it has never been considered more than a confused version of the prevailing tradition of certain improvements having been effected by a member of the family in the festive recitals of the poems. But even this more restricted view of their services is not borne out by other authorities. Dieuchidas, a Megarian writer of uncertain age but good credit, quoted by Diogenes Laertius in his life of Solon², ascribes the same or similar improvements to that lawgiver, subjoining the remark, that "Solon therefore had done more than Pisistratus to elucidate the poems." He mentions in the sequel the imputed interpolation, by Solon, of the passage of the Catalogue relative to the isle of Salamis. From these various data, it may be inferred that there were three traditions current in later times, as to the better regulation of the public rehearsals in Athens; one of which ascribed it to Solon, another to Pisistratus, a third to his son Hipparchus. The two latter may be presumed to imply the extension or improvement, by those princes, of the original ordinance of Solon. The next allusion to the services of Pisistratus is by Cicero¹, who describes him as "reported to have arranged the books of Homer, previously in a state of confusion, in the form in which we now possess them." Pausanias² mentions his collection of the poet's previously scattered works as a current rumour, and alludes also to certain assistants in his task. Ælian³ combines the two notices relative to Lycurgus and Pisistratus into one, assigning to the former the first introduction of the poems into Greece, but in a disordered state; to the latter their final arrangement. But the most explicit notice of the critical labours of Pisistratus is a somewhat mutilated fragment of Tzetzes, the Byzantine grammarian⁴, to the following effect: "Pisistratus collected the scattered poems of Homer, and with much care and diligence arranged them into the volumes which they now occupy, with the aid of four distinguished scholars: Conchylus of . . . , Onomacritus of Athens, Zopyrus of Heraclea, and Orpheus of Croton." "Before his time," it is added, "the study of Homer was a confused and difficult matter." Josephus⁵ does not mention Pisistratus, but states it to be an opinion entertained in some quarters, that "the poems of Homer were not committed to writing until long after their composition, but handed down by memory, and afterwards collected into one volume; which," he adds, "may account for the many discrepancies in their text."

The services here described as rendered by Pisistratus to the poems are: first, the encouragement and regulation of their public recital; secondly, their collection and arrangement in their present form.

Varieties of theory

2. The modern theories on either point are of the same vague character as the testimonies on which they are based. The doctrine of Wolf, the extreme of Philo-Pisistratism, assumed the Attic tyrant to be the first writer as well as compiler, and hence, in so far as their epic unity is concerned, the first actual author of an Iliad or Odyssey, previously a confused mass of heroic songs. Others have run into an opposite extreme, limiting his merit to little more than having, in concert with Solon, provided for the performance of the public rehearsals, according to the epic sequel originally inherent in the cantos, but disturbed in the popular schools of rhapsodism. A third party, adopting a middle course, would ascribe to him, together with the regulation of the popular rehearsals, the preparation of a complete edition of the whole series of cantos or books, previously extant in writing, but without any standard integral text, and hence liable to be perverted from their epic continuity. Other modifications of opinion might be enumerated, but those above stated will suffice to place in a clear light the bearings of the general question.

The first of these three views, the primary Wolfian hypothesis, now numbers comparatively few supporters. Not one of the various authorities cited in its favour ascribes to Pisistratus the committal of the poems to writing. Tzetzes, the most specific and apparently authentic historian of his labours, is not only silent upon this point, but the terms of the above-cited passage, describing an association of professional men of letters engaged in preparing complete editions of the national classics, imply a state of Greek literature altogether incompatible with the denial of a written integrity to its acknowledged standard; to the Greek bible, as Wolf¹ himself calls the Iliad. Aristotle², the oldest and best authority concerning the early promulgation of the poems in Greece, was not only ignorant of this later form of the tradition, but indirectly contradicts it, describing the Spartan lawgiver as having in the course of his travels, several centuries prior to the time of Pisistratus, received the poems as written documents from Creophilus of Samos, and brought them to Lacedæmon. Whatever may be the critical value of this story, it proves at least that those who attached weight to it knew nothing of any prior claim of Athens to the first written arrangement of the poems. Xenophanes³ of Colophon and Theagenes⁴ of Rhegium, both contemporary with Pisistratus, wrote commentaries on Homer. But a written commentary on a work itself unwritten is surely a thing unheard of. Still less compatible were the labours of these critics with a mass of undigested ballads as their text-book. Nor can the authorities most laudatory of Pisistratus reasonably be understood as asserting his having first imparted epic unity to the poems, or as expressing any doubt of its prior existence. They allude rather to the restoration of a previous order dislocated by the popular organs of transmission. Cicero⁵, the oldest and gravest among them, could hardly have applied the expression "books (libros), before confused and dispersed," to hitherto unwritten and unconnected songs. The term books must either denote in its familiar sense written volumes, or if it be understood in the figurative sense of cantos or heads of subject, it implies an existence of the body of the work to which they belonged. Nor can confusion or dispersion be said to prevail, where order and unity were never contemplated. With how little justice Cicero can be made responsible for the opinion here imputed to him appears from another passage of his works, allusive to the state of literature in Greece many generations anterior to Pisistratus. "If," says he¹, "we place the foundation of Rome in the 7th Olympiad (750 B. C.), that event would coincide with a period at which Greece abounded with poets and musicians, and when, consequently, less weight attached to fabulous tradition." The orator here clearly alludes to a Greek literature in the technical sense of the term, about two hundred years prior to Pisistratus; he cannot, therefore, possibly have been under the impression that Homer, among all these poets, was denied a written text till the age of that prince. Even Josephus², the only author who questions the fact of the poems having been written by Homer himself, is by no means favourable to the claims of Pisistratus. The tract in which he alludes to the subject is an elaborate attempt to depreciate, in a keen spirit of national controversy, the antiquity of Greek civilisation and learning. His neglect, therefore, either to quote authorities or specify dates warrants the opinion, that, if he had ever heard of any such tradition relative to the Pisistratidæ, he did not consider it sufficiently valid for his purpose. Had he been able to quote, as easily as Wolf¹ has imagined, "the unanimous voice of all previous antiquity" in favour of his views, his triumph over Apion would have been complete, without an additional word of argument. (It is indeed remarkable that, while the whole of the authors cited in behalf of the modern doctrine belong to the Roman period, and with the exception of Cicero to its decline, not one of them attempts to corroborate his own statement by more ancient or nearly contemporaneous authority. The greater the accumulation of such unsupported statements, the greater, obviously, the evidence of the hollowness of the tradition they repeat.) Where, on the other hand, appeal does happen to be made, as by Diogenes Laertius, to prior authority, the testimony cited, that of Dieuchidas², the earliest writer who alludes to the Athenian usurper, is subversive of his more exaggerated claims, implying that the unity of the poems had been already better provided for by Solon.

3. Apart from such more specific reasons, it seems impossible to reconcile with the modern doctrine the entire silence of the writers of the best ages of Greece on the subject, and the absence of all appearance of doubt on their part, amid their accumulated notices of the poems, as to the genuine original integrity of the text. This objection has been met by a denial of any obligation on the part of those writers, in their incidental allusions to a popular literary work, to discuss its origin or early transmission. In so far as restricted to such allusions, the apology may have weight. It does not, however, meet the present case. Plato often does, and even Aristotle may at times, though that is perhaps more doubtful, quote, not merely Homer or Hesiod, but Orpheus or Musæus, in passing illustration of some speculative doctrine, without being held to any serious admission of the genuine character of the work appealed to: but that the proverbially sceptical and punctilious Stagirite critic, in a regular treatise on the Art of Poetry¹, should adopt the Iliad and Odyssey as his standard models of epic unity, and speak of Homer, in his strictly personal capacity, as the inspired author of so wonderful a combination, if he knew that the poems were really indebted for this noblest feature of their composition to a bookmaker of a comparatively recent epoch, seems incredible. / As little can it be supposed that Aristotle could be ignorant of any very important fact in the history of either Homer, Pisistratus, or Solon, which was matter of notoriety in the time of Cicero. This negative argument has, however, also been met in another and perhaps a more specious form. "Such speculative questions," it has been urged, "do not belong to the more youthful and genial stages of literary criticism, but to those later epochs, in which philological research is pursued as a distinct branch of science. Plato or Aristotle, satisfied with the possession of their Homer, limit their commentary to the beauties of the transmitted text, without investigating how, or through what medium, they obtained it." This rule of interpretation is at the best very questionable, but its presumed application to the case fails entirely. The Alexandrian commentators, it will be admitted, were as subtle a race of speculative critics as ever existed; yet they were no less in the dark as to the modern theory, than their ancestors of the Attic period. Not a hint of any such theory can be found in their remains. The argument that their opinions are but partially represented in the existing scholia cannot here avail. It were in itself hardly conceivable, that among such an infinity of citations, from the commentaries of several hundred grammarians¹, all allusion to a point of so great interest should be omitted, especially by authors fond of giving effect to precisely this subtle class of notices. But the prominence actually assigned, in the same Alexandrian schools, to the more limited scepticism of the Chorizontes, the minor proposition it may be called, as to a twofold authorship, is conclusive evidence that the major, of a complete patchwork Homer, would not, if already mooted, have been overlooked. The summary manner in which the Separatist doctrine itself is dismissed by Aristarchus, and other leading commentators, convincingly proves that the more extended theory of subdivision, if known to them at all, could not have been countenanced by them. Those who insisted on ascribing both poems to a single author could never have admitted a multitude for each.

Still more conclusive is the historical argument in favour of an entire Iliad and Odyssey, centuries prior to the age of Pisistratus, derived from those other epic poems to which attention has already been directed, as also vulgarly ascribed to Homer, with claims to an antiquity little inferior to that of his genuine works. Those poems, unfortunately, no longer exist in their integrity. Several of them, however, as may be collected from their remains or the notices concerning them, contained, in the choice of their subjects and mode of treatment, proofs of a systematic imitation of the Iliad and Odyssey, and, by consequence, of a familiarity with their text as already extant in the form in which we now possess it. To enter in detail upon the evidence bearing on this point would be to anticipate what properly belongs to another place.¹ Attention, however, may here be called to the following particulars. In the first place it will be remarked, that, while a veneration for the great master induced the disciples or imitators to select subjects connected with those on which he had shed lustre, a similar feeling, or the fear of entering into competition with him, also led them to avoid encroaching on the ground he had occupied. Arctinus, the next most celebrated poet of the school, took up, in his Æthiopis, the series of adventures before Troy, precisely at the stage in which the Iliad ceases, and carried them on to the death of Ajax. The Lesser Iliad continued the interrupted tale to the fall of the city, which catastrophe was also treated by Arctinus in a work entitled the Destruction of Troy. The author of the Cypria treated the previous subject from the birth of Helen, and brought it down to the exact epoch at which the Iliad commences. The Nosti filled up the interval between Iliad and Odyssey. Each of these works, while vastly inferior both in design and execution to their two prototypes, emulated at least the comprehensive scope of their action, borrowing also from them much of their own epic machinery, such as catalogues of warriors, quarrels among the chiefs, funeral games, and other similar details. To these Cyclic or Homeric epopees might be added numerous others¹, such as the Corinthiaca of Eumelus, and Heraclea of Pisander, standing in no such immediate relation to the Iliad, but also emanating from a more or less remote antiquity, and of great length and elaborate structure. The evidence supplied by these facts, that the Iliad and Odyssey existed previously to the Olympic era, can only be evaded by assuming all those poems to have been also originally composed on no definite plan, nor by any single author, but to have been indebted for their existence to the same fortuitous cohesion or the same bookmaking artifice, as the Pisistratian Homer. This is an extreme of paradox, such as, with our present clearer insight into the early history of Greek epic literature, will hardly find acceptance in any reasonable quarter.

Another evidence that Homer's name was from the earliest period identified with regular epic compositions is the fact, that while a large proportion of the works of that class claiming a remote antiquity were familiarly ascribed to him, none such were ever assigned to the rival school of Hesiod. With this name, by equal priority of right, was connected, in the same conventional usage, that other voluminous body of hexameter poems already described as chiefly of a didactic tendency, or, where treating heroic subjects, of a brief or desultory character. This distinction, and by consequence the respective peculiarities on which it is founded, is certainly far older than the time of Pisistratus.

What were the poems
collected and arranged by
tus?

4. And here a question occurs of no little moment as bearing on this whole inquiry, but which has hitherto been overlooked or but lightly treated: What were the "poems of Homer" which Pisistratus, in the tradition, is described as collecting and arranging? Were they limited to the Iliad and Odyssey? or did they comprise other members of the "Homeric" Cycle? Although the Iliad and Odyssey came gradually, in the progress of the critical art, by the force rather of internal than historical evidence, to be recognised as the sole genuine works of "the poet," yet this, it has been shown, was not the case in early times. It was not so, probably, in the age of Simonides and Pindar¹, scarcely in that of Herodotus, and, it may confidently be said, not certainly in that of Pisistratus. There can be no reasonable doubt that the "poems of Homer," forbidden to be rhapsodised at Sicyon by Clisthenes, tyrant of that state and contemporary of Pisistratus, on account of the prominence they gave to the glory of the rival city of Argos, comprised the Thebais and *Epigoni*²; and it can hardly be supposed that any more critical line of distinction had yet been drawn in Athens. Were, however, the tradition of an adjustment or redaction of the "previously scattered" limbs or volumes of "Homer," to be thus understood of the general mass or series of Homeric poems, the result would be a complete change in the bearings of the whole question as affecting the Iliad and Odyssey alone. The text of Tzetzes, above cited, also certainly favours this view. The duties performed by Pisistratus and his coadjutors towards "Homer" are there mentioned but incidentally, in the way of illustration or parallel to the like undertaking of Zenodotus in the Alexandrian period.¹ But the compilation of that critic included, it is certain, the apocryphal as well as the genuine works of "Homer." From other collateral accounts it appears that Pisistratus also compiled and arranged the poems of Hesiod², which title, in like manner, comprised, besides the two more accredited works of the Bæotian bard, numerous others enjoying, in more critical ages, little or no claim to genuine Hesiodic origin; and there seems no sufficient reason to draw a distinction, as to the value of any such generic expression, between the case of Hesiod and that of Homer. The simple fact that the remaining mass of Epico-Homeric poems were collected by Pisistratus, under whatever title, can hardly admit of doubt. He was the founder, as Zenodotus with whom he is compared by Tzetzes was the director, of a public library.³ His "Collection and Arrangement" of the "Poems of Homer" for his Athenian Institute may, therefore, in the general spirit of the tradition, safely be understood in the same comprehensive sense as that of his Alexandrian successor for the shelves of the Musæum.⁴ The whole series would not only be required for the Athenian library, but must have formed the most bulky portion of its contents. Unless, therefore, it be assumed that the popular title to Homeric honours, which the Thebais, Cypria, Æthiopis, and Lesser Iliad had enjoyed for ages, and continued to retain long after the time of Pisistratus, was dismissed or set at naught by that compiler, at the epoch too when the Iliad and Odyssey themselves are asserted to have been but disjointed and unconnected fragments, (a somewhat extravagant hypothesis,) it seems difficult to escape the inference, that the "volumes of Homer," collected and arranged at Athens, comprehended a great deal more than those to which the title is now exclusively limited. The circumstance that the Homeric labours of the Athenian prince should have been understood, as certainly appears to have been the case, by later writers, as limited to the Iliad and Odyssey, can create no surprise. It furnishes but one, among numerous instances, where the expression "Homer," applied in early times to the collective Homeric mass, has been similarly misunderstood in after ages.

The establishment of a public library by Pisistratus, although perhaps the best authenticated fact of his literary history, is in itself singularly inconsistent with the more exaggerated view of his editorial functions. The notion of a professional illustrations there supplied of the mutilated scholion of Tzetzes (supra, p. 205.), it appears probable that in that scholion the obscure word Concylus, formerly supposed to be the name of one of the coadjutors of Pisistratus, is, as Dr. Cramer had conjectured, a remnant of the phrase ἐπικόγκυλον, or Epic Cycle. It would thus refer, not to the person of the commentator, but to the material on which his critical labours were bestowed. Epic Cycle, it need hardly be remarked, is but another name for the Collective Epic poems of the Homeric School.

book-collector being the first committer to writing of the works deposited in his library involves something very nearly akin to absurdity.¹ Equally incompatible with this theory, though often, strange to say, adduced in its favour, are the allusions by ancient grammarians to single lines or short passages, as "interpolated" here and there, by Pisistratus or his coadjutors, on the genuine text, not only of Homer, but of Hesiod, Musæus, Orpheus, and other poets, real or imaginary, whose works they had the credit of collecting.² Such allusions, unless on the supposition, not merely of the poems having long previously enjoyed the benefit of a written integrity, but of there having already existed for each some fixed textual standard of that integrity, were altogether nugatory.

5. Strong as may be the foregoing body of objections to the modern Pisistratian theory, they scarcely suffice to bear out the opposite extreme of opinion, where the services of the Attic prince are restricted to a mere share in establishing the public rehearsal of the poems, and checking the license of the rhapsodists; although the arguments in favour even of this more limited view are not devoid of plausibility. Apart from the silence of earlier authorities, stress has been laid on the absence of allusion, by the Alexandrian critics, to any Athenian text, amid their frequent appeals to those of other states, such as Argos, Chios, or Marseilles. This silence, however, though incompatible with any such extensive influence on the poems as has been ascribed to Pisistratus, need not entirely exclude his title to the merit of having prepared an edition for his own immediate use and that of his native public. But any such edition, even if extant in later times, could have enjoyed no separate authority, and must have been comprehended, with sundry others, under the general head of "common" or "ordinary editions," occasionally cited in the extant scholia.¹

The more rigid, therefore, the scrutiny to which the properly historical data bearing on this inquiry are subjected, the more conclusively favourable do they appear to the view embodied in the foregoing general summary of the history of the poems. I. That each was originally composed, in its substantial integrity and order, as we now possess it. II. That, in the course of their passage to posterity, this order, if not altogether obliterated, was yet so habitually disturbed by the popular organs of transmission as to threaten its permanent dissolution. III. On the advance of literary culture, a zealous determination manifested itself in various quarters, to check this license, and enforce regularity in the public recitals established in the leading Greek states. IV. With this object, new editions were prepared, under public auspices, for the use of different republics. Such were the texts of Chios, Argos, and the other "Civic Editions;" such also that of Pisistratus, assuming it ever to have existed.

That this reduction to order of the poems, whatever may have been its precise nature, was provided for in various other cities besides Athens, apart from the indirect evidence of the "Civic Editions," is asserted on the same authority habitually appealed to in favour of the exclusive claims of Pisistratus.¹ There was this difference in the result, that, while those editions obtained fame and authority, the names of their compilers were not preserved. The edition of Athens, on the other hand, if it ever existed, lapsed into obscurity, while the memory of its compiler's zeal was magnified, during the literary ascendancy of Athens, with other local traditions of that state, into a form which has supplied a basis for the still more exaggerated theories of the modern school.

state of the
question.

1. It will be desirable, as preliminary to any general application of the internal data of the poems to the question of their origin, to have distinctly in view the leading varieties of opinion to be examined. These varieties may be classed under the four following heads:—

I. The old opinion of Aristotle, Aristarchus, Longinus, and the native public at large, that both poems are the work of a single Homer.

II. The doctrine of the Chorizontes, or Separatists, that each is the production of a single, but not of the same poet.

III. That a number of independant lays on the Trojan war and its consequences, emanating from various authors and epochs of the primitive minstrelsy, having been observed, at a more advanced period of literature, to comprise two continuous series of epic narrative, had been incorporated by an ingenious compiler into the existing form of an Iliad and Odyssey.

IV. That an original kernel, or skeleton, of each poem had been, in the course of ages, amplified to the bulk each now presents, partly by an extension of the primary subject, partly by the incorporation of other independent lays or episodes.

The latter two of these heads are but a compendium or summary of a class of doctrines, which assume a great variety of shapes, as modified by the caprice of their respective advocates. They represent, conjointly, the substance of Wolf's from the first vague and pliable theory. The credit of that theory has been on the wane ever since the sensation excited by its novelty had so far subsided as to admit of its being subjected to a dispassionate scrutiny, and the current of opinion has long been setting slowly, but surely, in a retrograde course. That the German public, where this whole question has been chiefly agitated, should be ready, unconditionally, to abandon doctrines with which its claims to preeminence in classical research are so intimately associated, was hardly to be expected; yet the various modifications of theory which have been propounded even in the German schools, while evading any actual return to the old Aristotelian creed, are but so many steps in that direction. It is plain, for example, that, in the ratio in which the second and third of the above four varieties of opinion differ from each other, they approximate to the first. The second admits the unity of each poem and author, but draws a broad distinction between the two. The third, while it confounds the distinction, as broadly denies the unity. A concession, on either side, of but one of the points at issue, would amount to a recognition of the antient doctrine.

The literary historian who, some years ago, had ventured on this next and last step might have been exposed to the stigma of lagging behind the spirit of the age, of narrow-minded deference to exploded error. By reference, however, to the existing state of opinion, he may now perhaps rather claim to rank as a sceptic than a bigot. His title to impartiality, at least, will hardly in the present instance be disputed, when it is stated that, on commencing the course of study preliminary to this undertaking, he was, like most young scholars, himself a zealous disciple of the Wolfian school. Having been led, by a twenty-years' diligent scrutiny of its doctrines, to a thorough conviction of their fallacy, he is the more alive to the duty of attempting, by a full exposition of the results of that scrutiny, to produce a similar conviction on the minds of others.

two kinds.

2. The internal evidence of any such works as the Iliad or Odyssey, bearing on the question of their origin or structure, is of two kinds, Circumstantial and Personal; or, in the technical language of the schools, Objective and Subjective. The former hinges on a comparative view of the facts and events, the manners, customs, and institutions described or alluded to, as illustrative of the age or state of society from which the descriptions emanate. The evidence of the latter kind deals rather with the literary or imaginative than the historical element of the text, with the genius of the author rather than of his times or facts; but deals with them in a similar manner, by testing their unity or diversity as reflected in their written features of language, sentiment, or style.

each on the present case.

The arguments derived from the former source affect chiefly the question of separate authorship in the two poems. Any serious attempts to bring such arguments to bear against the individual integrity of each have been directed chiefly to portions of the text, the genuine character of which had been doubted by leading native critics, where, consequently, the discrepancy of the part, even where admitted, may be considered in some sense to imply the unity of the whole. The consideration, therefore, of the Circumstantial head of internal evidence will be reserved chiefly for those portions of this analysis devoted either to the Separatist theory, or to the corruptions which the text of either poem may, in the ordinary course of transmission, have undergone. The few points falling under this head to which it has been considered necessary here to direct attention resolve themselves, in great measure, into questions of historical probability similar to those treated in the previous chapter.

One of the most curious anomalies observable in the general course of Homeric criticism during the last half-century, is the familiar way in which, in the same quarters where the Iliad and Odyssey are pronounced a compilation of discordant materials derived from poets and epochs extending over about five centuries, both works, together with their "author" "Homer," continue to be quoted in their integrity as the most antient contemporary evidence on all questions of remotest Hellenic history, manners, art, or science. Great importance for example has been attached, after Thucydides, Strabo, and other classics, to the absence from either poem of the names Hellas, or Hellene, for Greece and its inhabitants, and of that of Peloponnesus for its southern peninsula, as historical evidence of the late period at which these phrases became prevalent. But if the poems really be a cento of contributions by numerous authors from the tenth or eleventh centuries B. C. down to Solon and Pisistratus, any appeal to such uniformity must here involve one of two inferences: either that the phraseology in question was unknown during the whole of that period, which it is certain was not the case; or that the whole body of contributors had conspired in affecting ignorance, which were absurd. The omission therefore is in itself substantial evidence of unity, in the period at least in which the works were composed. Nor can the customary apology here avail, that deference to the usage of earlier bards whose songs form the basis of the compilation, might cause this phraseology to become inveterate with their successors, since both terms occur in the text of Hesiod and in that of Homer's oldest disciples and most successful imitators. The argument may be extended to other negative peculiarities in the poet's accounts of manners or institutions, whether referable to ignorance or other causes. That one Homer should have been ignorant of the use of cavalry in war, or from eccentricity or antiquarian affectation should have pretended to be so, is possible, but scarcely credible in the case of a number of Homers of different ages and countries. That one poet should systematically exclude from his heroes' tables fish, boiled meat, game, and other articles of good cheer, so much esteemed by heroes of other ages and countries, has often been remarked as singular; that ten or twelve Homers should enter into any such conspiracy against heroic freedom of diet seems unaccountable.

Among the reasons for assigning the two poems to different authors, much importance has been attached to the preference of Iris in the one, of Mercury in the other, as the messenger of Jove. The force of this argument, as bearing on the Separatist question, will be considered hereafter. It tells, however, obviously both ways on the doctrines at large of the modern school. That two Homers should have preferred, the one the male the other the female functionary, were nothing surprising; but that out of a number of Homers, composing independently on the adventures of the Trojan war, all those who adopted Achilles as their hero and the military events of the siege as their subject, should have restricted themselves to the one, those who preferred the voyages of Ulysses, to the other class of agency, were a marvellous coincidence.

Many similar examples of consistency in the poet's historical notices might be adduced. The above will suffice to illustrate the principle of unity which they involve. Reserving, therefore, the further consideration of such questions for the comparative age or authorship of the separate poems, we now pass on to the more properly personal or subjective department of internal evidence, which will engage a large and well-merited share of attention.

3. The critical analysis of a work of genius is limited, in ordinary cases, to the elucidation of its beauties, defects, or peculiarities. In the present case, not only the character of the poems, but their very existence, with that of their author, is at stake. This is unfortunate, as imparting a controversial spirit to a subject which, it were especially to be wished, should be treated in that easy agreeable tone with which polemical discussion is least compatible. Every effort, however, will be made to merge the one head of inquiry in the other, so that the perception of the causes may flow naturally from that of the effects.

The internal evidence of the poems is now universally admitted to be the only source from which any clear light can be expected on their history; yet there is no branch of the whole Homeric question which has been so greatly neglected. Neither ingenuity nor subtlety has here, indeed, been spared by the supporters of the sceptical doctrine. Their attempts to prove too much may even have contributed at times to strengthen the case of their opponents. The complete mutilation, not merely of the entire poems, but of their separate limbs, paragraphs, and verses, which would ensue were effect given to those commentaries, would prove as incompatible with the existence of a fugitive ballad as of a finished epopee. They also tend by their own discrepancy to defeat each other. The flaw or blemish where one critic discovers plain evidence of patchwork, is passed over unheeded by another; while the text admitted by the first as a genuine fruit of the primitive heroic minstrelsy, is discarded by the second as the spurious offspring of a tasteless imitator. By the supporters of the old opinion, on the other hand, the arguments from this source, by far the most conclusive at their disposal, have been turned to comparatively slender account. The objections founded on the real or imputed discordances of the action have indeed been vigorously combated, but no attempt has been made to place the whole question on that higher ground of principle which it is capable of occupying. Unity of genius in such compositions can neither be proved nor set aside by reference to mere mechanical results. It must be sought in those delicate traits of conception or feeling, where the variety of individual character in our species would seem, in itself, to preclude the possibility of so singular a harmony as is admitted, by even the most virulent opponents¹ of the original integrity of the Iliad, to pervade almost every page of that extraordinary poem.

In adopting any general principle for judging literary works by internal evidence, an important previous question occurs: whether the same rules are to be followed in regard to the Iliad and Odyssey, as would apply to poems of similar character in historical times. This question, when proposed in the abstract, can admit of but one answer: that the text of Homer must be tried by the same touchstone as that of Virgil, or Milton; or if indulgence be afforded, it ought to be to the poet of an age least provided with mechanical aids to accurate composition. Certain it is however that this simple rule of equity has, throughout the whole recent course of Homeric research, been systematically reversed; and that, were the same rigorous tests of uniformity, so mercilessly enforced in regard to Homer, to be transferred to his more civilised successors, different portions of the Æneid or Paradise Lost might, upon still more valid grounds, be assigned to different authors. Any such attempt would undoubtedly awaken, even in many of those who in Homer's case have been most zealous in the work of destruction, feelings of unmixed reprobation or ridicule.² It is the obscurity alone in which the origin of the Greek poems is involved that affords a shield behind which the real hypercriticism of such attacks shelters itself. But is it not obvious that, by the admission of any such external influence on the judgement, the whole principle of internal evidence is corrupted in its source? The thing to be proved can never be made an element of the proof. No critic, then, can honestly grapple with this analysis, who is not prepared to extend the same criteria enforced in Homer's case to every other work or author.

— The remarks offered in a former page on the early vicissitudes of the poems will obviate any impression that, in advocating the substantial correctness of the old opinion, it is proposed to maintain the absolute integrity of their text as it now exists. The circumstances under which they were transmitted render it next to impossible but that their original purity should have suffered. In some, perhaps the greater number of cases, the tampering may have been so managed as to be no longer discernible; in others the existing anomalies may afford reasonable ground of suspicion, and, where supported by traditional authority, of conviction. But even in these latter cases the impartial critic, instead of condemning, on account of trivial blemishes, a substantial well-proportioned edifice as a patchwork of different times and architects, will rather avail himself of its general solidity and elegance as a criterion for distinguishing the injudicious alterations or repairs to which it may have been subjected.

Similarity and discrepancy of style. Their relative

4. It may be laid down as a general rule, in all questions as to the genuine character of a great literary work, that the evidence supplied by similarity of style is stronger on the one side, than that derived from a corresponding amount of anomaly on the other. As long as human nature is imperfect, the efforts of human art will be unequal. The same poet can as little be expected to maintain unvarying consistency and propriety, as the same man uninterrupted health of body or serenity of mind. It must further be remembered that original genius is proverbially eccentric and capricious, and that these characteristics are more especially apt to find place in the compositions of a poet unshackled by the critical refinements of civilised ages. The same freedom of fancy which raises him to the highest regions of the sublime, will at times lead him into defects at which an ordinary versifier of the present day might be entitled to cavil. Such occasional blemishes appear also in a more striking light, from the contrast with the excellences on which they are engrafted. The truth of this remark is borne out by the case, not only of Homer, but of every poet of similar genius flourishing under parallel circumstances. Let Dante or Shakspeare be submitted to the same ordeal by which Homer has been tested, and it is certain that from their standard works might be selected numerous passages, or even integral parts, which, if collated with the nobler specimens of their style, would as amply deserve expunction as any line, text, or book, of either Iliad or Odyssey. Still less attention is due to the arguments derived from occasional discrepancies of fact or of geographical and mythological allusion. Such anomalies, as will be abundantly shown in the sequel, are not only observable, and to a far greater extent, in the text of the most accomplished successors of Homer, but would even seem, from the similarity in the mode of their occurrence, to be inseparable from the free and genial treatment of any prolonged series of mythical adventures.¹

Very different is the value of the affirmative evidence, resulting from a large amount of correspondence, in any such case. Writers of ordinary capacity, whose style is formed on the prevailing taste of the day, may frequently present so great a general resemblance, as to render it difficult to decide upon internal grounds to whom, among those of a given period, a production is to be ascribed: but any such pervading identity between any two or more different minds, in respect to all the higher excellences, as well as the more delicate characteristics, of poetical genius, as it would be necessary to assume on the basis of the modern Homeric theory, were a phenomenon unexampled in historical times, nor consequently admissible on hypothetical grounds in the darker periods of art. Throughout the two poems the same deep knowledge of human nature is displayed, in identically the same forms, not merely in the delineation of those more prominent passions or feelings which may sometimes be vigorously apprehended even by inferior artists, but in the penetrating power with which the single great master dives into the recesses of the heart, plucks forth its hidden treasures, and embodies them in living forms before our eyes. Throughout, the same spirit and originality in the conception of his characters are combined with the same constancy in sustaining them; the same vivid impression of the varied phenomena of nature, with the same graphic powers of description, perspicuity of narrative, and harmony of numbers. Were therefore the authorship of the poems, over which these excellences are so copiously spread, to be parcelled out as has been proposed, the dark ages of Greece would present the phenomenon, not merely of one, but of a legion of heroic bards, equalling or surpassing the greatest of which any other age or country can boast. With this improbability would be combined the little less marvellous circumstance, that these transcendantly gifted minstrels, amid the variety of materials which tradition placed at their disposal, should have conspired in selecting the Troic series of adventures, or even two limited portions of it, while the crowd of second-rate poets were equally unanimous in preferring different subjects, or different portions of the same. To the above coincidences need scarcely be added, as regards the more popular form of the modern theory, the still more marvellous coincidence, that these poems, after several centuries of circulation in their separate capacity, should have been found to constitute the parts of two vast integral epopees, each following out a continuous train of events through numerous complicated vicissitudes: that one part should have suggested itself as a beginning, another as a middle, a third as an end; that the rest should have afforded appropriate episodes; and that each should have been interspersed with mutual references to the incidents destined by the presiding genius of Parnassus to go before and follow after: that one should have contained a prophecy of events to be carried into effect in the sequel, and in due time as punctually fulfilled in another, with, perhaps, an equally pointed reference to the prediction : that each should have taken up in its turn the same series of actors, in the persons not only of the more prominent heroes, but of the subordinate, and, for the most part, purely fictitious characters, heralds, charioteers, goatherds, waiting-maids, even warriors of remote Asiatic regions, whose epic importance consists mainly in their sonorous names ; pure Greek names, in many cases, assigned to Paphlagonian or Halizonian barbarians, and which it is incredible could be the simultaneous invention of each poet for the occasion.

Consistency
in the poet's portraiture of character.

5. It is probable that, like most other great painters of human nature, Homer was indebted to previous tradition for the original sketches of his principal heroes. These sketches, however, could have been little more than outlines which, as worked up into the finished portraits of the Iliad and Odyssey, must rank as his own genuine productions. In every branch of imitative art, this faculty of representing to the life the moral phenomena of our nature in their varied phases of virtue, vice, weakness, or eccentricity, is the highest and rarest attribute of genius ; and rarest of all as exercised by Homer through the medium of dramatic action, where the characters are never formally described, but made to develop themselves by their own language and conduct. It is this, among his many great qualities, which chiefly raises Homer above all other poets of his own class ; nor, with the single exception perhaps of the great English dramatist, has any poet ever produced so numerous and spirited a variety of original characters, of different ages, ranks, and sexes. Still more peculiar to himself than their variety is the unity of thought, feeling, and expression, often of minute phraseology, with which they are individually sustained, and yet without an appearance of effort on the part of their author. Each describes himself spontaneously, when brought on the scene; just as the automata of Vulcan in the Odyssey, though indebted to the divine artist for the mechanism on which they move, appear to perform their functions by their own unaided powers. That any two or more poets should simultaneously have conceived such a character as Achilles is next to impossible. Still less credible is it, that the different parts of the Iliad, where the hero successively appears as the same sublime ideal being, under the influence of the same combination of virtues, failings, and passions, thinking, speaking, acting, and suffering, according to the same single type of heroic grandeur, can be the production of more than a single mind. Such evidence is perhaps even stronger in the case of the less prominent actors, in so far as it is still less possible that different artists should simultaneously agree in their portraits of mere subordinate incidental personages, than of heroes whose renown may have rendered their characters a species of public property. Two poets of the Elizabethan age might, without any concert, have harmonised to a great extent in their portrait of Henry V. ; but that the correspondence should have extended to the imaginary companions of his youth, the Falstaffs, Pistols, Bardolphs, Quicklys, were incredible. But the nicest shades of peculiarity in the inferior actors of the Iliad and Odyssey are conceived and maintained in the same spirit of distinction as in Achilles or Hector. Even where there exists some bond of connexion, ethic or historical, between the destinies of certain pairs of heroes, as of Achilles and Patroclus, Hector and Paris, Agamemnon and Menelaus, the poet has, with the most subtle though palpable design, availed himself of this contingency, as will hereafter be demonstrated, in adapting or contrasting as it may be, the relations of the one to the other, so as to give more effectual relief to the distinctive peculiarities of each.¹

society which pro-

6. The most comprehensive, and perhaps upon the whole, most plausible, objection, on the ground of internal evidence, to the popular view, is the improbability that, in "so rude an age," any poet should have conceived so vast and complicated a scheme of epic action as the Iliad or Odyssey; or that two such works, even if executed, could have been preserved entire to posterity. In order rightly to appreciate this difficulty, attention must be recalled to a distinction, already noticed, between the earlier and more advanced stages of the poetical art. The rules laid down by the standard antient critics cannot, unless in rare and partial instances, be considered as their own invention. The critical office consists in eliciting and reducing to system, from the original works of genius, those laws, to the intuitive observance of which the authors of the works owe their fame and popularity. That, without the example of such original models, the ingenuity of speculative bookmaking should have devised any abstract norm of theoretical perfection for the higher branches of poetry, is repugnant to all experience. This, however, is the anomaly which the objection above stated presupposes in the case of epic composition, where it is perhaps more especially unlikely to have found place. Nor must it be overlooked that, whatever sceptical doubts may have been entertained as to an original unity of the whole design, the elegance of detail by which the parts are adorned has never been denied to be the genuine offspring of the old heroic minstrelsy. Here, again, is an obvious reversal of what reason and experience teach in such cases. While elegance of detail is the proper characteristic of an advanced stage of art, magnitude of design is that of its earlier epochs in every country. If the semibarbarous age of Greece could produce a poet distinguished by all the individual elements of excellence, perspicuity of style, richness of imagery, harmony of numbers, and above all by purity and depth of moral sentiment, it could hardly have denied him the faculty of combining these elements into a comprehensive and symmetrical whole. The same principle extends to other branches of primeval art. How the stupendous masses of Tiryns or Stonehenge were conveyed and adjusted will ever remain wonderful to civilised posterity. We do not, however, insist on discovering in them the work of a colony of accomplished mathematicians; but were they arranged in graceful architectural forms, and adorned with finely executed sculptures, the latter inference would be unavoidable. Any theory therefore which, while it concedes the surpassing finish of detail in the Iliad and Odyssey to the so-called barbarous age of their author, can only explain their vastness of design as an effort of the professional ingenuity of later times, is essentially paradoxical.

Admitting then the perfecting of epic art, the transition from legends of petty adventure to the completion of a great heroic poem, to be the office rather of inspired genius than of bookmaking artifice, it may further confidently be asserted, that the state of society most favourable to the development of such genius is precisely that pictured in the Iliad; that intermediate stage namely, equally removed from the extremes of barbarism and refinement, which, free from the artificial distinction of vulgarity and politeness, admits of contemporary objects, interwoven with personal feelings and sympathies, being made the subject of poetical description. In order rightly to judge on this point, it will be necessary to discard, or greatly qualify, the epithets "rude" and "barbarous," so frequently bestowed on the age of Homer, and test it by his own descriptions. We there find a race among whom civilisation was sufficiently matured to impart splendour to the social fabric, without impairing their own martial ferocity or simplicity of habits. In the upper class we perceive an order of patriarchal nobility, clothed in elegant garments; protected by highly wrought armour; inhabiting spacious mansions adorned with colonnades, gilding, statuary, and pleasure-gardens; delighting in music, poetry, and oratory; performing journeys in chariots, with an ease and rapidity scarcely conceivable in a country not intersected with made roads; and navigating in fifty-oar galleys, with a freedom equal or superior to their descendants centuries afterwards. The population reside chiefly in towns, with the exception of those engaged in agriculture, which art is carried to a high state of perfection in all its leading branches as cultivated in later times, while many of the elementary trades and manufactures are exercised as distinct professions. Such is Homer's own picture of the social condition of his age, betraying certainly no such barbarism as to preclude the highest development of the epic faculty. A few generations later, it might with better reason be urged, that the change of manners would have interposed serious obstacles to the production of two such poems, by blunting the heroic enthusiasm of their author, and substituting the studied magniloquence of Æschylus or Pindar for the native simplicity and grandeur of Homer.

7. The fact that poets of ordinary talents, at a period not essentially different from that which produced the Iliad, had succeeded in embodying the same or a similar series of events in long narratives, is established by the existence of those other primitive works, Thebais, Cypria, Ilii-persis, and others, the genuine integrity of which has never been seriously impugned. It were surely a strange distinction to allow to an inferior genius of the ante-Olympic era the capacity of inditing a long epopee of inferior merit, and yet deny to a genius of surpassing excellence the ability to compose one of just and happy proportions.¹ But, in fact, the descriptions given in the Odyssey, of the poems recited by the minstrels who figure in its action, afford conclusive evidence that works of a similarly extensive character were familiar to its author. Attention may, in particular, be directed to that recited by the Phæacian bard Demodocus, under the title of Hippocosmos, or the “Stratagem of the Horse.” The narrative of this poem, according to the poet’s own epitome of its contents¹ as here subjoined, must have comprised the whole series of events from the fabric of the fatal image down to the sack of the city and recovery of Helen, as actually treated by Homer’s Cyclic successors in the works entitled Ilii-persis, or Destruction of Troy.²

“After the usual procemium invoking the divine aid, the scene opens in the quarters of the Greeks, who are described as setting fire to their camp and sailing from the coast, in order to delude the Trojans into the belief of their having finally abandoned the siege, leaving the wooden horse as an atoning gift to the protecting gods of the city. We are then transported to Troy, where the colossal image, manned by the bravest of the Greeks, is found already lodged in the agora, and the inhabitants are engaged in warm debate as to its disposal. Some, suspecting treachery, were for opening the planks to ascertain its contents; others for throwing it at once over the cliffs of the citadel. A third party asserted the sincerity of the offering, and the propriety of its dedication in the temple of the goddess. The latter opinion prevails, through a decree of destiny that the city should fall as soon as the wooden horse was admitted within its ramparts. The final success of the stratagem is then described; the issue of the warriors from their ambush, and their exploits in different quarters of the city. The brunt of the struggle is concentrated round the dwelling of Helen and Deiphobus, under the conduct of Menelaus and Ulysses, who, supported by Minerva, finally secure the complete victory of the Greeks."

The artistic epic arrangement of this poem appears from a collation of its title with its contents. The "Hippocosmos," literally, Preparation or Outfit of the Horse, ought historically speaking to form the introductory scene. But the poem opens with the subsequent operations of the Greek armament; nor is there a word of the horse itself until, on the scene shifting to Troy, it is found already within the walls. Here then was the proper place for the description of the actual Hippocosmos, the fabric and equipment of the horse, with the list of heroes it contained, as a retrospective episode. Besides this subsidiary narrative, the epitome alludes to other heads of matter sufficient to swell the poem out to a bulk little short of an Iliad or Odyssey. For example, the two verses,

514. ἤειδεν δ' ὡς ἄστυ διέπραθον υἷες Ἀχαιῶν, ἰππόθεν ἐκχύμενοι, κοῖλον λόχον ἐκπρολιπόντες,

comprehend the return of the fleet from its ambush on the neighbouring coasts, the secret march of the Greeks to the city, the issue of their comrades from the horse, occupation of the gates, and admission of the main body. What a copious mass of epic materials is also suggested by the line

516. ἄλλον δ' ἄλλη ἄειδε πόλιν κεραϊζέμεν αἰπήν, indicating the separate adventures of Neoptolemus, the lesser Ajax, and others so celebrated in the Cyclic accounts of the catastrophe. More specific mention is made of the assault on the abode of Helen, whose capture forms an appropriate close to the poem and the vicissitudes of the war.

Subdivision of the following ana-

8. The properties of every such poem as the Iliad or Odyssey may, as objects of analytical criticism, be classed under three heads: the plan and conduct of the action; the conception and portraiture of character; and those features of detail in language, sentiment, or imagery which, amid the poverty of our critical vocabulary, fall to be comprised under the general denomination of Style. In regard to the first two heads, the analysis of each poem will here require to be taken separately. The third head will embrace both poems simultaneously; the evidence of parallel passages, and of correspondence in language, sentiment, and imagery, bearing no less immediately on the question of unity of origin in the two poems than in the separate parts of each. There is however one important element of epic composition, its divine or supernatural mechanism, which, while also common to both poems, can hardly with propriety be included under any one of these heads. The direct agency of the gods on human affairs, by constituting them in some degree leading characters of each work, might seem indeed to entitle them to a place under the second head. That agency, however, also comprehends an essential portion of the figurative imagery of the poems, involving questions altogether foreign to the mere human department of their action. It will, therefore, be more appropriately ranked under a separate head of Divine mechanism.

BEFORE turning our attention to the higher features of poetical or moral design in the action of the Iliad, it will be proper to consider how far even the purely mechanical structure of the text is compatible with the operations of more than a single workman. The subjoined epitome has, accordingly, been drawn up with the view of placing in a more distinct light the minuter links in the chain of connexion, and will hence, it need scarcely be added, be found to comprise matters of detail not usually thought worthy of a place in a similar compendium.

I.

The poet invokes the Muse to celebrate the anger of Achilles and its consequences, the reverses of the Greek arms, and slaughter of many heroes. Chryses, priest of Apollo, arrives in the camp for the purpose of ransoming his daughter Chryseïs, taken by Achilles in the sack of the neighbouring town of Thebes, and allotted to Agamemnon as his share of the spoil. The petition of Chryses is contemptuously rejected by Atrides; and Apollo, in revenge, sends a pestilence into the host. On the tenth day Achilles calls a council, when the augur Calchas, at his behest, expounds the cause of the divine wrath, and urges its propitiation by restoring Chryseïs to her father. Agamemnon accedes to this proposal, but declares his intention, to which he adheres in spite of a remonstrance from Nestor¹, of indemnifying himself for the loss of the damsel by appropriating Briseïs, the favourite mistress of Achilles. That hero, furious at the insult, is about to inflict summary vengeance on its author, when he is checked by Minerva, who assures him "that ere long his anger will be propitiated by an offer of gifts many times the value of what he is about to lose."¹ Achilles acquiesces, but resolves to abstain from all further part in the war, and foretells that the day is not far distant when Agamemnon, "witnessing the destruction of his host by the arms of Hector, will repent of his insolence to the best of his warriors." Chryseïs is sent back to her parents, and Briseïs is led off from the tent of Achilles to that of Agamemnon. Achilles supplicates his mother Thetis, to persuade Jupiter to avenge his wrongs by the discomfiture of the Greeks. He also describes the sack of Thebes, "the city of Eëtion," in which Chryseïs was taken.² Thetis fulfils her son's request, on the return of Jupiter from Ethiopia twelve days afterwards.³ Her prayer is granted, and confirmed by a nod of Jupiter's head⁴, much against the will of Juno, a warm friend to the Greek cause.

II.

On the morrow Jove, mindful of his promise to Thetis, encourages Agamemnon in a dream⁵ with an assurance of the speedy conquest of the city. In the ensuing council of war it is decided accordingly to march out to battle, after a long debate in which these events are described as taking place in the ninth year of the war.⁶ Thersites reproaches Agamemnon with his treatment of Achilles. Nestor advises Agamemnon to marshal the troops according to their different tribes.⁷ A catalogue is given of the armament, with a more succinct account of the Trojan forces, who advance to the combat. Two Hellenic chiefs, Protesilaus and Philoctetes, are described, the latter as absent on account of disease, the former as slain on the first landing of the army.⁸ The secession of Achilles is alluded to, with its cause, Agamemnon's insulting treatment of him, in the seizure of his mistress Briseïs, the maid of Lyrnessus⁹, captured by him in the sack of that city, when Thebes also was destroyed. An assurance is added of his being speedily restored to the battle. Two Mysian

III.

On the advance of the two armies, Paris challenges Menelaus to single combat, on condition that Helen and her property shall be awarded to the victor. Priam is sent for to ratify the agreement. He is found sitting on the ramparts with Helen, of whom he inquires the names of the Greek heroes in the distance. Allusion is made by Antenor to the embassy of Menelaus and Ulysses to claim Helen, previous to the declaration of war by the Greeks.² Paris, defeated by Menelaus, is rescued by Venus, who conveys him to Helen's apartments³ in the city. Agamemnon claims the victory and stipulated prize for his brother.

IV.

Jupiter, in furtherance of his views relative to the future course of the war, dispatches Minerva to prevent the fulfilment of the treaty.⁴ She persuades Pandarus, prince of Lycia, to shoot treacherously at Menelaus, who is slightly wounded⁵, and the Trojans again advance to the attack. Agamemnon, in marshalling the host, reproves Diomed⁶ for want of zeal, and bids him remember the valiant exploits of his father Tydeus⁷, under the auspices of Minerva, in the war of Thebes. Mars takes the field as champion of the Trojans, Pallas of the Greeks.⁸ The Trojans, giving way, are reminded by Apollo from their citadel, that Achilles no longer fights in the ranks of the enemy.⁹ Piroüs, chief of the Thracians¹⁰, is slain.

V.

Diomed under the patronage of Minerva signalises himself. Minerva persuades Mars to retire from the battle.¹¹ Diomed, wounded by an arrow of Pandarus, is healed by his patroness, who orders him to avoid collision with the other deities, but to attack Venus should she interfere. Pandarus, expressing mortification at the failure of his shots at Menelaus and Diomed¹², mounts the chariot of Æneas, and in a joint assault on Diomed is slain.

Æneas is rescued by Apollo, but Diomed obtains possession of his horses.¹ Mars joins Hector in a charge on the Greeks. Diomed, observing the approach of the god, advises his countrymen to retreat. Minerva reproaches him with pusillanimity, reminding him that, when Achilles fought in the Greek ranks², the Trojans ventured not so much as to quit the walls of their city, and taunts him with inferiority to his father Tydeus³ her former favourite, whose exploits in the Theban war she contrasts with his own present backwardness. Diomed justifies his conduct, as in compliance with her injunctions not to oppose the gods. Commending his obedience, she takes her place by his side in his chariot, and by a thrust of the hero's spear⁴ Mars is disabled and flies.

Acamas, the remaining Thracian chief⁵, is slain by Ajax. Helenus the Trojan augur sends Hector to the city to propitiate Minerva, that she may restrain the valour of Diomed, which he considers "no less formidable than that of Achilles had formerly been."⁶ Diomed and Glaucus, in a friendly dialogue, agree to avoid hostile collision during the remainder of the war. Hector arrives at Troy, and after performing his commission visits Paris, whom he finds still in Helen's apartment.⁷ Andromache implores Hector to moderate his valour, reminding him of her family afflictions, consequent on the destruction by Achilles of her native city Thebes.⁸ Hector returns to the field accompanied by Paris.

VII.

The havoc committed by the two Trojan chiefs on rejoining the battle, induces Minerva to accept Apollo's proposal of a single combat between Hector and one of the Greek heroes. Hector accordingly challenges the best among them, apologising at the same time for the violation of the late treaty, on the plea of its having been so ordained by Jupiter.⁹ The lot falls upon Ajax, who boasts that "Hector will find the Greek camp contains other notable warriors besides the deserter Achilles."¹⁰ The combatants are separated by nightfall. In the Trojan council, Antenor recommends the restoration of Helen, in fulfilment¹¹ of the late treaty, auguring nothing but disaster in a cause where they fight under perjured vows. Paris refuses to part with his mistress. A day's truce is agreed on for the burial of the slain. The Greeks construct a rampart for the protection of the camp; but, owing to the just inaugural rites having been neglected, the gods decree the destruction of the work at the close of the war.¹ Euneüs, king of Lemnos², sends a present of a thousand measures of wine to Agamemnon.

VIII.

The next morning Jove issues an order³ to the deities to abstain from all part in the action, which he views seated on Mount Ida, and turns the tide of success against the Greeks. Nestor is saved by Diomed, through the fleetness of the horses he had captured from Æneas.⁴ The Greeks, driven back on their camp, are rallied by Agamemnon from the deck of the ship of Ulysses in the centre of the line, the extremities of which are flanked by the ships of Achilles and Ajax.⁵ Neptune, pressed by Juno to succour the Greeks, refuses to disobey the order of Jove.⁶ Juno and Pallas complain bitterly of Jupiter for yielding to the prayers of Thetis⁷ on behalf of Achilles, and determine, in the face of the divine order, to proceed to the field. They are however deterred by a threatening message from Jupiter⁸, who then returns from Ida to Olympus.⁹ He there announces his intention of reducing the Greeks to still greater straits the next day, until the death of Patroclus shall restore Achilles to their ranks.¹⁰ Darkness interrupts the assault of the Trojans on the camp. Hector takes up his quarters on the plain, kindling watch-fires¹¹, and bent on renewing the attack next morning.

IX.

Agamemnon, in despair at this reverse of fortune, complains of the deceit practised on him by Jupiter¹², and proposes in council to embark for Greece during the night. Diomed reprobrates his pusillanimity, and contrasts it with his former boldness, when reproving himself¹³ for a merely apparent tardiness for the combat.

Nestor enjoins the posting of a guard¹ round the rampart, and that Agamemnon should entertain the chiefs in his quarters, now well supplied with wine recently arrived from Thrace.² At supper he reminds Agamemnon how unwisely his former remonstrance³ against exasperating Achilles had been slighted, and counsels him to appease the hero's wrath. Atreides consents to restore Briseis, adding other precious gifts.⁴ Ulysses, Ajax, and Phoenix are sent as a deputation to Achilles, who spurns all offers of conciliation. Scornfully contrasting Agamemnon's present humility with his late overbearing conduct, he ridicules their attempt to defend the host by a rampart, as a substitute for his valour. He reminds them that, while he fought, the Trojans dare not venture beyond their walls⁵; and declares that he will not raise an arm for the relief, until Hector shall approach his own tents, ravaging the ships with fire and sword.⁶ On the return of the mission the chiefs retire to rest.

Agamemnon, harassed by the view of the Trojan fires⁷ on the plain and by his gloomy prospects for the morrow, rises from his couch and rouses Nestor and Menelaus, who console him with the hope that Achilles may yet relent in time to restore their fortunes. The other chiefs are awakened in order to visit the guard⁸, Diomed being dispatched for Ajax at his quarters in the extremity of the line.⁹ Diomed and Ulysses, during the night, explore the Trojan position. The former hero supplicates Pallas to continue to him the favour vouchsafed of old to his father Tydeus in the Theban war.¹⁰ Seizing and killing Dolon, a spy of Hector, on their way, they penetrate the hostile lines, slay Rhesus a Thracian chief newly arrived¹¹, and lead off his horses and chariot to the Greek camp.

XI.

In the morning the Goddess of discord, by Jove's orders, standing on the ship of Ulysses in the centre of the line, excites the army to action from the flank of Ajax to that of Achilles.¹² Agamemnon marshals his troops outside of the ditch. Hector advances from his quarters on the crown of the plain.¹³ Discord, alone among the deities, is now present, the rest being restrained by the decree of Jove¹, who again takes up his post on Mount Ida.² Agamemnon kills two sons of Antimachus, the Trojan elder who had proposed in the council of Priam to murder Menelaus and Ulysses on their embassy³ to reclaim Helen. Soon after, wounded⁴ himself in the hand by Coon son of Antenor, Atrides retires from the field, after killing Coon. Diomed also withdraws, wounded in the heel by an arrow of Paris.⁵ Ulysses⁶, Machaon the physician⁷ and his brother Eurypylus⁸ are also disabled by wounds and retire. Machaon is driven to the camp by Nestor, who entertains him with wine in his tent.⁹ Achilles, observing the chariot pass, sends Patroclus to inquire the name of the wounded hero, "a message pregnant with future evil to Patroclus." Nestor informs Patroclus of the wounds of Agamemnon, Diomed, and Ulysses¹⁰, and implores him to intercede with Achilles, either to come to the rescue, or to send the Myrmidon host under his own command.¹¹ On his way back to the tent of Achilles, Patroclus meets Eurypylus led off the field, and, accompanying him to his tent, assists in dressing his wound.¹²

XII.

While Patroclus tends the wounded Eurypylus¹³, the Greeks are driven to their entrenchments, the future destruction of which¹⁴, formerly threatened by Apollo and Neptune, is now distinctly foretold. Hector, by advice of Polydamas the seer,

It is amusing to observe the blunders into which the more unscrupulous disciples of Wolf are occasionally led by their zeal to detect the blunders of Homer. One of the arguments urged by Hermann (Op. Misc. vol. v. p. 64.) in favour of his proposal to assign to a separate poet the whole text from v. 47. of B. viii. to the end of B. xii., is the perversity, as he describes it, of the existing arrangement, where Jupiter, after having at v. 439. of B. viii. returned from Ida to Olympus, is suddenly, and without further notice, at the opening of B. xiii., found again seated on the top of the former mountain. Is not the perversity rather on the part of the critic, who has overlooked this passage of B. xi. ? ³ 125. 138.; conf. iii. 203., et locc. citt. ⁴ 252.; conf. xix. 53., xiv. 28., xvi. 26. ⁵ 399.; conf. 376., xiv. 28., xvi. 25. ⁶ 434. 487.; conf. xiv. 28., xvi. 26. ⁷ 506.; conf. xiv. 6. ⁸ 583.; conf. xvi. 27., xii. 1., et locc. citt. ⁹ 517. 598. 650.; conf. xiv. 1. ¹⁰ 660. sqq.; conf. xiv. 28., et locc. citt. ¹¹ 796.; conf. xvi. 38., xv. 64. ¹² 809.; conf. xii. 1., xv. 392., xvi. 27. ¹³ 1.; conf. xi. 583. 809., xvi. 25., et locc. citt. ¹⁴ 6.; conf. vii. 450.

causes his troops to dismount and attack on foot. Asius alone, with his chariot, clears the ditch, "which he was never to recross alive, being destined to perish in it by the hand of Idomeneus."¹ Hector succeeds in forcing one of the gates. Glaucus is slightly wounded by an arrow of Teucrus.²

XIII.

Jupiter, still seated on Mount Ida, "not suspecting that after his prohibition³ any deity will venture to take part in the fight," turns his attention to another quarter of the earth. Neptune avails himself of this opportunity⁴, in the disguise of Calchas, to rally the Greeks, disheartened by the loss of so many of their heroes, and deprived, through Agamemnon's ill-judged rashness, of the services of their best champion. Jupiter, on the other hand, continues his favour to the Trojans, "in fulfilment of his promise to Thetis."⁵ Idomeneus signalises himself, killing Asius⁶, with other Trojan heroes. Deiphobus kills Ascalaphus a son of Mars, without the knowledge of that deity, restrained by Jove's command⁷ from the battle. Hector directs the assault on the Greek lines in front of the ship of Protesilaus⁸, their weakest point.

Nestor, still sitting drinking in his tent with Machaon⁹, while that hero's wound is dressed¹⁰, hearing the tumult increase, goes

One more example may be subjoined of the imperfect knowledge of the poet's text upon which this writer's formidable system of scepticism is based. Among his arguments (op. cit. p. 66.) in favour of the "singulum carmen" supposed to be encased in the thirteenth book (v. 344—674.) is the occurrence in those 330 lines alone, among the portions of the text devoted to military matters, of exulting addresses by victorious heroes to their fallen enemies. The value of this remark may be tested by a reference to the following eleven parallel passages, three of which are in the immediate sequel of this same engagement: xiv. 453. 469. 478., xvi. 744. 829., xx. 388., xxi. 121. 183., xi. 362. 379. 449.

forth to reconnoitre. He meets the three disabled heroes¹, Agamemnon, Diomed, and Ulysses, the former of whom chides the old warrior for leaving the field, expressing his alarm lest other heroes should, like Achilles, have taken offence at him. Neptune consoles him, condemning the conduct of Achilles.² Juno, by aid of Venus, lulls Jupiter to sleep on Mount Ida, fearing lest his attention should be recalled to the affairs of Troy, and to the interference of Neptune.³ Neptune assures the Greeks that Hector's boldness, caused solely by his knowledge of the absence of Achilles⁴, might be checked by a vigorous display of valour. Hector, stunned by a blow of Ajax⁵, is carried to the rear. Menelaus slays Hyperenor.⁶

XV.

The Greeks repulse the Trojans from the lines. Jupiter, awakening on Mount Ida, reproaches Juno with her treachery⁷, and orders Neptune off the field.⁸ He then pronounces the decree of Fate: "that the Greeks shall be routed until danger threatens the quarters of Achilles, who will then send Patroclus into action.⁹ After slaying Sarpedon¹⁰, Patroclus will himself fall by the hand of Hector.¹¹ Achilles will then arise and avenge his friend's death on the Trojan chief¹²; and henceforward fortune will favour the Greeks. But no relief can be granted until the wrath of Achilles be satiated, as promised to Thetis, and confirmed by a nod of the divine head."¹³ Mars, informed of the death¹⁴ of his son Ascalaphus, arms for vengeance, but is restrained by Minerva from his threatened act of disobedience.¹⁵ Jupiter then dispatches Apollo to restore the disabled Hector¹⁶, and complete the rout of the Greeks suspended by the interference of Neptune. They are again driven back with great loss to their lines. Patroclus, alarmed for the safety of the camp, returns from the tent of Eurypylus¹⁷ to that of Achilles, for the purpose of again imploring him to relent. The Trojans surmount the rampart; and Hector, seizing the ship

"which had brought Protesilaus to Troy, but which never restored him to his native land,"¹ and rejoicing in the glorious change of the late timid line of Trojan tactics², orders his troops to advance with torches, and set fire to the fleet.

XVI.

Patroclus, following Nestor's advice, describes to Achilles the rout of the Greeks, the disablement of Agamemnon, Ulysses, Diomed, and Eurypylos³, with the danger to which the camp is exposed, and begs permission to put on the hero's armour, and go forth with the Myrmidons to the relief.⁴ Achilles, "although he had formerly resolved to afford no aid until his own quarters were assailed by the hostile⁵ fire," consents, but enjoins Patroclus to abstain from distant pursuit, and return when he has delivered the camp. Observing the nearer approach of the flames, he becomes urgent himself with Patroclus and his men to arm and sally forth. Patroclus accordingly, equipped in the armour and mounting the chariot of Achilles, advances at the head of 2500 Myrmidons, fifty from each of the fifty ships⁶ of the hero, to the burning vessel of Protesilaus⁷, where the brunt of the battle still continued. The Trojans, mistaking Patroclus for Achilles, are seized with panic and repulsed. Sarpedon is slain by Patroclus.⁸ Apollo is sent by Jupiter to rescue the body. Glaucus, though still suffering from the wound received from Teucrus in mounting the wall⁹, gallantly defends the corpse of his brother. It is rescued by Apollo, after having been stripped of its arms by the Myrmidon troops.¹⁰ Patroclus, in breach of the order of Achilles, pursuing the enemy towards the city, is stunned by a blow from Apollo¹¹, then stabbed by Euphorbus¹² son of Panthoüs, and finally dispatched by Hector¹³, whose speedy death by the hand of Achilles¹⁴ he prophesies with his last words. Automedon, the charioteer of Achilles, pursued by Hector, escapes with his equipage to the camp.¹⁵

Euphorbus boasts of his share in the death of that hero.¹ Menelaus, reminding him of the recent fate of his brother Hyperenor², slain by himself in the early part of the battle, attacks and kills him. Hector, recalled by Apollo from the pursuit of Automedon³, arrays himself in the arms of Achilles, stripped from the body of Patroclus.⁴ Jupiter pronounces that he shall not return alive in them to Troy. The divine⁵ horses of Achilles bewail the death of Patroclus. Jupiter, having now willed a change in the destinies of the war⁶, sends Pallas, in the likeness of Phoenix, to encourage the Greeks. Menelaus dispatches Antilochus to announce to Achilles the death of his friend. The Greeks obtain possession of the body.

Achilles is overwhelmed with grief at the intelligence. Thetis, alarmed by his cry of distress, rises from the ocean, and inquires what can so afflict him, now that Jove's promise⁷ to avenge his wrongs has been fulfilled. She engages to procure him a new suit of armour from Vulcan, in the room of that he had lost.⁸ Warned by Iris that the body of Patroclus is again in danger, he appears on the ramparts, and with his shout of war puts the Trojans to flight, when darkness terminates the action. Polydamas, the seer, proposes in the Trojan council that they should avoid pitched battles, now that Achilles is again in the field, and shut themselves up within their walls.⁹ Hector scornfully rejects this advice.¹⁰ Achilles delays the obsequies of Patroclus until he shall have slain Hector, and captured twelve noble Trojans¹¹ to sacrifice on the funeral pile of his friend. Thetis, in requesting new arms from Vulcan for her son, relates the vicissitudes of his lot, the insult of Agamemnon, the vain attempt at reconciliation, the permission obtained by Patroclus to aid the Greeks equipped in the arms of his chief, and his own death by the joint agency of Apollo and Hector.¹² Vulcan prepares a suit of armour, with a shield of five plies of metal.¹³ attended by Agamemnon, though still suffering¹ from the wound received from Coon son of Antenor, and by the other disabled heroes, Ulysses and Diomed.² The reconciliation then takes place, unconditionally on the part of Achilles; but Agamemnon, restoring Briseïs the maid of Lyrnessus³, confers on the hero all the gifts offered by Ulysses the day before.⁴ Xanthus, the favourite horse of Achilles, prophesies⁵ his master's death, through the same hostile agency of Apollo⁶ which caused that of Patroclus.

XX.

Jupiter, assembling the deities, revokes his previous interdict⁷ against their interference, "lest the Trojans, who had never yet made head against Achilles in the field⁸, should, now that he is further embittered by the loss of his friend, be unable, without divine aid, even to defend the walls of their city." Æneas encounters Achilles, who reminds him of a former escape from death at his hand in the war of Lyrnessus.⁹ The spear of the Dardanian chief can penetrate but two of the five plies¹⁰ of the divine shield. He is rescued by Neptune, whose hatred to the line of Priam does not extend to that of Anchises. Achilles kills Polydorus, son of Priam.¹¹ Hector, engaging Achilles, is preserved from death by Apollo.¹²

XXI.

Achilles, driving the enemy into the river Scamander¹³, captures twelve youths¹⁴ for sacrifice to the manes of Patroclus. He then kills Lycaon¹⁵, a son of Priam, full brother of Polydorus slain by him shortly before, and who had also some weeks previously been taken prisoner by him, and ransomed by Euneüs¹⁶ of Lemnos. His next victim is Asteropæus, chief of the Pæonians, whom he spoils of his arms.¹⁷ He is then himself assailed by the river god, but defended by Vulcan. Mars attacks Minerva, reproaching her

Priam, from the wall, exhorts Hector to take refuge from Achilles within the gate, reminding him of the recent fate of his brothers Lycaon and Polydorus.² Hector remains, ashamed to quit the field, after his late boast to Polydamas³ that he would single-handed defend the city against Achilles. Apollo, foreseeing the fatal hour of his favourite to be arrived, withdraws the protection hitherto vouchsafed him⁴, and he is slain. Achilles, himself resplendent with the arms of Vulcan⁵, strips his fallen enemy of those plundered from Patroclus⁶, and drags the body to the camp at his chariot-wheels.

The day following, Achilles performs the obsequies of his friend, sacrificing on his funeral pile the twelve Trojan youths.⁷ Apollo⁸ preserves the body of Hector from corruption. On the morrow, Achilles celebrates the funeral games of Patroclus, but takes no part himself in the chariot race, owing to the grief of his immortal steeds⁹ for the death of that hero. Diomed conquers with the horses taken from Æneas when their owner was preserved by Apollo.¹⁰ Among the prizes distributed by Achilles are, the arms spoiled from Asteropæus¹¹; a silver cup, received as the price of Lycaon, son of Priam, from Euneüs of Lemnos¹²; the arms stripped by Patroclus from Sarpedon¹³; and a ball of iron taken in the sack of Thebes.¹⁴

Achilles continues to drag the corpse of Hector daily round the tomb of Patroclus, while Apollo preserves it from decay.¹⁵ Thetis, by order of Jupiter, exhorts Achilles to restore it if demanded. On the twelfth day Priam, warned by a message from Jupiter, visits in person the tent of Achilles, and supplicates the restoration of the body. The request is granted. The old king, passing the night in the Myrmidon camp, returns next morning with his precious burthen to Troy, and after nine days' preparation performs the obsequies of his son.

Diomed.

2. The extent and value of the above concordance in the mechanical structure of the poem¹ will be better appreciated, if traced in detail through one or more of those portions of the text to which, by sceptical commentators, appeal has chiefly been made as betraying a former independance of character.

Let us first examine the "rhapsody" called, in the old subdivision of the poem, the "Prowess of Diomed," comprising the fifth and sixth books according to the existing arrangement.²

I. The first line ushers the reader into the midst of a battle, without any notice of where or why it was fought, or who were the contending parties, by the announcement that "Pallas there urged Diomed into the thickest of the fight." Such an exordium plainly assumes, on the part of the poet's audience, a previous knowledge of a combat already commenced and interrupted. II. That this combat belonged to the few weeks of the Trojan war marked by the secession of Achilles is proved, not only by his absence from the field, but by several pointed allusions to its cause. III. The deities left in immediate charge of the interrupted action of the previous book were, Mars on the side of the Trojans, Minerva on that of the

² The old limits of this canto have been differently fixed by different authorities. That of Herodotus (II. cxvi.), as the earliest, has here been preferred. The first part of B. VI. is also occasionally distinguished by its proper title of "Interview between Hector and Andromache;" but the action even there continues to hinge essentially on the "Prowess of Diomed."

Greeks. At the commencement of this book, accordingly, Minerva's first care is, by a stratagem, to procure Mars's retirement from the field, and a consequent freer scope for the exploits of her favourite hero. IV. The leading occurrence of the previous book is the violation of the truce between the two armies by the treacherous shot of Pandarus. To this outrage Pandarus himself alludes in the renewed action, expressing his modification at its only partial success; and his own death by the hand of Diomed forms an appropriate conclusion of his career. V. Diomed defeats Æneas, and obtains possession of his horses. This prize, with the circumstances attending its acquisition, is afterwards repeatedly noticed by the victor; first in the eighth book and again in the twenty-third. VI. Diomed successively wounds Venus and Mars. The latter achievement is referred to in the twenty-first book by the injured god himself. VII. Minerva reminds the Greeks that, "while Achilles fought in their ranks, the Trojans never ventured to advance beyond the gates of their city." This statement is confirmed by Achilles himself in the ninth book, and by other heroes in numerous parallel passages. VIII. Diomed and Glaucus, after their dialogue, agree to avoid hostile encounter during the remainder of the war, and the compact is carefully observed in the sequel. IX. Paris, who acts a prominent part in the preceding and subsequent engagements, does not appear in that now described, having in the third book, after his defeat by Menelaus, been carried off by Venus to repose in his wife's apartments. X. Accordingly Hector, on his visit to Troy to propitiate Minerva, finds him loitering in Helen's chamber, and orders him back to the field. XI. Andromache describes Achilles as destroyer of her native city. This exploit is ascribed to the same hero in numerous other parts of the poem.

That these coincidences could be the result of chance is incredible; and it certainly requires a wide stretch of sceptical credulity to believe that Pisi-stratus, or any other primitive bookmaker, should have possessed either the inclination or the means of interlarding his disjointed stock of materials with such a series of mutual references. The same species of interconnexion might be exemplified throughout. It were, however, superfluous to follow up an operation which the reader may, if he think fit, by aid of the foregoing compendium perform quite as effectually for himself, and the results of which will occasionally be found curious, as well as convincing. Attention will here be confined to the few following general observations.

Achilles.

3. Let it be kept carefully in view, how far any part of the narrative could apply to any other period of the Trojan War than the few weeks signalised by the secession of Achilles. Let it be considered, more especially, whether any portion of the first eighteen books could be intelligible without his anger and absence from the field; or, of the remaining six, apart from his reconciliation with Agamemnon. Take, for example, the part of the third book (v. 121. to 244.) which bears with the antients the title of "View from the Walls." It happens that the more specific class of mutual references, which elsewhere form the chief mechanical bond of connexion, are there entirely wanting. One thing however is certain, that either the transactions there detailed must have been from the first intended for an epoch of the war marked by the absence of Achilles, or else the author of this book must have been ignorant of any such hero having taken part in the siege; a somewhat extravagant alternative. Whoever, therefore, subdivides Homer's personality as has been proposed, must subscribe to the following singularly improbable assumptions: first, that all the more excellent poets who had selected the war of Troy as their subject had limited themselves, not only to the tenth year of the siege, but to the particular month of that year signalised by the quarrel between the chiefs; secondly, that more than three fourths of them had, in their choice of adventures, preferred those involving the defeat and disgrace of their countrymen; thirdly, that all the second-rate authors of the same primitive period, such as Arctinus, Stasinus, or Lesches, who treated of the same war, had as scrupulously confined themselves to its previous or subsequent stages. It is only by reference to the primary concentration of the whole Iliad around the destinies and influence of Achilles, that the above anomaly of its subject, the humiliation of the national arms during so large a portion of its action, can be explained. The cantos celebrating these disgraces and disasters are of the very essence of an entire Iliad; but the notion of a separate poem or ballad, of whatever length, exclusively devoted to such matter, having ever been composed by a popular Greek minstrel for a popular audience, seems altogether monstrous.¹

rampart.

Another essential basis of mechanical unity in the poem is the construction of the rampart. This takes place in the seventh book. The reason ascribed for the glaring improbability that the Greeks should have left their camp and fleet unfortified during nine years, in the midst of a hostile country, is a purely poetical one: "So long as Achilles fought, the terror of his name sufficed to keep every foe at a distance." The disasters consequent on his secession first led to the necessity of other means of protection. Accordingly, in the battles previous to the eighth book, no allusion occurs to a rampart; in all those which follow it forms a prominent feature. Here then, in the anomaly as in the propriety of the Iliad, the destiny of Achilles, or rather this peculiar crisis of it, forms the pervading bond of connexion to the whole poem.

against

A similar bond of connexion in the military details of the narrative, is the decree issued by Jupiter, at the commencement of the eighth book, against any further interference of the gods in the battles. In the opening of the twentieth book this interdict is withdrawn. During the twelve intermediate books it is kept steadily in view. No interposition takes place but on the part of the specially authorised agents of Jove, or on that of one or two contumacious deities described as boldly setting his commands at defiance, but checked and reprimanded for their disobedience; while the other divine warriors, who in the previous and subsequent cantos are so active in support of their favourite heroes, repeatedly allude to the supreme edict as the cause of their present inactivity.¹

4. Besides these more general marks of unity in the poem, the individual structure of several of its integral parts offers curious evidence of consistency of plan in the whole. The first book, for example, in addition to prophecies and allusions to future occurrences, too emphatic to have been introduced without the intention of following them out to their fulfilment, contains, in the multiplicity and variety of its incidents, unequivocal proof of the opening scene of a long drama. Within these 600 verses are condensed materials sufficient in number and importance to have furnished several books each of equal length with the first, according to the mode in which Homer is accustomed to work up his subject when fairly embarked on it. As the events succeed each other, so the scene shifts with a rapidity unexampled elsewhere. The arrival of Chryses in the camp, his address to the assembled host, the refusal of his request by Agamemnon, and the acknowledgement of its justice by the troops, his departure and prayer to his patron deity, the descent of the god from Olympus, the ten days' ravages of his weapons, and the funeral rites of the victims are dispatched in less than fifty lines. The altercation between the chiefs, as the basis of the whole poem, is treated more at length. But even here the orations are far from copious. Nestor himself is comparatively

Minerva and Apollo in the Dolonea is hypercritical. There is here no direct combative participation in the conflict, to which alone the interdict of Jove can possibly refer. The ordinary divine interposition, by dreams, warnings, or otherwise, is expressly excepted from the general rule (VIII. 36. 466. sqq.). Accordingly, in the same context, almost the same verse of B. VIII., where Juno abandons her intention of succouring the Greeks from deference to her husband's order, she is yet said (218.) to have "instilled into Agamemnon's mind the necessity of immediately arming his troops, otherwise Hector would have succeeded in burning the fleet." Conf. XVI. 668., XI. 438.

brief. Then follow, in rapid succession, the shipment of the maiden for her home, the purification of the host, the delivery of Briseïs by Achilles to Agamemnon's heralds, the dialogue between Achilles and his mother, with his retrospective account of the sack of Thebes and capture of the prisoner whose ransom involved such fatal consequences. A change of scene transports us to Chrysa, where are described the delivery of the damsel to her father, with the sacrifice and banquet in honour of Apollo. Another change brings us back to Achilles, and a third conveys us to Olympus, where we have the promised interview between Thetis and Jove, with other scenes illustrative of the part taken by the different deities in the affairs of earth. In proportion to the number and importance of the events, the period of time occupied by this canto, upwards of three weeks, is more than double that allotted to the succeeding twenty-two books. In this accumulation of incidents may be traced, not so much any deliberate artifice, as the spontaneous anxiety of a mind pregnant with a great subject, to secure, by laying down at the outset a broad foundation of facts, a wide field for subsequent enlargement; and to rivet the attention of his reader, by launching him at once on the full stream of the narrative.

Nor are the evidences of that mixture of comprehensiveness and conciseness, which marks an introductory canto, less discernible in the style than in the matter of this book. Where the facts to be narrated in any poem are abundant, the ornamental details may be expected to be proportionally scanty; a rule generally exemplified in the text of Homer. No where, accordingly, are these elegant accessories so sparingly distributed as in this book. Throughout the Iliad, a favourite class of figurative embellishment is the Simile; and it is one which the fervour of the poet's imagination has at times led him to accumulate to a defective excess. The whole number of such figures in the poem is about 190, giving an average of about six for every 500 lines. The greatest proportion is in the description of battles, the part of the text which chiefly suggested and required some such relief to an otherwise monotonous recurrence of similar incidents. The sixteenth book, comprising 867 lines, has 20 similes; the seventeenth, 761 lines, has 19; the second, containing 877 lines, has 10. The smallest proportion observable in any one of the subsequent books gives one for 250 lines. (In the first book, here under consideration, consisting of 611 lines, there occurs not one) This peculiarity (2) explains itself as naturally by the number and importance of the historical incidents in Alpha, as the accumulation of purely illustrative matter, in the other books above cited, by the opposite character of their contents.

That the part containing, next to the first canto, the fewest embellishments of this class should happen to be the concluding one, though a curious, is no fortuitous coincidence. It forms part of a general and, as bearing on the present subject, important analogy between the two books. As in Alpha we trace, in the number and rapid succession of events, the opening; so in Omega, a like peculiarity indicates the winding up of a long narrative, and the anxiety of the poet to abridge the concluding details, after disposing of the main heads of action. The indignities inflicted on Hector's corpse; the council of the gods ; the mission of Iris to Thetis, of Thetis to Achilles ; the interview between the goddess and her son ; the mission of Iris to Priam ; his journey, interview with Achilles, return with the body of Hector, and the subsequent preparation and performance of the funeral rites, comprise a mass of incidents equal in number, if not in importance, to those contained in the first act of the poem. They also, it happens, occupy an exactly equal period of time, about twenty-two or twenty-three days. These coincidences certainly offer a strong argument, not only of systematic design in the structure of the poem, but of that spontaneous harmony which marks the operations of the same genius under similar circumstances. •

Another indication of an opening canto is a certain descriptive introduction, on their first appearance on the scene, of several of the less distinguished actors, a courtesy of which there is no example in other portions of the Iliad. The heroes of more universal renown, Achilles, Agamemnon, Ulysses, are indeed brought at once on the stage without any ceremony of announcement : but the other two chief performers in the first book, Nestor and Calchas, personages whose notoriety depended probably in a great measure on the Iliad, are each ushered in with a particular notice of their persons and qualities. There could be no reason for this more pointed personal description of these individuals in this canto than in any other, unless it were intended for the commencement of a series. The catalogue in the immediately following book precludes also, in a great degree, the necessity of such introductory notices in the sequel.

Second Book.
Catalogue.

5. Similar indications of the preparatory stages of a great subject extend to the second book. Such,

for example, is Nestor's advice to Agamemnon to marshal his forces in distinct companies under their respective leaders. The natural inference here would be, apart from the general context, either that this advice had been offered in the first year of the war, or else that the Greeks had been accustomed, during the nine previous years, to engage the enemy without any sort of order or discipline, a very unsatisfactory alternative. This injunction, therefore, complied with by Agamemnon in the immediate sequel, is, like many other similar passages of both poems, but a piece of poetical mechanism forming a transition to the ensuing muster-roll of the Greek host. All sceptical inference is excluded, not merely by the previous and subsequent text, which proves the dialogue to have taken place in the ninth year, and after the quarrel, but by the distinct allusion of Nestor himself to these facts in the course of his speech.

The injunction of Iris to Priam to arm his forces, forming the introduction to the Trojan catalogue, presents another parallel anomaly, and for a similar object. Polites, a son of the Trojan king, sent out to reconnoitre, and whose person the goddess assumes, is here made to assert, "that although he had been in many an engagement, he had never beheld so numerous a host as that now advancing." Now it is certain that he must have known the Greek army to be much smaller than before, since, besides the heavy losses sustained in previous battles and the late pestilence, it was diminished by the whole amount of the Myrmidon force. This, therefore, is but a hyperbolical commonplace introductory to the Trojan march from the city.

in favour of which a claim to separate authorship has been most plausibly urged. Although the example of Homer has since rendered some such formal enumeration of the forces engaged a common practice in epic poems descriptive of great warlike adventures, still so minute a statistical detail can neither be considered as imperatively required, nor perhaps such as would, in ordinary cases, suggest itself to the mind of a poet. Yet there is scarcely any portion of the Iliad where both historical and internal evidence are more clearly in favour of a connexion, from the remotest period, with the remainder of the work. The composition of the Catalogue, whensoever it may have taken place, necessarily presumes its author's acquaintance with a previously existing Iliad. It were impossible otherwise to account for the harmony observable in the recurrence of so vast a number of proper names, most of them historically unimportant, and not a few altogether fictitious; or of so many geographical and genealogical details as are condensed in these few hundred lines, and incidentally scattered over the thousands which follow. Equally inexplicable were the pointed allusions occurring in this episode to events narrated in the previous and subsequent text, several of which could hardly be of traditional notoriety, but through the medium of the Iliad. The composition of the Catalogue, and by consequence of the Iliad, at a very remote period, is further vouched for by the circumstance already referred to, that in the works of succeeding poets of very antient date, modelled more or less closely on the Iliad, similar catalogues were introduced. That contained in the Cypria was limited to the Trojan force, a fact which forms in itself a conclusive argument that the Catalogue of the Iliad existed in its substantial integrity at the period when the Cypria was composed. Unless the enumeration of his native heroes had already been provided for, the author of that popular poem could never have restricted such a mark of distinction to their enemies. The style of the Catalogue is certainly far from deficient in the distinctive excellences of Homer. The genial spirit and vivacity infused into an otherwise dry recapitulation of names and facts, and the perspicuity, metrical harmony, and conciseness of their arrangement, reflect the single master mind as clearly perhaps as even the most brilliant descriptions in the body of the poem. Corrupted and interpolated it may have been: no part of the poem afforded, with so fair a field, so strong a temptation to such practices. Nor certainly are there wanting evidences of their having been resorted to. But interpolations in themselves imply the existence of an original genuine text.¹

In drawing this head of the subject to a close, the "Dolonea," or "night-watch," still demands a few words of remark. That the author of that episode was familiar with the previous narrative of the Iliad, even with the Catalogue, may be seen by reference to the epitome of its contents. The sleepless anxiety of Agamemnon during the night, owing to the gloomy prospects of his host after the disasters of the previous day; his allusion to the prowess of Hector as the immediate, and to his quarrel with Achilles as the remote cause of his distress; to the bivouac of the Trojans on the plain, to the construction of the rampart, and the posting of the guard; with the pointed mention of Rhesus of Thrace, unnoticed among the chiefs of that country in the Catalogue, as but recently arrived in the Trojan camp; all guarantee the previous existence of the first nine books of the poems in their substantial integrity. Nor, even were it not self-evident that this episode could only be intended as a continuation, not as a conclusion of the foregoing narrative, are there wanting sufficiently plain, though not quite so specific, allusions to a sequel. At the period therefore when the Dolonea was composed, an Iliad must have existed, whatever may have been its exact length or proportion. It happens, however, that, among these references of the episode to other parts of the existing text, there is not one indispensable to the full understanding of the action; nor is there any distinct allusion in the remaining books to the adventure which this one records. Although therefore the episode could not exist without the Iliad, the Iliad might no doubt exist without the episode. Upon this ground certain nameless commentators, alluded to by Eustathius¹, conjectured it to be a later addition to the primary fabric of the poem. On the other hand, the general harmony between its text and the remainder of the work, with the Homeric purity of its style, excluded all pretext for ascribing it to a different author. It was therefore admitted to be a genuine composition of Homer; not, however, an original canto of the Iliad, but a separate poem by the same author, first inserted in the place it now occupies by Pisistratus, the favourite hero of all such performances with this later school of sophists. Of the historical value of such theories, transmitted but on the hearsay

of a Byzantine writer of the twelfth century, little need be added to what has already been remarked in other places. ✓

The simple hypothesis however, that this book may have been an afterthought of the genuine Homer, need not in itself be considered as altogether unreasonable. Excellent as the structure of the Iliad is in its existing form, it does not follow, nay, it is highly improbable, that the poem was, even in its entire substance, so designed and finished off-hand, to use a familiar phrase, by a single impulse of its author. The conceptions of such a genius, in proportion as they are great, are not necessarily nor probably at once embodied in their full maturity. Ruder draughts of an Iliad may, no doubt, have preceded that which now forms so perfect a whole. Admitting the poem to have been originally composed without a Dolonea, the author himself could hardly have failed to discover that so long a series of national disaster and humiliation, extending over more than one half of the narrative, besides being poetically defective on the ground of monotony and sameness, might, if unrelieved by some such cheering episode, prove distasteful or even offensive to a patriotic audience. The tenth book, while it affords an agreeable relief to the national distress, also tends, through the force of contrast, to deepen its effect, and thus forms an indispensable element of the moral harmony of the entire action.

of poetical unity, as
in the Iliad.

1. THE foundation of excellence in every branch of narrative composition is the talent of seizing and giving effect to the principal feature of a subject. The primary qualification of a skilful pleader is instinctively to apprehend the point in which the strength of his case lies, and constitute it the centre of his argument. The less momentous or less favourable details are either suppressed or scattered incidentally around, so that, like the decorative adjuncts of a solid building, they may acquire from the connexion an importance which they could not separately have enjoyed. The art of the historian is but a continued observance of the same rule. He arranges in the front of his narrative the main facts supplied by the Chronicle or Gazette; the less important circumstances which may there, from their bearing on the petty interests of the day, have been more carefully detailed, are abridged or discarded. Nor, certainly, is the observance of this principle less essential to the success of the epic poet than of the historian or orator. It is, accordingly, in Homer's fine application of it that those artifices of his composition are to be sought, which, in the phraseology of the schools, are familiarly classed under the heads of unity of action, time, and place, or other similar figures of scholastic rhetoric. In order to test the justice of this remark in its more immediate reference to the Iliad, we must consider: first, the general tenor of the historical tradition on which the work is founded; secondly, the special properties of that portion of the same tradition which has been selected as the principal action.

From the notices interspersed throughout the poem, it appears that the first nine years of the siege passed without any event of a decisive character. After a vigorous attempt to frustrate the landing of the Greeks, the Trojans, unable to cope with them in the field, shut themselves up within the walls of the city, where, by the strength of its fortifications, they baffled every assault of the enemy.¹ The Greeks naturally shaped their tactics by those of the besieged, and, in order to wear out their resources, occupied themselves in ravaging the country, and reducing other cities² of the hostile confederacy. In the tenth year however events occurred to alter the Trojan policy. Dissensions between Agamemnon and Achilles, the hero on whose valour the Greeks mainly relied for success, caused the secession of the latter from the cause. In proportion as this event tended to discourage the one party, already somewhat disheartened by a long and unprofitable warfare, it revived the hopes of the other. The city was at this epoch crowded with Asiatic auxiliaries, who, however valuable their services, pressed heavily on the resources of Priam¹, and rendered some desperate effort the more indispensable. Such a combination of circumstances obviously marked out this as the moment for a bold attack on the invaders. The quarrel therefore between the chiefs, as the immediate cause of a change in the languid character of the war, and of a series of fierce engagements involving the death of Hector the main bulwark of his country, but, above all, from the fine field it afforded for developing the character of Achilles, the heart and soul of the Iliad, could not fail to offer itself to the genius of Homer, as the centre or pivot of action in any poem founded on the siege of Troy.

Nor does the peculiar nature of these events mark out the completion of the design less clearly than its commencement. From the quarrel of the heroes down to the restoration of Hector's body, the whole series of occurrences follow each other by as constant a chain of cause and effect as the vibrations of a pendulum, and cease as naturally on the exhaustion of the impetus which set them in motion. On the withdrawal of Achilles depend the unwonted boldness and success of the Trojans. The disasters of the Greeks excite the sympathy of Patroclus, whose successful mediation with Achilles leads to his own death by the hand of Hector. Grief, anger, and remorse procure the immediate restoration of Achilles to the field, and the infliction of death on the destroyer of his friend. The duties of friendship and of religion indispensably require a performance of the last honours to the remains of the two fallen warriors. While, therefore, up to this point the main events are inseparably linked with each other, it is equally certain that, beyond it, tradition supplies no occurrence standing in any similar epic relation to those which precede; nor is it easy to see how the ingenuity of poetical fiction could have suggested an addition calculated to form other than a tasteless excrescence. The subsequent adventures of the war, the closing career and death of Achilles, the arrival and exploits of Memnon, Penthesilea, Neoptolemus, furnished abundant materials for new poems: but even the genius of Homer could hardly have succeeded in bringing any one of those adventures into appropriate epic connexion with the narrative of the Iliad. In so far therefore the dogma of certain antient grammarians, that the first verse, nay, the first word of the poem contains a summary of the whole action, however frivolous their mode of propounding it, can hardly be considered as groundless in fact. The "anger of Achilles" and its consequences really include all that the Iliad relates, and exclude all that it omits.

2. Skilfully, however, as the plot of the poem is devised, it will yet be found, in respect to actual events, to be but meagre. "The commander of an enterprise affronts his bravest warrior, who retires indignant from the field. Successive disasters lead to vain attempts to conciliate his anger. At length, when the enemy's fire threatens his own quarters, he allows his friend to go forth with his followers to the rescue. The death of that friend by the hand of the hostile leader imposes on him the duty of revenge; the fulfilment of which duty, terminating in the death of the rival chief, restores matters much to the same footing as at the commencement." Nor is this simple line of action relieved by any of those ingenious underplots, by which succeeding epic poets have usually endeavoured to extend the interest of their narratives. In the Iliad are no cunning schemes of designing villains, treacherous friends, or jealous rivals, to baffle the designs of the principal actors; no attempts to mystify or conceal the proposed order of occurrences, in order to surprise or disappoint by unlooked-for disclosures. The opening of the poem contains a prediction of the events that are to follow during the greater part of its progress, and before we are far advanced we are made equally familiar with the remainder. The few unforeseen occurrences adorn, but do not impede, the smooth train of the principal action, which, gliding over them, advances steadily to its appointed issue.

This limitation of the main subject is not only a characteristic property of the poem, but one of its greatest excellences. In every department of art simplicity is an essential element of grandeur, and grandeur is the main feature of the Iliad. Any subordinate complication of parts would have detracted, in a proportional degree, from the dignity of the whole. It might, however, plausibly be urged, admitting the justice of this principle, that in so far as such secondary plots constitute the medium for exhibiting variety of character, their exclusion has deprived the poet of opportunity for portraying many of the passions and vices which supply not the least instructive lessons of human nature. In this alleged deficiency, however, consists another chief element of the ideal sublimity of the Iliad. The term hero, in the true spirit of the Homeric minstrelsy (whatever may be its sense in the page of later mythology), excludes, as a general rule, without any actual exemption from the failings incident to humanity, those baser vices which inspire disgust or contempt. But the war of Troy was the greatest of all heroic adventures. The chiefs who took part in it were the noblest and the last of the race of genuine heroes. So they are described by both Homer and Hesiod¹, an intermediate stage between the divine and human natures, superior in moral and physical attributes as well to their sons and descendants as to the ordinary men of their own day. The degeneracy from heroism to common humanity is dated, by the latter poet expressly, by the former indirectly, from the extinction of this generation. It was natural therefore, in a selection of the Trojan war as his subject, that the poet's efforts to impart variety to his characters should be limited to such combinations of virtue and vice, greatness and weakness, as should still allow that essential attribute of heroism, generosity, to predominate. This limitation, while it rendered success the more difficult, rendered it also, if attained, the more complete; inasmuch as the sympathies called forth by human action or suffering are the more pure and pleasing, in proportion as they are less alloyed by the shame arising from exposure of the baser features of our nature. The gratification, therefore, which we derive from the Iliad's varied portraiture of imperfect excellence, if it ever admits of our remarking the absence of the villain of the piece, certainly never admits of our regretting it. Among the chief beauties of one of the greatest works of modern graphic art, the Last Supper of Leonardo, has been remarked the skill with which the artist has varied the expression called forth on the countenances of eleven individuals of the same habits and interests by the sudden announcement of a fact in which they had all an equal concern, and where the predominant emotion in the breast of each was fundamentally the same: surprise at the imputation thrown out, and conscious innocence of the crime imputed. But in one this feeling is tempered with indignation, in another with doubt, in a third with humility, in a fourth with mortification, in a fifth with scorn. Similar is the power displayed by Homer in modifying the shades of his heroes' characters. All are actuated by a common spirit of chivalrous enterprise, all engaged in a common pursuit of martial renown; but differ no less in the peculiarities of disposition and language which mark their generous course, than in their capacities for attaining the glorious ends towards which it is directed.

Character
of Achilles
the main poetical
the Iliad.

3. But the grand poetical feature of the Iliad is the character of Achilles. Its conception is the highest effort of the poet's genius; on its delineation the richest resources of his art are concentrated. It is, accordingly, in the number and variety of the opportunities which the action supplies for developing the great qualities of the hero that its excellence mainly consists. This consideration renders it expedient, in the following pages, to combine the analysis of these two fundamental elements of the work: its epic structure, and the character of its protagonist.

The character of Achilles is conceived on the same principle which the sculptors of later ages transferred to their representations of the deity under human form. The hero of the Iliad, like the statues of Phidias, is an ideal personage, of which all the component parts are human, but in their combination present a whole creature surpassing, in the splendour of his attributes, any living example of humanity; uniting the full measure of those qualities which, in the spirit of his age, constituted the sublime, the beautiful, or the terrible, in mortal nature. Beyond this general outline it is the more difficult to define wherein the grandeur of the portrait consists, owing to the wide difference in the moral impressions which many of its more prominent features are calculated to awaken in the present age, as compared with that for which it was originally designed. His valour, his generosity, the warm affections of his heart, the graces of his person, his elegant accomplishments, are common to him with most other heroes of chivalry. But there is in Achilles alone a power of exciting awe and admiration, which seems to depend on the less obvious associations through which it operates, and which can only be appreciated by identifying ourselves with the feelings or prejudices of the poet's own audience. Among the theories by which it has been attempted to illustrate the sources of our moral judgments, there is one which accounts for those habitually passed on certain passions or affections, not so much by reference to any essential difference in their quality, as to the degree in which they are displayed; or in other words that certain virtues, when carried to excess, become vices. Thus, when liberality exceeds the bounds of prudence, it becomes extravagance; a just regard for personal dignity degenerates into pride; a strong sense of retributive justice into vindictiveness. The right application of this rule depends, however, on the faculty of distinguishing where the transition from moderation to excess takes place ; a faculty reserved for the more advanced stages of ethic culture, or which is at least very imperfect in the primitive moralist. The estimate which the mind, undisciplined by the restraints of true religion or philosophy, forms of many modes of conduct which excite in more enlightened ages unqualified censure, is regulated chiefly by a previous estimate of the source in which they originate. Such as can be traced to some just or amiable impulse claim sympathy or approval, and the degree in which they are displayed tends less to alter their intrinsic value than to enhance the grandeur of their effect. Of this generous, though defective principle of heroic morality, the character of Achilles embodies the form and pressure. All his affections are in their origin noble or generous. This was indispensable to his heroic excellence. That all should be exhibited in excess was essential to his heroic greatness. His conscious superiority to all other mortals renders him haughty and impatient of control. Just resentment against ingratitude effervesces into implacable wrath, absorbing many of the best affections which at other times predominate in his bosom. The conflict of generous feelings created by the sudden loss of a beloved friend, leads to a bloodthirsty spirit of revenge against his destroyer. But, in order rightly to appreciate these darker traits, they must be contemplated, not in their naked magnitude and terror, but in their contrast to the softer touches by which they are relieved¹ ; to the affectionate heart, the chivalrous sense of courtesy and urbanity, the spirit of mercy to the vanquished, and sympathy with affliction, for which the poet describes him as habitually distinguished, and of which his interview with Priam is so touching an example. Those harsher features may thus be likened, adopting the poet's own vein of imagery, to the thunder storm which, passing over the face of a beautiful landscape, imparts new charms to the returning serenity of the scene; or to the inundations of the mountain torrent, which disturb, but cannot permanently corrupt, the purity of its waters. Nor is it the least admirable part of this extraordinary portrait, that in so much boldness of design and intensity of colouring there is no exaggeration. Achilles frets, rages, storms, but he never rants. His most overwhelming paroxysms, which, in the heroes of other epic poems, seldom escape bombast or extravagance, are in him but the natural outbreaks of a noble, but wayward and impetuous spirit. ✓

4. One great excellence of the quarrel scene which forms the foundation of the poem, is the skill with which the poet has managed to put both chiefs in the wrong, yet without any real sacrifice of their heroic dignity. The step taken by Achilles in calling the council, though obviously with the view of publicly arraigning the conduct of his commander, is open to no serious charge of presumption. It was the duty, as well as privilege, of the leading champion of the army to stand forth as its protector against the reckless levity even of a superior, who had subjected it, for the indulgence of his own selfish passions, to the wrath of the terrible deity under whose weapons it was smarting. Achilles is also careful to secure the divine sanction, by placing his cause in the hands of the seer Calchas. His subsequent conduct, however, cannot be so easily justified. His reply to the prophet's demand of support, should his candour embroil him with Agamemnon, is in a strain of sarcasm against that hero altogether unwarranted at this stage of the discussion ; and tends to provoke, if not to palliate, the indecent abuse with which Agamemnon assails the divine minister. In the sequel, the violence of both parties renders it the less easy to discriminate on whose side lies the balance of right or wrong. Agamemnon's offer to restore the damsel, on condition of compensation at the common cost for the loss of his share of the spoil, if not the most generous mode of settlement, was certainly one which he was entitled to propose ; and the taunting reply of Achilles provokes, and in some degree excuses, the declaration of Agamemnon in his retort, to indemnify himself at the sole expense of the Myrmidon chief. The patience of the impetuous hero is now exhausted, and his fury reaches a climax which renders divine interference necessary. The appearance of Minerva, the goddess of wisdom, to check the violence of Achilles, is an obvious figure of his own better judgment suggesting, even in the climax of his wrath, that a personal assault would be a far less effective mode of chastising the insolence of his chief, or the apathy of his fellow-warriors, than a secession from the war ; which, by proving their dependance on his valour, would secure to him in the end a more complete triumph, and to them a more humiliating punishment.

The circumstance here noticed of the anger of Achilles being directed, not only against Agamemnon but his companions in arms, supplies an apt illustration of a familiar and just remark of the antient critics, that Homer seldom tells us any thing in his own words which can be appropriately communicated in those of his heroes. Nowhere has the poet himself given to understand that the wrath of Achilles extended beyond the single person of Agamemnon: but the omission is abundantly made good in the dramatic element of the action. On the departure of Pallas, the hero indirectly, but severely, taunts the Greeks with their slavish acquiescence in the injustice of their commander: "Rapacious king, didst thou not reign over worthless vassals, this outrage had been thy last."¹ In the sequel he accuses them collectively of having wronged him²; and at a later period he chides Patroclus for his sympathy with their distress, suffering, as they were, but the just reward of their guilt.³ This ingredient of the hero's wrath is indeed indispensable, to explain or palliate his implacable bitterness of feeling even towards his own favourite comrades. But although their conduct, in thus passively allowing their champion and preserver to be slighted and despoiled, may have afforded him reasonable ground of offence, it admits of excuse or even justification. There is no moral obligation more distinctly enjoined in the Iliad than obedience to the supreme authority. Amid a full liberty of advice and remonstrance, a respectful deference to the sovereign will of Agamemnon is a duty indirectly, but pointedly, inculcated by the poet, and on all occasions scrupulously fulfilled by the other chiefs.⁴ In the quarrel, whatever its intrinsic merits, the respective position of the litigants imposed on Achilles the duty of moderation, or even submission. To his brothers in arms, therefore, he might naturally appear to have forfeited by his violence much of the advantage derived from the justice of his cause. Nor here again has the poet, however sparing of his personal explanations, left us dependant on conjecture. Nestor, who represents the sober judgment of the host, incidentally but distinctly intimates that, however Atrides may have been to blame, Achilles, by his insubordination, had shifted a large portion of the fault from his commander to himself.¹

the action
after the
Achilles.

5. After his interview with Thetis, Achilles retires, to nurse in solitude his indignation and hopes of speedy triumph. The preparation for this result supplies materials for the seven succeeding cantos. The poet's concern for the honour of his countrymen required that their disgrace should be brought about slowly and gradually, after a long and valiant struggle for their previous ascendancy. Accordingly, as has been observed by a celebrated critic, "the distress thickens as the poem advances, while everything is so contrived as to aggrandise Achilles, and render him, even when absent, the capital figure." The succeeding battles are enlivened by the introduction of new characters, and by episodes illustrative of the history of the leading heroes.

of Homer.

Among the most striking internal evidences of unity of design in the Iliad, is the expedient by which the poet has guarded lest the disasters of his countrymen should involve any compromise of that superiority, moral and martial, which he throughout ascribes to them over their Trojan adversaries. An anxiety to sustain the character of his own country, is a feeling which might be expected to influence every poet. But that several poets, under the self-imposed necessity of recording the defeat and humiliation of their ancestors, should resort to the same subtle device for preserving the national honour seems next to impossible. This device consists chiefly in veiling his patriotic sympathies under a general tone of impartiality, or even of occasional favour to the Trojans; while, wherever we are left to judge from facts, the advantage is entirely on the Greek side. The Iliad abounds in allusions to the noble defence of their country by the besieged, and to the cruel fate which destined so valiant a race to destruction by a vindictive invader. Our feelings are frequently moved by the touching appeals of the orphan, the widow, and the parent, on their successive bereavements. Yet, as if these images of afflicted patriotism, or oppressive ambition, were not effectually dissipated by the notorious reality that all the distress was but the punishment of crime, all the aggression but a righteous attempt to obtain redress, the Trojans, at the very outset, are made parties to a new act of perjury and assassination. The assault of Pandarus on Menelaus, if it can be reconciled, through the common expedient of ascribing the act to divine instigation, with the poet's principle of exempting the heroes of the Iliad from the baser vices, is certainly the nearest approach to a violation of that principle in the poem. It tends, consequently, still further to lower the character of the Dardanian warriors as compared with their Hellenic rivals. Other gross examples of Trojan treachery are episodically cited from the earlier transactions between the two nations.¹ Similar art has been employed in the military parallel of the two. While the courage of the Trojan chiefs is frequent subject of warm eulogy, yet, wherever brought into fair personal collision with Greeks of equal rank, they are worsted. Despite the assurance that even Achilles had been known to "turn pale on meeting Hector or Æneas face to face," yet the former of these two heroes not only, when actually brought into collision with Pelides, flies panic-struck, but is repeatedly beaten in single combat by both Ajax and Diomed. The superiority indeed of Diomed to Hector, Æneas, and all other Trojans, wherever the gods do not interpose, is maintained in every encounter. Menelaus defeats Paris, Patroclus Sarpedon. Nowhere is any Greek warrior of rank subjected to humiliating discomfiture. The proudest exploit of Hector, his slaughter and spoliation of Patroclus, is so described as to be conspicuous merely for its ferocity. The Greek hero, after being disabled by Apollo, is mortally wounded by another Trojan, when Hector steps in with the finishing blow, as his butcher rather than conqueror. When the same Hector, guaranteed against personal risk by the assurance of divine protection, challenges the best warrior of the Greek host, he is described in a like ironical spirit as spreading terror through its ranks; yet in a few minutes no less than eight champions come forward, and he only escapes death from the one he engages by the interposition of the heralds. To the ultimate defeat of the Greeks it is required that, besides the secession of Achilles and Patroclus, the flower of their remaining warriors, Agamemnon, Diomed, Ulysses, should be disabled by wounds. The Trojan leaders on the other hand, Hector, Æneas, Sarpedon, Paris, are successively, when vanquished, either preserved from harm by their patron deities, or, if wounded, miraculously cured and restored to the battle. The successes of the Trojans collectively are throughout described as due to the special agency of the gods; those of the Greeks are often the result of their own valour, even in the face of the same divine influence which, in their own case, is required to paralyse their power of resistance before they can be subjected to defeat. The Trojan leaders never venture on hostile collision with adverse deities; the Greek heroes engage them repeatedly and successfully. Nor do the former ever appear great in calamity, stemming by their solitary valour the adverse tide of war. Numerous instances of this highest order of courage are to be found on the side of the Greeks.

The first day's combat terminates with little positive advantage on either side. This, however, is already a serious decline in the fortunes of the Greeks. "While Achilles fought, the Trojans never ventured from beneath the protection of their city walls."¹ The construction of the rampart during the truce is, therefore, a tribute to his glory at the expense of that of the army, and is claimed as such by himself.² The result of the ensuing disastrous combat is the "Supplication" of Atrides for relief. The hero's triumph was now complete, but not the measure of Agamemnon's punishment or his own satisfaction. It was hardly to be expected that repentance, so evidently originating in mere self-interest, should at once obtain grace. Nor was the resentment of Achilles of that vulgar kind which depends on a balance struck between the amount of insult received and apology offered. The ideal grandeur of his character required that no inferior order of influence should have power to bend a resolution he had deliberately formed and pronounced. His anger therefore, when the period arrived for its removal, was not to be appeased, but supplanted by some still more powerful affection. This transition introduces the second act of the great moral drama of the Iliad, where Achilles was to be exhibited under a new class of equally powerful emotions, but tempered by softer ingredients.

Relaxation of his wrath.
Defects and
of the crisis.

6. In the conference of the ninth book, there betrays itself, under his apparent obduracy, a lurking regret to abandon his prospects of martial glory, and an anxiety that circumstances might occur, without detriment to his honour, to restore him to the field of battle. As the national distress approaches its climax, symptoms appear of a relaxation of his wrath, in a spirit of compassion for one of its innocent victims.¹ That this first object of his sympathy, the physician Machaon, should combine with his military duties the most beneficent art of peace, can hardly be attributed to accident. Patroclus, deeply moved by the distress of his countrymen, avails himself of this opening to ask and obtain permission to lead forth the Myrmidons to their relief, but on condition of his confining his succour to the delivery of the camp. The mode, however, in which this permission is granted shows that it was not merely a concession to friendship, but extorted partly by the danger which threatened the Myrmidon quarters. For, immediately afterwards, observing the flames rising from the ship which Hector had set on fire, Achilles becomes himself urgent with his lieutenant to arm without delay, and undertakes in person the office of marshalling his troops. Powerful as is the interest of this crisis, there is perhaps no portion of the action which affords so fair an opening for censure. The moment being now arrived which Achilles had from the first foreseen might render his interference necessary for the safety of his own ships, why, it may be asked, should he throw upon Patroclus alone the burthen of their protection; exposing his beloved friend, for the gratification of his own obstinate pride, to a risk, the magnitude of which was afterwards so fatally proved? If himself so alarmed as to hurry on the arming of his troops, was he not bound to march forth at their head, rather than maintain at the sole peril of Patroclus a mere shadow of adherence to his purpose? The only apology which occurs is, that a sense of danger was what entered least into the thoughts of a hero when going forth himself, or sending his friend to battle. The predominant feeling of Achilles in such a moment would be, not alarm for the welfare of Patroclus, but envy of the achievements in store for him. Reflexion followed afterwards.

The poetical advantage, on the other hand, of this mode of management is obvious. It was essential to the complete working out of the character of Achilles, that, wherever he was called to act a prominent part, he should appear under some powerful stimulus. Had his return to the ranks been voluntary, as a concession to the prayers or peace-offerings of his fellow-chiefs, his first appearance on the field would have been comparatively tame and insipid: had it been forced from him by the assault on his own quarters, he would have gone forth under humiliating, almost ludicrous, circumstances; he would, in fact, have been burnt out of his tent, and liable to the taunt of having been caught in the snare he had set for others. Or again, had Patroclus fallen fighting by the side of his chief in the ranks, there would have been little to distinguish his fate from that of other unfortunate warriors, nor, consequently, either motive or apology for those subsequent revulsions of feeling,—grief, shame, remorse,—on the part of Achilles, so indispensable to the fulness of his portrait, or for those ebullitions of vindictive fury against Hector, which give the tone to the whole subsequent action. One more important benefit resulting from this mode of management was, the easy and natural opening it afforded for cordial reconciliation with his fellow chiefs, in the debt of gratitude imposed on him by their gallant fulfilment of his own neglected duty, of stemming the adverse tide of war to rescue the body of his friend.

Character
clus. Its adaptation to that of Achilles.

7. Nowhere, perhaps, has the poet more finely displayed his knowledge of human nature than in the adaptation to each other of the characters of his hero and his hero's friend. Between men of ordinary tempers, attachments are perhaps more easily cemented where there is a near similarity of disposition: but with men of high passions or eccentric minds, the risks of collision are too great to admit of that harmony essential to the maintenance of strong personal friendship. A certain contrast is perhaps, in every case, more favourable to a reciprocal estimate of character than close resemblance. There cannot therefore be a happier selection of the opposite, but not uncongenial qualities which were here to be exhibited in such harmonious conjunction.

Among the varieties of heroic character shadowed forth in the Iliad, the virtues for which Patroclus was especially distinguished were, benevolence, tenderness of heart, and amiable manners.¹ This is the disposition which experience shows to be alone or chiefly calculated to secure the affections, or influence the mind, of such a being as Achilles. Yet, even under these favourable conditions, the Thessalian hero's impetuosity of temperament scarcely admitted a very cordial bond of union with an equal. It was necessary therefore that the relation between them, without involving any servile subjection, should partake of that between patron and client, or chieftain and vassal. Menœtius the father of Patroclus was a noble stranger, driven with his only son, by adverse destiny, from his own country, to seek an asylum at the court of Peleus. The young refugee had been educated with Achilles, also an only child, on the mixed footing of companion and dependant. He was the elder of the two, and the influence he had obtained over his youthful patron by his amiable qualities was such, that the last act of Menœtius, on sending him forth to the war², was, in the presence and with the sanction of Peleus, to charge him with the duty of moderating the dangerous ardour of the Myrmidon prince's temper. Friendship indeed were but a feeble term to express the feelings entertained by Achilles towards his beloved comrade, whom he "honoured equal to his own soul." In the hero of the Iliad, the tender, like the terrible passions, required to be made up of more than ordinary ingredients; and in the fulness of his affection were thus united, personal respect, fraternal love, and reverence for the will of a parent whom he was destined never again to see.

Revulsion
of feeling.
Grief and remorse of Achilles.

8. The companion in arms who occupied the next place to Patroclus in his esteem is selected to convey the fatal intelligence. It is abruptly communicated. Artificial breaking of bad news were little in the spirit of the true heroic minstrelsy. The violence of the transition is more judiciously obviated by representing Achilles, before the arrival of Antilochus, as already foreboding the truth, from certain appearances in the battle as viewed from the rampart.¹ The description of the effect produced by its full announcement is of the last degree of splendour. After the first paroxysms of grief, those reflexions on his late conduct, formerly excluded by the excitement of other passions, press on him with terrific force. The full conviction how recklessly he had exposed his friend, deprived of his protecting arm, to the fury of an enemy appointed as the instrument of his own wrath against the whole Hellenic host, now flashes upon his mind. Now was the time to remember, that, so long as he maintained his purpose of absenting himself from the field, the gods had at his own request decreed victory to Hector, rout and slaughter to the Greeks. No exception had been made in favour of Patroclus. Now was the time to curse that blind indulgence of his selfish pride which had blunted all the more generous affections of his nature. The bitterness of his soul, harassed by these tormenting thoughts, at length finds vent in language, which could anything contribute to ennoble, it would be its having been deemed worthy

No less striking is the transition, in his dialogue with his mother, from remorse to the thirst of vengeance, and of what, amid all his mental vicissitudes, is never lost sight of, fresh glory to be acquired in its exaction. The succeeding scenes are so many new illustrations of other traits of grandeur in his character. His simple appearance on the ramparts, uttering his shout of war, spreads rout and panic through the Trojan host. In his frank reconciliation with Agamemnon his native generosity shines forth unsullied. No studied attempt to maintain dignity or exact terms. Apologies unheeded, gifts disregarded; everything at once forgotten and forgiven. The ensuing books at length exhibit the mighty hero on the field of battle, when Jupiter himself pronounces divine interference necessary to balance the contest; and the gods are despatched in a body, to guard lest the impetuosity of his prowess should violate the decrees of fate by the premature sack of the city.

His ferocious treatment of the corpse of Hector cannot but offend, as referred to the modern standard of humanity. The heroic age however must be judged by its own moral laws. Retributive vengeance on the dead, as well as the living, was a duty inculcated by the religion of those barbarous times, which not only taught that evil inflicted on the author of evil was a solace to the injured man, but made the welfare of the soul after death dependant on the fate of the body from which it had separated. Hence a denial of the rites deemed essential to the soul's admission into the more favoured regions of the lower world, was a cruel punishment to the wanderer on the dreary shores of the infernal river. The pathetic complaint of the ghost of Patroclus to Achilles, of but a brief postponement of his own obsequies¹, shows how efficacious their refusal to the remains of his destroyer must have been in satiating the thirst of revenge, which, even after death, was supposed to torment the dwellers in Hades. Hence, before yielding up the body of Hector to Priam, Achilles asks pardon of Patroclus for even this partial cession of his just rights of retribution.² The corpse of Patroclus had also, it must be remembered, been insulted, stripped, and mutilated, by this very Hector, and was destined, had it remained in his power, to usage similar to that now inflicted on his own.³ Such being the primitive Pagan law of retributive equity, the extent to which the poet has here called it into action was essential to his conception of the character of Achilles, in whom no affection, amiable or the reverse, could exist but in overpowering excess. The same apology extends to his other outbreaks of vindictive fury; to the slaughter of the twelve human victims on the pile of his friend, and the refusal of quarter to his prisoners. This latter suspension of his usual humane rule of conduct is, also, pointedly ascribed by himself to the obligations of vengeance imposed on him by the fate of Patroclus.⁴

displayed more especially in the marked respect, or even reverence, of his manner towards Agamemnon. His interview with Priam elicits traits of a still nobler order. The obligations both of vengeance and friendship had now been amply satisfied. Patroclus might exult among his companions in the shades, in the glory of his passage from the upper world; and a twelve days' interval had relaxed the intensity of his own feelings. At this juncture, the venerable Priam suddenly appears before him as a suppliant for the body of his son; and the occasion is seized by the poet for placing the keystone to this model of heroic perfection. That stern bosom, lately so inflexible by any influence but its own fierce passions, now melts with pity for an aged parent worn down by domestic and public calamity, and with admiration for the heroism which impelled him, alone, through the dangers of a Myrmidon camp, into the presence of an enemy whose hands were still red with the blood of his children. Yet even here, in the performance of the humanest duties, the darker characteristics of the hero's nature are finely preserved. When Priam, emboldened by his unexpected kindness, having obtained so much more than he had reason to hope, ventures to insist on more than was reasonable to demand, to exact the promised boon on his own terms rather than receive it on those of the donor, both he and we are reminded of the former Achilles, by the terrible though momentary change of tone, in which he warns the trembling old man to beware, while profiting by the generosity of the lion, lest he should rouse its fury.¹

best calculated to exalt and purify our impression of his character. We had accompanied him through the effervescence, undulations, and final subsidence of his stormy passions. We now leave him in repose, and under the full influence of the more amiable affections: while our admiration of his great qualities is chastened by the reflection, that, within a few short days, the mighty being in whom they were united was himself to be suddenly cut off in the full vigour of their exercise,

Nescio quid, parvam quod non bene compleat urnam.”

The frequent and touching allusions, interspersed throughout the Iliad, to the speedy termination of its hero's course, and the moral on the vanity of human life which they inculcate, are among the finest evidences of the spirit of ethic unity by which the whole framework of the poem is animated.

Moral scope and tendency of

10. This indissoluble connexion between the genius of the entire poem and of its protagonist, while constituting the fundamental characteristic of the Iliad, involves also certain collateral peculiarities in its bond of epic unity, as compared with other standard works of its class. The action of all the remaining more celebrated productions of the epic muse may be described as directed towards their main point of interest; that of the Iliad is concentrated around it. In the Odyssey the restoration of Ulysses to his home and royal authority, in the Æneid the establishment of the Trojan dominion in Latium, in the Jerusalem the reconquest of the Holy Sepulchre, in the Paradise Lost the fall of our first parents, offer each a distinct historical object, on which the action is from the first steadily advancing, by however tortuous a course. In the Iliad no similar object can be discovered. Although the limits of the action are as clearly marked out as in any of the above cases, yet its progress cannot be said to have in view, nor does its conclusion involve, any distinct historical consummation. The fall of Troy, the grand catastrophe of the whole train of events celebrated in the poem, is extraneous to its own narrative. As little does the reconciliation of the chiefs, or the death of Hector, form its definitive scope. The selection, therefore, of this particular series of events was owing obviously to its moral, rather than its historical importance; to the opportunities it afforded for portraying the great qualities of one extraordinary character, with the conception of which the poet's mind was teeming. The genius of the Iliad, consequently, is superior to that by which those other heroic poems are animated, in so far as the mind of man, in all the depth and variety of its passions and affections, is a more interesting object of study than the vicissitudes of human destiny or worldly adventure.

The term Moral, which, owing to the poverty of this branch of our ethical vocabulary, has here been used in its wider sense, to distinguish the inner intellectual design from the external or historical facts of the poem, must not be understood to indicate, as it might according to its more familiar import, any of that formal didactic spirit which frequently pervades the epic compositions of civilised ages. There is nothing of this tendency in the "moral" element of the Iliad. But although the main scope of the epic muse is rather to entertain by the description of great events or remarkable characters, than to illustrate speculative ethic doctrines, still, as those descriptions must more or less act on the moral feelings, it is at least desirable that the impression made should be beneficial rather than mischievous. There is, besides, a natural aversion in the human mind to contemplate evil triumphant and virtue degraded, which renders such exhibitions offensive to the taste as well as the understanding, and in so far injurious to the poetical as well as the ethic spirit of works of imagination. In respect to this just amount of didactic propriety, the Iliad, both in the general scheme and the details of its action, well sustains its superiority of character. Each of the actors in the ruling transaction of the poem, Achilles and Agamemnon, are in their respective mode and degree in the wrong. Each is reduced, by the disasters consequent on his error, to bitter repentance and humiliation. The treachery of Pandarus is the immediate cause of his own death. He is the first hero of note slain in the engagement which it was the special object of that treachery to bring on. Of the two great nations engaged in the war, the Greeks were the hostile invaders; but their cause is based on justice, and we therefore readily sympathise with the poet's anticipation of their ultimate success. On the other hand, amid our concern for the cruel fate of the amiable Hector, and the grief of his desolate family, the reflexion that they are all more or less accomplices in the outrages of Paris and Pandarus, forces us to acknowledge the hand of retributive justice in the infliction of the scourge. Helen is represented as unhappy in her adulterous state, often brooding mournfully over the past¹, and exposed to mortification and slight even from her paramour's kinsfolk.¹ Paris himself is exhibited as an object of dislike and contempt, both to his own countrymen and the Greeks; and although he escapes death by the hand of Menelaus, we are warned that his final punishment is at hand.

This excellence of Homer will appear the more remarkable, as contrasted with the striking inferiority of his most distinguished successor in regard to the same important feature, amid the full light of ethic science and philosophy. The hero of the Æneid is held up by its author as a model of piety and virtue. But how sadly do we miss that harmony between the dramatic and the descriptive elements of the poem, so beautifully maintained in the Iliad! In all the principal transactions in which Æneas is engaged, his real character and conduct are in open conflict with Virgil's description. In his connexion with Dido, if he be supposed to have had no ulterior object in view, he must be condemned as a heartless sensualist. If, as the poet implies, that connexion was formed under the faith of a virtual marriage, he becomes a perjured adulterer; while his cold solemn indifference to the misery caused by his cruel and ungrateful treatment of an amiable and confiding female is odious in the last degree. His invasion of Italy is an act of open usurpation and outrage. His arrival on the coast spreads discord and bloodshed among the previously happy tribes of that country. A father forces his daughter to violate her plighted troth, a mother is driven to suicide by the evils accumulated on her family and nation. All our partialities ought to be on the side, not of the hero whose cause we are called on to espouse, and which is crowned with success, but on that of his adversary. The only palliation which can be suggested for these moral blemishes of the Æneid, the divine authority under which the hero acts, tends, if rightly estimated, but to aggravate the offence, by exhibiting not only weak humanity, but the Deity himself as the patron of injustice and oppression.

Amplification of the subject.

11. Next to these higher features of poetical excellence in the composition of the Iliad, the property which demands attention is, the equable perspicuity of its narrative. It is perhaps the only epic poem of great length and variety of adventure, which can be read through without the consciousness of any such breaks or interruptions of the natural course of events, as to require, from time to time, a certain effort to revive impressions of former transactions, requisite to the full understanding of those in which we are engaged. The action pursues one continuous course, unentangled by either side plots, anticipations, or retrospective narratives, involving abrupt transitions from one branch of subject to another. In the Odyssey, a work of less dignified order, the poet has followed a different method, and apparently sought to increase its interest by the same multiplicity of events and complexity of arrangement which he avoids in the Iliad. The example of the former work has been preferred by his successors, none of whom have aspired to the more simple concentrated unity which distinguishes his great masterpiece. Such scantiness however of fundamental materials, required, in order to secure variety and spirit to the narrative, a proportional richness in that subordinate class of incident or descriptive detail which may be comprehended under the general term of Amplification. This subsidiary element of the action may here be considered as of two kinds, the first of which consists in the mere extension of the general narrative of the poem; the second is that peculiar species of accessory matter familiarly termed Episode.

The epic poet of Homer's day was also the popular historian. His duty was to embody the events he celebrated in such a form as should secure them a permanent hold on the national sympathies. One effective mode, therefore, of varying the course of a naturally limited subject would be, to replenish it with collateral notices of men or events of personal interest to the audience. Such is the catalogue of forces, offering a concise summary of Greek geography and family history. Such are the genealogies, and tales of old heroic exploit, interspersed here and there as opportunity occurred. Hence too the number and duration of the battles, securing to so many different heroes a prominent share in the achievements of this great national war.

As a general rule, these excursions tend as much to adorn as to vary the narrative. At times however it must be allowed that the poet on such occasions, according to the familiar proverb, inclines to slumber, and wanders into trivialities of action or dialogue well calculated to produce a similar disposition on the part of his readers. As an example may be adduced the long colloquy of Idomeneus, first with the god Neptune afterwards with his own esquire Meriones¹, explaining the motives which had induced those two Cretan heroes temporarily to quit the field, and describing the quantity and proper disposal of the arms and accoutrements stored up in their quarters. The oratory of Nestor, the poet's favourite mouthpiece of heroic tradition, though always in good keeping with his character, is also perhaps at times unduly discursive.

Episodes.
of the term.

The foregoing examples belong chiefly to the class of amplification above characterised as the extension of the general course of the narrative. The most important class however is that comprised under the head of Episode. This term in the old critical vocabulary had a wider import than now familiarly attaches to it. Aristotle¹ seems to extend it to every species of circumstantial detail beyond the fundamental facts of the story, in his well known definition of the action of the Odyssey: "A man, after having been many years absent from his home, a solitary wanderer and persecuted by Neptune, while his goods are plundered and his family oppressed by his wife's suitors, at length returns, alone and in distressed condition; when discovering himself to a few friends, he succeeds, with their aid, and without personal loss or damage, in destroying his enemies. This forms the proper subject of the poem, the remainder is but episode." According to this definition the phrase would comprehend a large portion of every epic poem, and of the Iliad more especially. It will here be taken in the more limited signification which it usually bears in the language of modern criticism, as applicable to such portions of the text as could not only be omitted without a serious breach of continuity in the principal action, but themselves possess such a subordinate degree of integrity, that, if recited alone, they would constitute a more or less distinct body of epic narrative. The most important episodes of this class in the Iliad are: the visit of Hector to Troy in the sixth book; the Dolonea, or midnight expedition of Ulysses and Diomed, in the tenth; the description of the Shield of Achilles; the Funeral Games; the dialogues between Priam and Helen in the third book, Diomed and Glaucus in the sixth, and Æneas and Achilles in the twenty-first.

12. Episodes, in this narrower sense, admit of a further distinction of character, founded on their greater or less coherence with the principal subject. The Dolonea, for example, and the Funeral Games, though not indispensable, are continuous portions of the main narrative; the address of Glaucus to Diomed, and of Æneas to Achilles, are occupied with matter altogether extraneous to it. The episodes of this latter class in the Iliad are comparatively brief. Here we have another proof of the poet's judgment. The fundamental law for the use of all such accessaries is, that they should offer no unseasonable interruption to the main subject. Their length therefore should, as a general rule, be regulated by their degree of connexion with it. Wherever they seriously divert attention from it, they cannot with propriety be so freely prolonged, as when they merely extend and vary its natural course.

Characteristics of
episodes.

The poet's method of introducing his episodes, also illustrates in a curious manner his tact in the dramatic department of his art. Where, for example, one or more heroes are despatched on some commission, to be executed at a certain distance of time or place, the fulfilment of their task is not, as a general rule, immediately described. A certain interval is allowed them for reaching the appointed scene of action, which interval is dramatised, as it were, either by a temporary continuation of the previous narrative, or by fixing attention for a while on some new transaction, at the close of which the further account of the mission is resumed. The examples of this mode of management, which extends also to other portions of the text besides episodes in the proper sense, offer, in the closeness of their parallel, no unimportant evidence of unity of workmanship. In the heat of the battle called the "Prowess of Diomed," Hector is sent by the seer Helenus with instructions to the Trojan matrons to propitiate the aid of Minerva. He sets out for the city, and the interval necessary for his journey was to be made good. The description of the battle might for this purpose have been continued. In this way however, owing to the sameness of the occurrences, we should have remained comparatively stationary. As a more effectual mode of preventing time from standing still, the hero whose valour was the cause of the mission, is engaged in a new variety of chivalrous adventure, supplying one of the most interesting pieces of family history in the whole cycle of Hellenic tradition.¹ At the conclusion of the tale we rejoin Hector, already arrived at the gate of the city.

On the mission of the heralds for Priam, to ratify the conditions of single combat between Paris and Menelaus, the interval is similarly made good by the dialogue on the city walls, an episode of nearly as distinct character as the dialogue between Diomed and Glaucus.

and crew, and sets sail. The poet then leaves him to pursue his voyage, resumes for a while the affairs of the camp, and then, rejoining him already arrived at Chrysa, completes the account of the mission.

In the seventeenth book Antilochus is despatched from the field of battle to the camp, to announce the death of Patroclus to Achilles. The adventures of the battle are then continued to the conclusion of the canto, and at the commencement of the next the messenger is found already at the tent of the Myrmidon chief.

In the eighteenth book, Thetis, after promising to procure from Vulcan a new suit of armour for her son, is dismissed on her journey to Olympus. The poet then reverts to the transactions of the camp, and, after a proper interval, rejoins Thetis at the residence of the god.

The concise simplicity of the terms in which the subject, in each case, is relinquished or resumed, gives additional point to the parallel :

369. Ἡφαιστου δ' ἴκανε δόμον Θέτις ἀργυρόπεζα.¹

The Odyssey² contains examples of the same method: but as, in that poem, the principal adventures are more numerous, and the scene more widely shifted in the natural course of the action, the dramatic effect is less remarkable.

Virgil.

13. Of episodes standing in closer connexion with the main subject, the chief requisites are that they should be suggested by the natural train of the narrative, and not rudely interrupt any important crisis of the principal action. With these conditions, they may, without detriment to epic unity, be prolonged to a far greater extent than those of the other more independant class. The longest episodes of this description in the Iliad are the "Dolonea" (expedition of Diomed and Ulysses), and the Funeral Games. The excellence of the Greek poet's art will here best appear from a comparison with parallel cases in the most admired epic poem of after ages. It has been already remarked, how naturally the midnight undertaking of the two Greek warriors suggested itself to the mind of a patriotic bard, to relieve a gloomy interval and cheer the drooping spirits of their countrymen. In the parallel episode of Nisus and Euryalus in the Æneid³, whatever the individual merits of its composition, the servility of the imitation is unrelieved by any such epic propriety. It not only forces unexpectedly into primary importance two hitherto unknown personages, but engages them in an adventure as devoid of all influence on the general action as abortive in its own object. Attention has also above been drawn to the poetical propriety, or even necessity, of the funeral honours bestowed by Achilles on Patroclus. The fulfilment of this sacred duty had, ever since the death of his friend, been among the thoughts uppermost in the hero's mind. It had been solemnly promised to the shade of Patroclus in their midnight interview. Here too nothing is interrupted or interfered with. Victory was restored to the Grecian arms. The Trojans were confined trembling within their city walls. The entire action was lodged in gloomy suspense in the hands of Achilles, for the express object of condensing our whole interest on the burning pile of his friend. In the borrowed episode of the *Æneid*¹, the violation of all the rules of propriety is as palpable as their observance in the Iliad. Æneas, released from the obstacles interposed by Dido to his expedition, sails under divine auspices direct for Italy. But, while we are anxiously looking for his arrival at this all important scene of the main action, a storm is suddenly raised and drives him back to Sicily; and for what purpose? To perform the obsequies of Anchises, who had died there a year before on the previous passage of the fleet. This most important duty had, therefore, been neglected at the proper time by his "pious" son, to whom it would, even now, never have occurred but for the accident of the storm. There could hardly be a more unseasonable interruption of the main stream of the narrative, or a less justifiable addition to the author's stock of plagiarisms from his Hellenic original. These remarks apply, with even greater force, to the other pair of parallel episodes in the two poems, descriptive of the armour presented to the hero of each by their respective mothers. The arms of Achilles, the gift of the gods to his father, had been lost, ignominiously stripped from the corpse of Patroclus by Hector. This was the event which, next to the death of his friend, most deeply affected the hero, while it also deprived him of the power of exacting vengeance till the deficiency was supplied. Thetis therefore most opportunely steps in to procure him another suit; and of this occasion the poet avails himself to introduce a masterpiece of brilliant description. In the *Æneid*¹, the hero has lost no arms. He is still in possession of those with which he had engaged Achilles on the field of Troy, and cut his way through the Greek host on the last fatal night of the city, and which were therefore surely equal to cope with Turnus on the banks of the Tiber. There is consequently no pretext whatever for his mother's officious proposal to procure him a fresh suit. The impropriety and superfluity of this excrescence on the correct and elaborate Æneid have been, strange to say, contrasted with the aptness and elegance of the "Shield of Achilles," by the same critics² who are most strenuous in stigmatising that beautiful episode as a spurious supplement, on the ground of its incongruity with the main action of the Iliad.

CHARACTER OF HECUBA. FUNERAL DIRGE OF HECTOR.—20. CHARACTERS OF PARIS AND HELEN.

1. CONSISTENTLY with the general plan of this analysis the object of the present chapter is twofold; to illustrate the characters of the Iliad, and, through them, the origin of the work in which they are delineated. It is proposed therefore first to offer a concise sketch of the character of each hero, as exhibited in his general conduct, and then to trace its nicer traits of individuality in the dramatic details by which it is shadowed forth.

Supplementary remarks on the character of Achilles.

The heroes who present themselves as chief objects of attention are, on the side of the Greeks, Achilles, Agamemnon, Diomed, Ulysses, Menelaus, Nestor, Ajax; on that of the Trojans, Priam, Hector, Æneas, Paris, with the three heroines, Hecuba, Andromache, Helen.

The general view of the character of Achilles has, for reasons already explained, been embodied in the previous chapter. Among the finer traits of the portrait, attention will here be chiefly directed to those specimens of his poetical oratory in which the vicissitudes of his mental emotions are most powerfully and graphically displayed. The difficulty which must always attend the efforts of the literary critic to convey to others his own impressions of the more delicate features of peculiarity in the creations of original genius, is greatly relieved in the case of Homer, by the graphic spirit and precision of the touches by which those features are delineated. The eloquence of Achilles is not a mere general expression of ideal heroism. It identifies itself by certain distinct and tangible marks, as the oratory of the one individual Achilles, placed in his mouth by the one individual Homer. The same generosity, the same haughty pride, impetuous ardour, and wayward excitability, already traced in the vicissitudes of his conduct, find vent in equally wayward, often almost incoherent, bursts of eloquence; in abrupt transitions from calm to storm, from tenderness to wrath, bespeaking the corresponding struggles of resentment, remorse, love, hatred, grief, or compassion, in his bosom. Much also of the effect here, as in the poet's other more striking portraits, depends on his management of that peculiar species of epic mechanism which, for want of a better title, may be comprised under the general head of "Homeric commonplace;" where, often unconsciously, but sometimes with evident design, certain emphatic modes of expression are reproduced, the better to mark, or stereotype as it were, corresponding modes of thought or action. This important element of Homer's art will hereafter be more closely considered in treating of his style. Its general nature and value will, however, sufficiently appear from the examples about to be adduced.

2. It is in his address to Agamemnon's deputation, in the ninth book, that the genius of the hero's eloquence is most vividly displayed. This whole debate is indeed a wonderful specimen of rhetorical as well as poetical power, perhaps the highest effort of Homer's dramatic art. The order and dignity with which it is conducted, the happy allotment to each speaker of his own characteristic tone and style, and the skill with which their respective resources of natural oratory are brought to bear on the momentous question at issue, are all equally admirable. The harangue of Ulysses is distinguished by the persuasive eloquence of the sage, the courtier, and the practised pleader; that of Phœnix is the touching, but somewhat diffuse appeal of the antient guardian to his beloved pupil; while Ajax steps in at the close, cutting short the fruitless negotiation by a blunt expression of sullen resentment at the stern unforgiving temper of their host. The address of Achilles himself is one continued struggle of a proud spirit, to preserve calmness amid a fierce conflict of passions. So long as the train of his discourse is confined to explanation of his own conduct, it maintains a comparatively equable tenor: but no sooner does it involve any closer allusion to the author of his wrong, than his indignation effervesces into sallies of virulent, almost bewildered invective. It is this mixture of calmness and impetuosity, of haughty self-command and fervid agitation, which gives the tone to the whole speech, subdividing it, by successive bursts of excited feeling, into clauses or paragraphs, which, rising in pathos to a sort of climax, again subside into more placid mood, until a fresh recurrence of the former stimulus.

Deputation of Agamem-
non.

The deputation is received courteously, even affectionately : but neither friendship for its members, nor the abject submission of Agamemnon, can bend the sternness of the hero's purpose. Ulysses, the chief spokesman of the party, obtains a patient hearing. Achilles then, after a gentle taunt at the studied grace of the Ithacan chief's oratory, declares his own intention to speak his mind bluntly and openly, in two remarkable lines which passed into a proverb against every species of duplicity or artifice : 312.

ἐχθρὸς γάρ μοι κεῖνος ὁμῶς Ἀῖδαο πύλῃσιν,
ὅς χ' ἕτερον μὲν κεύθῃ ἐνὶ φρεσὶν, ἄλλο δὲ εἴπῃ.

As he passes on to stigmatise the weakness and iniquity of Agamemnon's rule, his language becomes agitated to incoherence : 316.

ἐπεὶ οὐκ ἄρα τις χάρις ἦεν, μάρνασθαι δηϊοσιν ἐπ' ἀνδράσι νωλεμέδς αἰεὶ· ἴση μοῖρα μένοντι καὶ εἰ μάλα τις πολεμίζοι· ἐν δὲ ἰγ' τιμῇ ἡμὲν κακὸς ἦδὲ καὶ ἐσθλός· κάτθαν' ὁμῶς ὃ τ' ἀεργὸς ἀνὴρ, ὅτε πολλὰ ἐοργῶς. . .

He next recapitulates, in a more tranquil strain of honest satisfaction, his own disinterested services to the common cause, contrasting them with the eagerness of his laggard commander to appropriate their fruits, under the figure of a parent bird, which fares ill and stints herself in her efforts to provide for her helpless nestlings : 323.

ὥς δ' ὄρνις ἀπτῇσι νεοσσοῖσι προφέρῃσι
μάστακ' ἐπεὶ κε λάβῃσι, κακῶς δ' ἄρα οἱ πέλει αὐτῇ, ὥς καὶ ἐγὼ . . .

This simile offers a fine example of another powerful weapon of Homer's poetical rhetoric, the Onomatopœia, or adaptation of the sound of words to their sense. The emphatic expression of scorn in the figure, consists greatly in the succession of low sibilant or lispingsyllables in its more prominent metrical cadences.

As the train of ideas again touches on sorer points, the hero's wrath finds vent in a series of abrupt interrogatories, wound up to an electrifying climax of withering sarcasm: 335.

ἐμεῦ δ' ἀπὸ μούνου Ἀχαιῶν
 εἴλετ', ἔχει δ' ἄλοχον θυμαρέα· τῇ παριαύων τερπέσθω! τί δὲ δεῖ πολεμιζέμεναι Τρώεσσι
 Ἀργείους; τί δὲ λαὸν ἀνήγαγεν ἐνθάδ' ἀγείρας Ἀτρεΐδης; ἢ οὐχ' Ἑλένης ἔνεκ' ἠϋκόμοιο;
 ἦ μοῦνοι φιλέουσ' ἀλόχους μερόπων ἀνθρώπων Ἀτρεΐδαι;

His injunction to the negotiators faithfully to report his answer to their employer, "who had not dared himself to appear in his presence," brings on another still fiercer sally of broken invective, terminating in a scornful dismissal from his thoughts of so contemptible an object: 372.

 οὐδ' ἂν ἔτ' αὖτις
 ἔξαπάφοιτ' ἐπέεσσιν· ἄλιν δέ οἱ! ἀλλὰ ἔκηνος ἐρρέτω· ἐκ γὰρ εὖ φρένας εἴλετο μητίετα Ζεύς.

From this point his language, resuming and maintaining to the close a more sober and placid tone, is seasoned with moral reflexions on the vanity of life its duration and pursuits, and with allusions to the special fatality of his own destiny, all marked by a simple and impressive melancholy. His final declaration to abide by his previous resolve is couched in calm and friendly, but peremptory terms.

With the above series of passages may be collated his dialogue with Patroclus in the sixteenth book.¹ The same characteristics of his eloquence are there reproduced, in strikingly parallel forms, in the torrent of broken sentences with which he passes in review the disasters of the army, the circumstances of its defeat, the need of his succour, the speedy change it would produce, the folly and shame of Agamemnon, his own triumph. . . . 67.

κεκλίεται, χάρης ὀλίγην ἔτι μοῖραν ἔχοντες,
'Αργεῖοι· Τρώων δὲ πόλις ἐπὶ πᾶσα βέβηκε θάρσυνος· οὐ γὰρ ἐμῆς κόρυθος λεύσσοις μέταπον ἐγγύθι λαμπομένης· τάχα κεν φεύγοντες ἐναύλους

Consistency
in the details of
delineation.

3. Leaving the reader to trace for himself, in the other transactions where Achilles takes the lead, the same consistent adaptation of his oratory to his character, we shall close these extracts with a series of parallel passages, evincing in a singularly pointed manner the systematic, though probably unconscious unity, with which the poet is wont to individualise his portraits. The texts in question are, where the hero, when tempted to enlarge on any sore subject, such as his own injuries, errors, griefs, suddenly breaks off and dismisses it, as if fearful of being betrayed into some exhibition of unmanly or querulous irritation. According to the courtesy of Homeric art already referred to, this abrupt dropping of the subject is expressed by the same or a closely similar form of words, recurring in each case in so easy and spontaneous a manner, that they have never attracted the attention of a single critic, in illustration of the genius either of the hero or of the poem. The first example is from his address to Patroclus, vindicating his conduct against the charge of unreasonable implacability: XVI. 52.

 κούρην, ἣν ἄρα μοι γέρας ἔξελον υἷες Ἀχαιῶν, . . .
 τὴν ἂψ ἐκ χειρῶν ἔλετο κρείων Ἀγαμέμνων . . .
 ἀλλὰ τὰ μὲν προτετύχθαι ἐάσομεν. . .

The next is from his dialogue with Thetis, when agonised by remorse: XVIII. 107.

ὥς ἔρις ἔκ τε θεῶν ἔκ τ' ἀνθρώπων ἀπόλοιτο, καὶ χόλος, ὃς τ' ἐφέηκε πολύφρονά περ χαλεπῆναι, .
 ὥς ἐμὲ νῦν ἐχόλωσεν ἄναξ ἀνδρῶν Ἀγαμέμνων. . .
 ἀλλὰ τὰ μὲν προτετύχθαι ἐάσομεν ἀχνύμενοί περ,
 θυμὸν ἐνὶ στήθεσσι φίλον δαμάσαντες ἀνάγκη.

A third is in his reconciliation with Agamemnon: XIX. 56.

Ἀτρεΐδην, ἣ ἄρ τι τὸδ' ἀμφοτέροισιν ἄρειον ἔπλετο, σοὶ καὶ ἐμοί, ὅτε νῶϊ περ ἀχνυμένω κῆρ θυμοβόρῳ ἔριδι μενεήναμεν εἵνεκα κούρης. . . .

 ἀλλὰ τὰ μὲν προτετύχθαι ἐάσομεν ἀχνύμε-νοί περ,

θυμὸν ἐνὶ στήθεσσι φίλον δαμάσαντες ἀνάγκη.

A fourth is in his consolatory address to Priam:

πῶς ἔτλης ἐπὶ νῆας Ἀχαιῶν ἐλθέμεν οἶος ἀνδρὸς ἐς ὀφθαλμούς, ὅς τοι πολέας τε καὶ ἐσθλοὺς υἷεας ἐξενάριξα; σιδήρειόν νύ τοι ἦτορ!
 ἀλλ' ἄγε δὴ κατ' ἄρ' ἔζευ ἐπὶ θρόνου, ἄλγεα δ' ἔμπης
 ἐν θυμῷ κατακεῖσθαι ἐάσομεν, ἀχνύμενοί περ. .

Not only is this expressive formula appropriated, under its several varieties, throughout the twenty-four books of the Iliad, to Achilles alone, but the untranslatable phrase προτετύχθαι, in which its value so greatly consists, is limited to the above passages alone, in the poet's works or in the Greek language.

Similar in spirit is the scornful interruption of his invective against Agamemnon in the text already quoted: IX. 376.

 ἐρρέτω· ἐκ γὰρ εὖ φρένας, κ.τ.λ.¹

Attention must also be directed to the consistent propriety of the imagery employed in the embellish-

¹ Further illustration of Homer's deep insight into human nature, and of his fine tact in exhibiting in words the waywardness of a proud but generous temper, may be derived from the parallel of a late illustrious British poet, among whose eccentricities this same haughty petulance was one of the most conspicuous. The works of Byron, where involving allusion to the vicissitudes of his own destiny, offer examples of this abrupt dismissal of sore subjects, so similar, both in spirit and expression, to the passages above cited, as almost to appear paraphrases of the words of Achilles. See Childe Harold, canto iv. stanzas 7. 52. 133. 164.; conf. III. 46.

ment of the hero's portrait. Recourse has here been had alone or chiefly to the higher phenomena of the heavens, and other grand or terrible objects. His sudden appearance, alone and unarmed, on the rampart, routing the Trojans by his simple war shout, is compared, in one of the finest descriptions of the poem, to a column of smoke ascending from a beacon fire, lighted as a signal of distress on a distant island assailed by hostile fleets : XVIII. 205.

 χρύσειον, ἐκ δ' αὐτοῦ δαΐε φλόγα παμφανόωσαν.
 ὥς δ' ὅτε καπνὸς ἰὼν ἐξ ἄστεος αἰθέρ' ἵκηται,¹ τηλόθεν ἐκ νήσου τὴν δῆϊοι ἀμφιμάχονται, . . .
 ὥς ἀπ' Ἀχιλλῆος κεφαλῆς σέλας αἰθέρ' ἵκανεν.

Similar is the comparison of the terror which his appearance on the field spreads through the Trojan lines, to the smoke of a burning city. The parallel between the two texts is here as remarkable in the expression as in the spirit : XXI. 522.

ὥς δ' ὅτε καπνὸς ἰὼν εἰς οὐρανὸν εὐρύν ἰκάνει ἄστεος αἰθομένοιο. . . .

As seen by Priam, hot in pursuit of Hector and the

¹ For this verse Wolf would prefer the reading transmitted by an old commentator, as approved by Aristarchus :

Ὡς δ' ὅτε πῦρ ἐπὶ πόντον ἀριπρεπὲς αἰθέρ' ἵκηται.

The change, even in the face of so high authority, must be pronounced fatal to the value of the passage. It would not only exclude one of the noblest parts of the figure, but destroy the aptness of the simile. Pallas had enveloped the hero's head in a cloud, beautifully figured by the beacon column of smoke, out of which the flame rises. In the reading of Aristarchus the cloud disappears altogether. The metre in the genuine text is also, according to Homer's custom, finely adapted by its sonorous roundness to the grandeur of the object described, a merit to which the hurried succession of dactyls in the proposed alteration has no claim whatever.

routed Trojan host, his destructive ardour and the splendour of his appearance are jointly illustrated, in a passage of singular beauty, by the brilliant but noxious dogstar.¹ On other occasions the lustre of his person, on going forth fully equipped to battle, is likened to that of the rising sun.

Of the circumstances which unite to make up the sublimity of the Iliad, one of the most effective is the vicinity of the scene of action to the sea. In no case has the poet turned this advantage to happier account, than in the connexion established between that grandest of natural objects and the grandest of his own creations. Achilles, after his altercation with Atrides, retiring to nurse his indignation in solitude, "sits alone on the beach, looking across the dark blue sea."² The sea-shore is the scene of his touching interview with the shade of his friend³, when, after wandering restless the night long mourning his bereavement, he lies down oppressed with fatigue, and slumbers on the beach. In the ensuing solemn dedication to Patroclus of the locks formerly destined for his native river Spercheüs, he utters his vow, "looking across the dark blue ocean."⁴ Again when, after his revenge is satiated, grief and remorse once more predominate in his breast, starting from his troubled sleep he wanders disconsolate on the shore.⁵ His summons to the winds to hasten across the Thracian sea, and fan the sluggish flame of the funeral pile of his friend, while he watches the midnight progress of the consuming element, is another sublime trait of mythological imagery.⁶

The illustrations with which he seasons his own eloquence are marked by the same features of dignity and solemnity. Those of the historical class more especially, are derived from objects of deep national interest or of remote mythical antiquity. Such are, in his address to Agamemnon's deputation, the allusions to the power, wealth, and splendour of the Egyptian Thebes, the Pythian sanctuary, or the Minyea Orchomenus; such, on other occasions, his appeals to the dreary but venerable Pelagic shrine of Dodona¹; to the war in heaven, the hundred-handed Briareus², and to the melancholy and mysterious fate of Niobe and her children.³

AGAMEMNON.

4. The character of Agamemnon, inferior as it is both in moral and poetical dignity, affords a no less signal example of the poet's skill in this department of his art than the ideal excellence of Achilles. The chief of the Pelopidæ belongs to that not uncommon class of persons in whom good and evil, strength and weakness, are so curiously blended, that their conduct seems to depend, as much or more on the external influences to which they may be exposed, than on their own judgement. Chief of the most powerful family of Hellenic princes, and commander of the confederate force in a great national enterprise; of royal presence, valiant, and skilled in the art of war, he possessed many of the requisites for the fulfilment of his high duties. A patriotic anxiety for the welfare of his army is also habitually uppermost in his breast. But without firmness of purpose or steady principle, easily elated by good or cast down by adverse fortune, he is misled by the caprice of either state of mind into actions, the folly or wickedness of which, on the first revulsion of feeling, he is himself the foremost to acknowledge and lament.

At the commencement of the poem, the extremity to which Troy was reduced, with the subjection of the surrounding country, placed him in the position of a conqueror at the head of a victorious army. In the transactions of the first book accordingly, he appears a vain-glorious man, deaf to every consideration but his own personal dignity and enjoyment. Hence his outrageous treatment of the venerable priest and afflicted parent, and his unmanly attack on the augur Calchas, each for presuming to interfere with his objects of sensual indulgence. In the subsequent altercation with Achilles, whatever his defects of temper or policy, there is, as has been seen, much to palliate or even justify his conduct. In the sequel, acting under the authority of Jupiter, he convenes his councils, and prepares for the renewal of hostilities, with becoming dignity: but on the unexpected result of his trial of the temper of his troops, he is bewildered and powerless; and to prevent the complete disorganisation of the host required the energy and presence of mind of Ulysses. In the field, down to the disastrous termination of the second great battle, his bearing is that of the brave and experienced general: but with his rapid reverse of fortune despair as rapidly succeeds to confidence. During the afflicting scenes that follow, our sympathy with his patriotic anxiety for the national weal is more than counterbalanced by contempt for his abject humiliation to the lately contemned Myrmidon chief, and for his

5. The oratory of Agamemnon is replete, like that of Achilles, with idiomatic touches vividly expressive of his dominant peculiarities. The folly of his first childish ebullition of offended royalty against the prophet Calchas, for simply declaring the cause of the pestilence, stands self-convicted by his own subsequent admission that the augur was right, implied in his offer to deliver up the damsel. Like the pampered patient, he swallows the nauseous drug but vents his rage on the vial that contained it. Nor can there be a livelier picture of the effect of a desperate reverse of fortune on the mind of a vacillating and desponding commander, than his conversation with Nestor on the night after his first defeat: x. 91.

His oratory.

πλάζομαι ὧδ', ἐπεὶ οὐ μοι ἐπ' ὄμμασι νήδυμος ὕπνος
 ἰζάνει, ἀλλὰ μέλει πόλεμος καὶ κῆδ' Ἀχαιῶν.

 στηθέων ἐκθρώσκει· τρομέει δ' ὕπο φαίδιμα γυῖα.

Here however, as in the case of Achilles, the most striking illustration of unity of poetical conception consists in a series of parallel passages, offering similar evidence of Homer's peculiar mode of employing the mechanical element of his art to individualise the portraits of his heroes. Agamemnon has just been described as a man not devoid of talent or generosity, but of ill-regulated mind, liable to be hurried by the impulse of the moment into actions, to the folly or crime of which he is keenly alive in hours of reflexion and repentance. This joint ascendancy of the weak and wicked element of our nature is expressed in Homer's vocabulary by the term Atë, and personified under that title as a female deity. The phrase denotes, in its narrower sense, Evil or Sin, combined with mental delusion, but admits of a variety of significations, according to the degree in which those fundamental ideas may be modified. Sometimes it indicates calamity produced by crime or folly; sometimes vice or delusion without reference to their consequences. As a member of the poetical Pantheon, Atë is the Evil genius, satan, or tempter, by whom men, or even gods, are seduced into actions involving future shame and remorse. She is, in fact, a type of the prominent failing of Agamemnon's character. Accordingly, out of about thirty occasions in which the term occurs in the Iliad, it has been used no less than twenty-four with especial reference to his conduct, while of the remaining examples it has been but rarely, and quite incidentally, connected with the name of any other person or object.¹ The greater proportion of cases are in the hero's own appeals to the power of the demon in palliation of his errors, according to the practice, so familiar with Homer's warriors, of fastening the blame of their own misconduct on their objects of ~~superstitious~~ worship.

¹ In connexion with Agamemnon or his affairs, the phrase occurs as a noun, in L. 412., II. 111., VIII. 237., IX. 18. 115. 504, 505. 512., XVI. 274., XIX. 88. 91. 126. 129. 136. 270.: as a verb, in VIII. 237., IX. 116. 119., XIX. 91. 95. 113. 129. 136. In the remaining examples it is used, twice with reference to the rash valour of Patroclus, XVI. 685. 805., as the cause of his death; once in each case respectively, to characterise the folly, delusion, or vice, of five other persons: Helen, VI. 356.; Paris, XXIV. 28.; Phoenix, IX. 537.; Dolon, X. 391.; Agastrophus, XI. 340.; and once in a general sense, XXIV. 480.

The first example is in the supplication of Achilles to his mother to intercede with Jove to avenge his cause, in order "that Agamemnon may be made to rue:" I. 412.

ἦν ἄτην ὅτ' ἄριστον Ἀχαιῶν οὐδὲν ἔτισεν.

These lines again occur in the address of Patroclus to the Myrmidons in the sixteenth book.

In his own harangue to the host, immediately after the quarrel, Atrides attributes the delayed fulfilment of his hopes to the combined influence of Jove and Atë: II. 111.

Ζεὺς με μέγα Κρονίδης ἄτη ἐνέδησε βαρεῖη. . .

In the eighth book he imputes to the same cause the ill success of his arms: VIII. 236.

Ζεῦ πάτερ, ἥ ῥά τιν' ἦδη ὑπερμενέων βασιλῆων
τῇ δ' ἄτη ἄσασας;

In the council convened after his first defeat, he renews his former complaint in similar terms: and, on Nestor's assigning his late treatment of Achilles as the cause of the national calamity, he exclaims, in a piteous tone of querulous dejection: IX. 115.

ὦ γέρον, οὗ τι ψεῦδος ἐμὰς ἄτας κατέλεξας·
ἄσάμην, οὐδ' αὐτὸς ἀναίνομαι. . . .
ἀλλ' ἐπεὶ ἄσάμην, φρεσὶ λευγαλήησι πιθήσας, ἄψ' ἐθέλω ἄρῃσαι. . .

Phoenix, in his intercession for him with Achilles, palliates his errors and reproves the obduracy of the Myrmidon chief, in a beautiful allegory, worthy even of the pure genius of Christian philosophy. The power of Sin on the human mind is figured by "the swift and impetuous Atë, outstripping her attendant goddesses of Atonement, who, though feeble, decrepid, and squalid, are yet able and ready, when invoked, to heal the wounds inflicted by their terrible precursor : " IX. 502.

καὶ γάρ τε Λιταὶ εἰσι Διὸς κοῦραι μέγαλοιοι, χωλαί τε, ῥυσαί τε, παραβλῶπές τ' ὀφθαλμῶ·
αἶ ῥά τε καὶ μετόπισθ' Ἄτης ἀλέγουσι κιῶσαι.
ἣ δ' Ἄτη σθεναρή τε καὶ ἀρτίπος. . . .

But the most curious passage of the series is in Agamemnon's apologetic address to Achilles, on their final reconciliation. His only excuse for his conduct is an appeal to the irresistible power of Atë, as exercised on the destinies of Jove himself, and to the parallel between his own case and that of the king of Olympus : XIX. 134.

οὐ δυνάμην λελαθέσθ' ἄτης ἥ πρῶτον ἀάσθην.
ἀλλ' ἐπεὶ ἀασάμην, καὶ μευ φρένας ἐξέλετο Ζεὺς,
ἀψ' ἐθέλω ἀρέσαι¹

Nor can there be a more spirited contrast than the contemptuous, though courteous brevity of the Myrmidon hero's reply to this long-winded harangue of his crest-fallen commander. In the sequel, however, Achilles admits the reasonableness of Agamemnon's proposal to place the whole blame to the joint account of Jupiter and Atë : XIX. 270.

Ζεῦ πάτερ, ἦ μέγας ἄτας ἀνδρεσσι διδοισθα !

Here, as in regard to the προτετύχθαι εἰάσομεν of Achilles, the question occurs : whether such consistent unity in the delineation, by so very delicate a process, of so very peculiar a character, can reasonably be ascribed to more than a single artist ?

From the epoch when Achilles reappears on the stage, Agamemnon falls back among the secondary actors of the poem. Of the more amiable features of his character the most prominent is his warm brotherly affection for Menelaus, to which attention will be directed in our notice of that hero.

DIOMED.

6. Among the warriors of the Iliad, Diomed is the one who in general excellence ranks nearest to Achilles, or even in some respects may be said to surpass him. The character of Tydides is not indeed marked by the grander features, moral or physical, which distinguish the Thessalian chief: but if there is less to awaken admiration or awe, there is more to conciliate esteem. As Achilles is the type of ideal heroism, Diomed is that of military virtue. He may, indeed, be pronounced a blameless specimen of the Greek warrior; and, hence a singular merit in the delineation of his portrait, is the tact of the poet in imparting to it such traits of individuality, as to exclude the insipidity commonly attaching to irreproachable excellence in heroes of chivalry. Diomed is the youngest of the seven leading chiefs; and his most prominent feature, next to the energy of his bearing, is its modesty. With a habitual deference to the maturer judgement of his colleagues, he is yet always ready, with manly frankness, to assert his opinion where duty requires. Hence he is usually put forward when any alarming crisis calls for prompt and bold decision. During the absence of Achilles he is the soul of every martial achievement, until forced by wounds to retire from the field. Conjointly with Ulysses, he is the special favourite of Minerva. They are the two heroes who unite, in the amplest degree, the qualities of which she was the patroness, valour, discretion, and enterprise. In every encounter, whether against men or gods, Diomed under her auspices is successful. He discomfits not only Hector and Æneas, the former on two occasions, but Mars himself, and is never worsted or repulsed but by divine interference. When causelessly rebuked by Agamemnon for an apparent want of martial zeal, he listens in respectful silence; and reprimands his esquire for presuming to retort on the commander in chief.¹ His justification is better secured by the brilliant lead taken by him in the ensuing combat. In the sequel, as the critical turns of fortune demand prowess in the field or vigour in the council, the services of Diomed seldom fail to be called into request. In the seventh book², when the prolonged silence of the elder chiefs implies an acquiescence in the dishonourable terms of peace proposed by Priam, Diomed, by a single pithy remonstrance, insures their immediate rejection. In the disastrous flight of the Greeks in the following battle³, when a "divine panic" spreads through the lines, extending even to Ajax, Ulysses, and the Atridæ, Diomed, alone exempt from its influence, remains to succour the aged Nestor, nor can his efforts to stem the torrent of the victorious enemy be restrained but by the irresistible arms of Jupiter. When, after the fatal issue of the same battle, Agamemnon's proposal to abandon the war appears to meet with the tacit approval of his fellow-chiefs⁴, Diomed, after again vainly waiting till some more aged councillor should have risen, respectfully but resolutely condemns the dastardly suggestion. On hearing the result of the mission to Achilles, again a gloomy despondency paralyses the assembly; again Diomed, after the customary pause, denounces their pusillanimous dependance on the arm of a single warrior instead of their own valour. When Nestor proposes the mid-night expedition to the Trojan camp, the young hero as usual modestly holds back, to give place to some more experienced warrior, before devoting himself to the hazardous enterprise.

7. The language of Diomed is in strict keeping His oratory. with his character, brief, simple, and decided. He never takes part in the debate but when the judgement of his elders is at fault. He then speaks concisely and to the point. Among the heroes of the Iliad there is none, not even Ajax, who does so much and says so little. His qualities therefore, as an orator, are shadowed forth as much in the circumstances by which he is induced to speak, as in his own eloquence. Even here however the poet has managed, through his favourite epic mechanism, strikingly to individualise the style of that eloquence, by certain characteristic turns of expression, slightly varied for the occasion, but limited to Diomed alone. The first example occurs after the humiliating proposal of peace by the Trojan herald: VII. 398.

ὁψὲ δὲ δὴ μετέειπε βοὴν ἀγαθὸς Διομήδης·

μήτ' ἄρ' τις νῦν κτήματ' Ἀλεξάνδροιο δεχέσθω, . . .

ὥς ἔφαθ'· οἱ δ' ἄρα πάντες ἐπὶ ἅχον υἷες Ἀχαιῶν,
μῦθον ἀγασσάμενοι Διομήδεος ἱπποδάμοιο.

The next is after Agamemnon's suggestion of flight :
IX. 29 — 50.

ὥς ἔφαθ'· οἱ δ' ἄρα πάντες ἀκὴν ἐγένοντο σιωπῇ,
δὴν δ' ἀνέω ἦσαν τετιηότες υἷες Ἀχαιῶν,
ὄψ' ἐδὲ δὴ μετέειπε βοὴν ἀγαθὸς Διομήδης·
Ἄτρεϊδῃ, σοὶ πρῶτα μαχήσομαι ἀφραδέοντι, . . .
ὥς ἔφαθ'· οἱ δ' ἄρα πάντες ἐπίαχον υἷες Ἀχαιῶν,
μῦθον ἀγασσάμενοι Διομήδεος ἱπποδάμοιο.

A third is after the failure of the mission to Achilles :
IX. 693 — 710.

ὥς ἔφαθ'· οἱ δ' ἄρα πάντες ἀκὴν ἐγένοντο σιωπῇ,
δὴν δ' ἀνέω ἦσαν τετιηότες υἷες Ἀχαιῶν,
ὄψ' ἐδὲ δὴ μετέειπε βοὴν ἀγαθὸς Διομήδης·
Ἄτρεϊδῃ, κύδιστε, ἄναξ ἀνδρῶν Ἀγάμεμνον, μὴ ὄφελος λίσσεσθαι ἀμύμονα Πηλεΐωνα, . . .
ὥς ἔφαθ'· οἱ δ' ἄρα πάντες ἐπήνησαν βασιλῆες,
μῦθον ἀγασσάμενοι Διομήδεος ἱπποδάμοιο.

A fourth is after Nestor's proposal of the midnight expedition to the Trojan camp: x. 218.

ὥς ἔφαθ'· οἱ δ' ἄρα πάντες ἀκὴν ἐγένοντο σιωπῇ,
τοῖσι δὲ καὶ μετέειπε βοὴν ἀγαθὸς Διομήδης· Νέστορ, ἔμ' ὀτρύνει κραδίη καὶ θυμὸς ἀγήνωρ . . .
ὥς ἔφαθ'· οἱ δ' ἔβελον Διομήδῃ πολλοὶ ἔπεισθαι.

In each case a dilemma, a pause, a silence ; Diomed steps forward, by a few concise remarks restores confidence, and his views are applauded and adopted.¹

The δὴν δ' ἀνέω ἦσαν, and the ὄψ' ἐδὲ δὴ μετέειπε, under their occasional varieties, are here as exclusively characteristic of Diomed, as the ἀλλὰ τὰ μὲν προτετύχθαι ἐάσομεν is of Achilles, or the Ἄτῃ of Agamemnon.

On the reappearance of Achilles, Diomed, with every other hero put forward in the absence of the protagonist, falls into the background. In the games however he maintains, under the auspices of his patroness Minerva, his superiority over every competitor in gymnastic achievement.

Any remarks on the character of Ulysses, the hero who next in point of importance would demand attention, will be reserved for the analysis of the Odyssey. In that poem he acts the part of Protagonist. To it consequently we must look for his entire portrait, of which his appearances in the Iliad are but supplementary touches. In the following case it will be proper to reverse this order, and complete the picture presented in the Iliad, by the additional traits derived from the Odyssey.

MENELAUS.

8. Menelaus unites, but on a smaller scale, the valour, modesty, and discretion of Diomed, with the milder virtues of Patroclus, and with a quickness of temper and warmth of feeling peculiar to himself. Although described as inferior in the aggregate of his warlike accomplishments to the other leading chiefs¹, he yields to none in courage or adventurous spirit. But the animating principle of his conduct, which gives the tone to his whole character, is gratitude to his fellow-countrymen for their exertions in his cause, with a painful sense of the calamities which they were doomed to suffer for his sake. Towards Agamemnon these sentiments, combined with fraternal love and veneration for his high rank and office, produce a devoted attachment to his person,

and unqualified deference to his will. Nor is Agamemnon less conspicuous for brotherly affection. This reciprocal feeling forms one of the most agreeable features in the character of each, and has furnished the poet with many lively and pathetic scenes.

The first appearance of Menelaus is in his duel with Paris. His joyful eagerness for the combat is here ascribed by himself, rather to the prospect it offers of terminating the privations of his friends, than even to his desire of avenging his injuries or asserting his rights: III. 97.

μάλιστα γὰρ ἄλγος ἰκάνει
θυμὸν ἐμὸν· φρονέω δὲ διακρινθήμεναι ἤδη
'Αργείους καὶ Τρῶας· ἐπεὶ κακὰ πολλὰ πέποσθε εἶνεν' ἐμῆς ἔριδος. . . .

In the disastrous night of the Dolonea the welfare of those friends is still uppermost in his thoughts: X. 25.

ὥς δ' αὖτως Μενέλαον ἔχε τρόμος· οὐδὲ γὰρ αὐτῶ ὕπνος ἐπὶ βλεφάροισιν ἐφίζανε, μή τι πάθοιεν
'Αργεῖοι, τοὶ δὲ ἔθεν εἵνεκα πουλὺν ἐφ' ὕγρην

The brotherly affection of Agamemnon is touchingly displayed in the adventure of the fourth book, when, supposing his brother's life in danger from the wound of Pandarus, with his characteristic despondency and self-reproach he blames himself as the cause of the fatality: IV. 155—169.

φίλε κασίγνητε, θάνατόν νύ τοι ὄρκι' ἔταμνον, οἷον προστήσας πρὸ 'Αχαιῶν Τρῶσι μάχεσθαι. . . .
ἀλλὰ μοι αἰνὸν ἄχος σέθεν ἔσσεται, ὦ Μενέλαε, αἶ κε θάνῃς,
καὶ κεν ἐλέγχιστος πολυδίψιον 'Αργος ἰκοίμην. . .

The fraternal tenderness of Agamemnon is also beautifully expressed in his anxiety lest, in compliment to his own royal dignity, Menelaus, though inferior in martial accomplishment to many other chiefs, should be selected by Diomed as the comrade of his midnight adventure.¹

The dauntless valour of Menelaus, and his sensitive keenness of temper, are jointly displayed in his forwardness to accept the challenge of Hector; his modesty and good sense are no less conspicuous in his ready submission to Agamemnon, who, anxious as well for his brother's safety as the credit of the Greek arms, urges him to resign the dangerous honour into abler hands.² On the gloomy night after the second day's battle, the Spartan chief, roused from his sleep by sympathy with his brother's disquietude, and anxiety to share his labours and distresses, rises and hastens to his side.³ When Nestor, therefore, taxes Menelaus with a slackness to support Agamemnon⁴ in his arduous duties, the latter warmly defends him from the groundless charge, attributing even his errors to over-regard for his own imperial person and authority.

After the death of Patroclus, Menelaus takes the lead in the field, stimulated by a powerful combination of influences, grief for the loss and gratitude for the services of so generous a supporter of his cause, and a sense of the peculiar shame that would attach to himself should the body of his benefactor remain in the hands of the enemy.⁵ Inspired by these feelings, he signalises himself so much beyond his apparent powers, as to have obtained for this portion of the poem the title of Prowess of Menelaus.

The brilliancy of his conduct secures him the patronage of Minerva, and the spirit with which she animates him is illustrated by a figure singularly adapted to his character and person. He is compared to a fly, the emblem of boldness and activity apart from physical strength, which, when repeatedly driven off by superior force, still nimbly returns nothing daunted to the attack: xvii. 571.

ἦτε καὶ ἐργομένη μάλα περ χροὸς ἀνδρομέοιο ἰσχανάα δακέειν. . . .

In the chariot race with Antilochus, his generous sense of gratitude again appears, in his reasons for the frank concession of his acknowledged prize to his young comrade: xxiii. 606.

οὐ γάρ κέν με τάχ' ἄλλος ἀνὴρ παρέπεισεν Ἀχαιῶν·
ἀλλὰ σὺ γὰρ δὴ πόλλ' ἤπαθες καὶ πόλλ' ἐμόγησας, σός τε πατὴρ ἀγαθός, καὶ ἀδελφεός, εἶνεκ' ἐμεῖο. . .

Parallel of the Ody-
sey.

In the Odyssey these characteristics are sustained with a simple unstudied consistency, which speaks powerfully in favour of the common authorship of the two poems. The same lively gratitude towards his companions in arms maintains its ascendant in his declining years, tempered by melancholy reflexions on the many that had perished, and on the disasters still endured by others for his sake. His warm affection for Agamemnon is now chastened by grief for his death, which his own capricious fortune had deprived him of the power either to avert or avenge; a grief embittered by the thought, that the day of their parting had witnessed the only recorded dissension between them.¹ Hence the surprise expressed by

Telemachus to Nestor, on hearing of the fate of Agamemnon, that Menelaus should not have appeared either as his defender or avenger: Od. III. 249.

ποῦ Μενέλαος ἔην ; . . .

ἣ οὐκ Ἄργεος ἦεν Ἀχαικοῦ ; ἀλλά πη ἄλλη

πλάζετ' ἐπ' ἀνθρώπους ;

In the sequel when the same Telemachus, as the guest of Menelaus, admires the splendour of the Spartan palace, its proprietor offers the following simple but eloquent tribute to the memory of his departed friends and brother: Od. IV. 90.

ἔως ἐγὼ περὶ κεῖνα πολὺν βίον συναγείρων ἡλώμην, τείως μοι ἀδελφεὸν ἄλλος ἔπεφνεν . . .

ὣς οὔτι χαίρων τοῖσδε κτεάτεσσιν ἀνάσσω . . .

ναλαιν, οἱ δ' ἄνδρες σόοι ἔμμεναι, οἱ τότ' ὄλοντο

Τροίη ἐν εὐρείῃ.

With this may be compared the description of the grief which overwhelms him (538.) when his brother's murder is predicted to him by Proteus. The announcement of his Ithacan guest's name elicits another characteristic burst of generous feeling towards an old and dear companion in arms: 169.

ὦ πόποι ! ἦ μάλα δὴ φίλου ἀνέρος υἱὸς ἐμὸν δῶ

ἵκεθ', ὅς εἵνεκ' ἐμεῖο πολέας ἐμόγησεν ἀέθλους.

καί μιν ἔφην ἐλθόντα φιλησέμεν ἔξοχον ἄλλων . . .

καί κέ οἱ Ἄργεϊ νάσσα πόλιν καὶ δάματ' ἔτευξα . . .

The contrast between the unity and simplicity of the poet's delineation of this beautiful character, and the odious and incongruous features by which it is disfigured in the works of the other representatives of the "common epic genius," will be noticed elsewhere.¹

Character
of Nestor.

9. The character of the Pylian hero, while from its broader features a more popular specimen perhaps of Homer's art than those hitherto considered, is no less remarkable for delicacy of traits and colouring.

(Nestor is the self-satisfied old veteran, dwelling with garrulous complacency on the glories of the past and the degeneracy of the present race of heroes; assuming, as a matter of course, the superiority of his own wisdom and experience to that of the existing generation; omitting no opportunity of fighting his battles over again; and swelling his harangues on these favourite topics with diffuse historical illustrations derived chiefly from his personal achievements. Yet these failings are more than compensated by his good qualities. His pretensions to youthful prowess are well supported by the valour which adorns his old age. He is as fearless, if not as active in the field, as the youngest of his comrades. While inculcating on all occasions his prior claims to deference in council, he arrogates no title to dictate or domineer, and readily appreciates good advice from whatever quarter it may proceed. Indefatigable in his labours for the public good, he is throughout cheerful and good humoured, as free from undue elation as from despondency. Hence, during the whole series of national reverses, the unvarying placidity of the hearty old veteran acts as a sort of counterpoise to the abject humiliation of the commander in chief, and sheds a friendly ray of comfort over the general gloom of the camp.

That his real wisdom did not derogate from his high pretensions is vouched for by the poet's own testimony to the substantial value of many of his suggestions, as expressed in the following recurring formula :

Νέστωρ οὗ καὶ πρόσθεν ἀρίστη φαίνεται βουλή. . . .

Nestor is in fact, throughout, the presiding genius of the Greek councils. Hence the vision which exhorts Agamemnon to resume martial operations assumes the form of Nestor. The council held for considering the import of that vision is convened at his quarters. In the ensuing assembly he prescribes a mode of marshalling the troops, adopted by Agamemnon. In the duel between Ajax and Hector he is intrusted with the arrangement of the ceremony on the Greek side. In the sequel he proposes the fortification of the camp, and gives the plan for its execution. He urgently inculcates on the troops certain points of military discipline, as valuable in theory as they were little observed in practice.¹ He is the first who ventures to press on Agamemnon the necessity of appeasing Achilles, and selects the commissioners for the management of that delicate affair. On the same anxious night he enjoins the posting of the guard around the camp. The midnight expedition of Diomed and Ulysses also originates in Nestor's suggestion, as does the permission obtained by Patroclus from Achilles to lead forth the Myrmidon troops, on which hinges the whole subsequent fortune of the war.

10. The more characteristic peculiarities of the His oratory.
 Pylian chief supply some of the liveliest specimens of the sly satirical humour with which the poet seasons even the graver portions of his narrative. The orations of the old hero frequently commence with that common figure of senile rhetoric, an apostrophe to what might be said or thought by others whose opinions were likely to weigh with his audience; as in the following parallel passages:

- I. 254. ὦ πόποι! ἦ μέγα πένθος Ἀχαιῖδα γαῖαν ἰκάνει·
 ἦ κεν γηθήσαι Πριάμος Πριάμοιό τε παῖδες, ἄλλοι τε Τρῶες μέγα κεν κεχαροῖατο θυμῷ, εἰ σφῶϊν τάδε πάντα πυθοῖατο μαρναμένοισιν.
- VII. 124. ὦ πόποι! ἦ μέγα πένθος Ἀχαιῖδα γαῖαν ἰκάνει·
 ἦ κε μέγ' οἰμώξειε γέρων ἱππηλάτα Πηλεΐς, . .
 τοὺς νῦν εἰ πτώσσοντας ὕφ' Ἑκτορι πάντας αἰκούσαι.
- XV. 661. ὦ φίλοι, ἀνέρες ἔστε, καὶ αἰδῶ θέσθ' ἐνὶ θυμῷ ἄλλων ἀνθρώπων. . . .

Next follows, if the case be one of distress or difficulty, a lamentation over his own decay of vigour, but for which, it is implied, a very different turn might be given to affairs. The justice of these regrets is then enforced by a reference to some heroic adventure, the fortunes of which had hinged on his youthful prowess. This passage usually commences with the following expressive poetical formula:

εἴθ' ὥς ἡβώοιμι, βίη δέ μοι ἔμπεδος εἴη.

These excursions, it is true, may occasionally provoke by their diffuseness: but such is the general spirit of their narrative, and of the sketches they contain of the men and manners of former times, that the reader of the present day is as little disposed as the poet's own audience to grudge the lively old warrior the full indulgence of his egotistic eloquence.

His first speech¹, in which he attempts to smooth matters between the two angry chiefs, embodies in more concise limits than usual the prominent points of his oratory. He begins by bidding them reflect on what their enemies the Trojans, or their own friends at home, will think; reminds them how much older he is than either of them, and of the deference he deserves at their hands; that his youth had been associated with far better men than they, or than the world had since beheld; by whom he had been specially invited to take part in their glorious exploits, and who had always revered his counsels. Yet after asserting these lofty pretensions, he delivers his opinions with a gentle persuasiveness which, combined with their own propriety, usually secures a ready acquiescence.

Among the more satirical touches of the portrait, may be adduced the busy importance with which he tutors the deputation to Achilles at the moment of their departure, as to the proper mode of conducting their negotiation, "especially Ulysses," whose own unassisted discretion in any such case might be presumed at least equal to that of his Pylian Mentor: IX. 180.

δενδύλλων ἐς ἕκαστον, Ὀδυσσῆϊ δὲ μάλιστα, πειρᾶν ὥς πεπίθοιεν ἀμύμονα Πηλείωνα.

The expressive word at the commencement here vividly reflects the bustling activity with which the self-satisfied old sage puts forth to the last moment his prolific stores of advice, nodding and whispering in turn to the members of the commission the suggestions best suited to their respective capacities.

Equally characteristic is the melancholy grandiloquence with which, after some long detail of his youthful exploits, he sums up his reminiscences of the admiration and renown they had procured him :

XI. 759.

ἐνθ' ἄνδρα κτείνας πύματον λίπον·
πάντες δ' εὐχετόωντο θεῶν Διὶ, Νέστορί τ' ἀνδρῶν.
ὥς ἔον, εἴ ποτ' ἔον γε, μετ' ἀνδράσιν !

and again : XXIII. 632. sq.

ἐνθ' οὐτις μοι ὁμοῖος ἀνὴρ γένητ', ὥς ποτ' ἔον ! νῦν αὖτε νεώτεροι ἀντιοίωντων¹ ἔργων τοιούτων· ἐμὲ δὲ χρὴ γήραϊ λυγρῷ πεῖθεσθαι, τότε δ' αὖτε μετέπρεπον ἡρώεσσι !

He consoles himself with the reflexion that he remains at least superior in council to all his contemporaries : IX. 104.

οὐ γάρ τις νόον ἄλλος ἀμείνονα τοῦδε νοίσει, οἷον ἐγὼ νοέω, ἡμὲν πάλαι ἦδ' ἔτι καὶ νῦν.²

A few additional remarks suggested by the reproduction of the Pylian hero's character in the Odyssey will be reserved for the analysis of that poem.

The character of Phœnix, though but a slight sketch, offers, in its correspondence and its contrast, an interesting parallel to that of Nestor. Phœnix is also an aged Mentor, with similar credit in his own sphere for wisdom and persuasive oratory. No less diffuse in his discourse, he is equally fond of seasoning it with the experience of his early days. But the same features are presented under different colours. In Phœnix a grave, even sad composure is substituted for the hearty self-sufficiency of the Pylian chief. His appeals are directed rather to the heart than the judgement. The scope of his episodical illustrations is warning rather than example;

they are selected not from the merits, but the errors of his past conduct, and their pernicious consequences.
The whole of his expostulatory address to Achilles in the deputation scene, is marked by a mild melancholy suavity of tone and sentiment, finely contrasted with the complacency and good-humoured censoriousness of Nestor's harangues on similar occasions.

AJAX.

11. Ajax is the model of a sturdy man of war, and little or nothing more. With colossal stature and Herculean strength he combines experience of the mechanical part of a soldier's duty, and a large share of that species of courage which consists in a natural insensibility to danger and confidence in his own prowess. His services consist, accordingly, less in brilliant achievement than in stemming the adverse tide of war by his physical force. Hence, although described in general terms¹ as both in personal appearance and valour the champion next in rank to Achilles, and as the warrior on whose exertions the soldiery at large chiefly relied in disastrous emergencies, he is greatly surpassed in the more excellent points of military virtue by other heroes, especially by Diomed. In the games, when successively pitted against that hero, Ulysses, and Polypætes, in the broadsword, wrestling, and the disk, the efforts of his ponderous strength are in each case baffled by the activity and tact of his antagonists. He is also as susceptible as the meanest soldier, of that superstitious panic² which any supposed evil omen is apt

to spread through the ranks. Achilles and Diomed are indeed the only heroes entirely exempt from this weakness. It is hence with some consistency that to Ajax is assigned no separate "Aristea," or "Prowess." While frequently described and put forward as the "rampart" or "bulwark"¹ of the host, his services, as indicated by these figures, are of the passive rather than active kind. Here again it is not probably accidental, that while, in order to bring about the Trojan triumph with least possible detriment to the national honour, all the other first rate warriors, Agamemnon, Diomed, and Ulysses, are disabled in the early part of the battle in which Patroclus fell, Ajax is preserved unhurt to stem the advance of the enemy.

Even this, on first view, rude and ordinary character, is tempered with fine shades of moral peculiarity. The innate generosity of the heroic genius, in place of the ardent enthusiasm of Achilles, the energy of Diomed, or the sensitive quickness of Menelaus, is combined in Ajax with a morbid sensibility to personal honour. This feature is observable even in the Iliad, where comparatively little opportunity exists for its display; but is brought out more prominently in the Odyssey, and constitutes the groundwork of his character as reproduced in the tragic drama. Intellectually considered Ajax is the dullest of the heroes. Hence, while his rank and services secure him a seat in the select council of Agamemnon, he is with much propriety excluded from all part in its debates. He owes his appointment as one of the mission to Achilles, less, evidently, to any personal fitness for so delicate an office, than to his character as representative of the sentiments and claims of the mass, or common soldiery of the host.

12. One of the happiest similes in the Iliad is that His oratory. where Ajax, slowly and sullenly retreating as he attempts alone to stem the advance of the Trojans, is compared to an ass driven from a corn-field by the cudgels of a troop of urchins, and leisurely finishing his meal as he retires amid the blows of his puny assailants.¹ His own character and that of his oratory are jointly shadowed forth in the epithets βουγαίος and ἀμαρτοεπής ², applied to him by Hector, and to him alone throughout the poem. The first jointly expresses his gigantic strength, and the boasting self-confidence in that attribute to which he frequently gives utterance: for Ajax, consistently with the mixture of coarseness and sincerity in his character, was, like various other warriors of better judgment, somewhat of a braggart. Here again may be remarked how nicely the poet has adapted to the genius of his heroes, the language through which each indulges in this propensity. Nothing can be more different than the garrulous complacency of Nestor's self-commendatory harangues, the blustering vain-glory of Hector, and the turgid "who's afraid" simplicity of the few big words in which Ajax expresses his sense of his own prowess. His address to Hector before their single combat may be taken as an example: VII. 196.³

ἐπεὶ οὔτινα δεῖδιμεν ἔμψης·
οὐ γάρ τις με βίη γε ἐκὼν ἀέκοντα δίηται, οὐδὲ μὲν ἰδρσίῃ· ἐπεὶ οὐδ' ἐμὲ νῆϊδά γ' οὕτως ἔλπομαι ἐν Σαλαμῖνι γενέσθαι τε τραφέμεν τε!

His style of oratory also justifies the other epithet of ἀμαρτοσπής, or "blunderer," ironically bestowed on him by the Trojan chief. His speeches, while brief and blunt, are often deficient both in argument and consistency. In his address to Achilles¹, for example, as a member of Agamemnon's deputation, he commences, with an apparent intention of abruptly closing the debate, by denouncing the heartless obduracy of their host and the fruitlessness of further remonstrance: yet, after laying some stress on the unreasonableness of the hero, who "while deprived of but one mistress refuses a compensation of seven," he winds up in the very tone of supplication which he had just before condemned in his companions. The shorter specimens of his oratory are chiefly exhortations to his men, or prayers for divine aid in critical moments of the combat. The longest concludes with his celebrated supplication to Jupiter to remove the preternatural darkness which shrouded the battle, "that, if doomed to destruction, they might at least have the satisfaction of perishing by daylight."² Longinus has overrated this figure, in classing it with the sublimer passages of Homer. It partakes of the character of what, in modern criticism, is called a conceit; though a noble one, no doubt, and marked by that simple species of dignity to be expected in the poetical conceptions of Ajax.

sey.

In order to appreciate the consistent maintenance of this hero's character as reproduced in the Odyssey, we must bear in mind the altered circumstances under which he appears. His presence in the infernal region was the result of his own act of wounded pride, consequent on his defeat by Ulysses in the competition for the arms of Achilles. Suddenly the repose he had sought in this dismal retreat is disturbed by the appearance of his successful opponent in the same human form as at their last fatal parting. In the gloomy sullenness with which he keeps aloof, while the other spirits flock round the adventurous stranger ; in the stern silence with which, rejecting his generous rival's conciliatory advances, he stalks away into the darkest recesses of Erebus ; the poet has shadowed forth, with singular truth, the mode in which pride, sorrow, and resentment would display themselves in such a character upon such an occasion.¹

TROJAN CHARACTERS.

13. Before entering on the separate characters of the Trojan heroes, attention must be directed to the broader features of national distinction in the genius of the rival races. In the delineation of these the poet's deep knowledge of mankind is seen extending, from the narrow circle of personal peculiarity, to those more comprehensive varieties of human nature which originate in an equally comprehensive range of physical or historical causes.

Distinctive characteristics of the Greek and Trojan national characters.

Allusion has already been made to certain defects in the character of the Trojans incidentally stigmatised in the Iliad, either by Homer himself or his heroes ; to their want of moral principle, to the levity and treachery of their international dealings, to the palpable injustice of their cause, to their obstinacy in upholding it, and to the profligacy of their domestic manners. How far these defects, as compared with the rightful motives, fair dealing, and primitive habits of their adversaries, may be laid to account of Homer's

national partialities, how far they may rest on a historical basis, are questions on which it were little profitable to enlarge. The contrast itself may, at least, be considered as shadowing forth certain fundamental features of distinction, which have always been more or less observable between the European and Asiatic races. The state of society in Troy resembles, it is true, in the main, that of Greece at the same period. In each, the patriarchal simplicity on which the social edifice was based is modified, without being altogether superseded, by the refinements of an earlier Eastern civilisation. Among the Trojans, however, the levity and corruption of Asiatic life had encroached on the primitive manners to a greater extent than in Greece; and this excess it is which, in the poet's description, forms the chief moral difference between Greek and Trojan. 91

The character of the latter nation is graphically portrayed in that of its royal family, as sketched out in the episodic notices occurring in the Iliad, and which prove those distinctive peculiarities to be of no recent date. The Dardanian line of princes is the oldest recorded in Homeric tradition. The order of succession is given in a speech addressed to Achilles by Æneas¹, himself a prince of the blood. As his account is little more than a bare pedigree, it may be presumed that any particulars he furnishes of the adventures of his kinsmen were such as formed their chief title to celebrity. These details accordingly, with those incidentally supplied in other parts of the poem, relate, not to the warlike achievements or bold enterprise of the race, but to their wealth, luxury, gallantry, and the magnificence of their courtly state, or to the calamities consequent on their treachery and impiety. Their moral defects are exhibited, at the same time, in appropriate conjunction with the personal graces which contribute both to the excitement and gratification of sensual appetite. Dardanus, the founder of the dynasty, was son of Jupiter. Erichthonius, son of Dardanus, was the richest monarch of his time, possessing the finest breed of horses, the noblest species of royal wealth in those days. The surpassing beauty of his grandchild Ganymede attracted the notice of Jupiter, who transported the youth to Olympus, to act as his page and cupbearer. Tros the Father of Ganymede, and third sovereign of the line, was, in compensation for the loss of his son, enriched by Jupiter with a still nobler breed of horses than that possessed by Erichthonius.¹ Laomedon nephew of Ganymede, and fifth occupant of the Dardanian throne, surrounded Troy with walls so magnificent as to have been fabled the joint work of Neptune and Apollo. In the same fable, his subsequent impiety towards these deities involved him in a series of calamities, which terminated in the destruction of his city, taken and sacked by Hercules.² His elder son Tithonus, distinguished like Ganymede for his beauty, engaged the affections of Aurora, who carried him off and espoused him. Anchises, cousin of Tithonus, was indebted to the same personal charms for the honour of sharing the bed of Venus. Priam, the younger son and successor of Laomedon, if less favoured than some of his kinsmen by the amorous attentions of the goddesses, makes ample amends by the number of mortal concubines who enjoy, in common with the reigning sultana, the honour of his embraces. The paramount authority of his race in the court of love and beauty is further vouched for by the Judgement of Paris, whose subsequent achievement forms an appropriate and fatal conclusion to the catalogue of family crimes and gallantries.

Character
of Priam.
Its defects.

14. Priam's court and domestic establishment, where the produce of his amours, amounting to fifty sons and twelve daughters, reside with their respective consorts in separate domiciles¹, offer an interesting combination of patriarchal simplicity with Oriental licentiousness. The old king's character is itself a fair type both of the good and evil in that of his nation. With much that is generous in conduct and feeling, and a certain tact in the arts of government, he is signally deficient in that honest principle which alone can secure the welfare of a state. His affectionate heart and domestic virtues are fatally counterbalanced by an over-indulgent temper; and his indifference to, or even sympathy with, the ruling vices of his family involves the ruin of his country. Nor does the political morality of his councillors appear in a better light than his own. The Greeks are described as having, before commencing hostilities, used every effort by negotiation to obtain redress. Upon one of these occasions² it was gravely suggested, by a member of the Trojan senate, to murder the ambassadors; and the proposal, though not carried into effect, seems to have been complacently received. How little congenial measures of reparation were to the mass is further implied in the current tradition of later times, where Antenor and Æneas, the only Dardanian chiefs who had the merit of disapproving the pernicious policy of their countrymen, are represented as secret partisans of the Greeks.

The poet has, as usual, availed himself almost exclusively of the dramatic mode of portraying this spirit of national levity. In the remarks which the appearance of Helen elicits from the assembled elders on the city ramparts, those venerable personages take pride, rather than shame, in the circumstance of their handsome prince having seduced and transferred to their own city the fairest princess in Europe. The poetical value of this passage, so justly extolled by illustrious critics, does not here immediately concern us: its ethic spirit alone is now in question. These grave representatives of the national wisdom are seated on a tower, looking towards the plain, where the fate of their country was staked on the issue of a single engagement. Suddenly Helen, the guilty cause of their calamities, is seen approaching. What are the reflexions that might be expected to suggest themselves on such an occasion in such quarters? Ought it not to have occurred to these sage councillors the more forcibly, what an iniquitous thing it was, that so many brave men should bite the dust, and whole nations be involved in destruction, for the mere gratification of a pair of frivolous adulterers? But, instead of this they complacently remark, that "it is no wonder the Greeks and Trojans should wage long and bloody wars for the possession of so divine a woman."¹ Equally characteristic is Priam's own language in the immediate sequel, when, calling Helen affectionately to his side he assures her that "she is no way in fault; that the gods alone are to blame, as the cause of their common affliction."

Another example of the skill with which Homer imposes on his light-headed Dardanian heroes the duty of exposing their own defects, is in the meeting of council¹, where Antenor proposes putting an end to the war by the restoration of Helen and her goods to her rightful husband. He enforces this suggestion by a reference to the fresh crime of treachery and assassination of which the Trojans had been guilty, and to the hopelessness of success in so bad a cause. No one seconds this motion. Paris then, with characteristic effrontery, tells the venerable sage, that "if he is serious in what he says he talks like an idiot;" and declares that he will not part with Helen on any terms, but that, as to the property brought with her from Sparta, they may dispose of it as had been suggested. Priam here interposes, and, without any notice of the advice of Antenor, commends the offer of Paris as fair and conciliatory, and advises a mission to the Greek camp on the subject; which proposal is approved and adopted.

Its virtues.

15. Such, however, are the amiable qualities by which the weaker points of the old king's conduct are relieved, that while we condemn his vices, it is difficult not to admire his general character. It is, in fact, partly in the excess of his more engaging attributes that his defects consist, in that over-sensibility of heart and warmth of the social affections which are so often combined with blind indulgence to their favourite objects. Inexcusable as such indulgence may be, yet the mixture of paternal affection and courtly gallantry which Priam displays towards the fair adulteress, when once received on the footing of a daughter-in-law, is worthy of all admiration. She herself bears grateful testimony to his kindness, under the mortifications to which she was habitually exposed from her other Trojan connexions. The most touching acknowledgement of this nature is contained in a single parenthetical sentence of her lamentation over Hector, the only one of her new husband's near relatives whose behaviour to her resembled that of her father-in-law. During the long years that had elapsed since her arrival in Troy, never, she exclaims, had a single harsh word been addressed to her by Hector : XXIV. 768.

ἀλλ' εἴ τίς με καὶ ἄλλος ἐνὶ μεγάροισιν ἐνίπτοι, δαέρων ἢ γαλόων ἢ εἰνατέρων εὐπέπλων,
ἢ ἐκυρή, ἐκυρὸς δὲ πατὴρ ὥς ἡπίος αἰεΐ, ἀλλὰ σὺ τόν γ' ἐπέεσσι παραιφάμενος κατέρυκες.

Pages of studied panegyric could hardly equal the effect which this half line produces, partly by its very brevity, partly by the force of the contrast it presents. Another trait of the old sovereign's paternal sensibility equally illustrates the poet's power of conveying the liveliest impressions in the fewest words. When the conversation on the walls is interrupted by the intelligence that Paris is about to engage Menelaus, and that Priam's presence is required to arrange the forms of the duel, we are told simply¹, that after receiving the message "the old man shuddered, and ordered his chariot to be prepared." No elaborate description of parental anxiety could express half as much as this short sentence.

X It is, however, in the closing scenes of the Iliad that the brighter side of Priam's character is most prominently brought forward. All sense of his vices or follies is here absorbed by compassion for the calamities in which they have involved him, and admiration for his heroism in braving the dangers of a hostile camp and the wrath of Achilles, to rescue the remains of a beloved son from mutilation and disgrace. But even here the poet, still true to nature, never loses sight of the less favourable traits of the portrait, which, as now reproduced under a change of fortune, impart a new variety to the whole composition. Hitherto Priam had been contemplated in a comparative state of prosperity, and distinguished, even in his displays of weakness, by a decorum and placidity of deportment becoming his royal state. Now, at the moment when his energies are intent on the fulfilment of the noblest duties, his temper, under the accumulated excitement of the crisis, breaks through all the restraints of courtly dignity into ebullitions of senile petulance and irritation, as characteristic of the genius of the man as inconsistent with the greatness of his conduct. The scene in the palace previous to his journey is one of the finest in the Iliad.¹ Priam, his family, and the entire city are plunged in the deepest affliction; their favourite prince and bravest champion slain; his body daily insulted in their sight by his ferocious conqueror. The mode in which the national grief finds vent exhibits a fine combination of Oriental and patriarchal manners. The old king, enveloped in his mantle, is seated in the centre of the palace court in a state of gloomy stupor, indifferent to all that is passing.

His sons are weeping and his daughters wailing around him; the halls and porches thronged with citizens, flocking with sympathetic curiosity to the centre of the common woe. At this moment Iris, invisible to all but Priam himself, breathes her message from Jove in his ear. The first symptom of response to the divine intimation is a tremor pervading his frame. On a sudden, morbid despair gives place to unwonted vigour; he rises and declares his resolution forthwith to visit in person the Myrmidon camp, and ransom the body of his son. He is assailed by the remonstrances of his wife against the madness of his project, but in vain. On turning to give the requisite orders for his journey, he finds everything in confusion¹; his palace is crowded with importunate idlers; his sons are bewildered by this sudden change from listlessness to temerity, and the promptness of their obedience falls short of the eagerness of his commands. His temper then gives way, and he breaks forth into invectives, first against the busybodies who encumber his hall, and whom he drives with his sceptre into the street; next against the sluggish apathy of his sons, tauntingly contrasting it with the devoted zeal of their deceased brother. The petulance of these sallies is tempered by the most touching expressions of grief and patriotism. Every word and act is admirably suited to the character and the occasion.

The sequel of this adventure supplies the more delicate finish to the portrait both of Priam and Achilles. The ardent zeal, senile importunity, and pious resignation of the venerable suppliant, are beautifully contrasted with the generous sympathy and haughty impetuosity of the terrible Myrmidon. The old king returns to the city with his precious freight, greeted by crowds of admiring citizens, and the ensuing rites in honour of the slain champion afford an impressive conclusion to the great drama. Upon the whole perhaps the character of Priam is, next to that of Achilles, the most delicately conceived and finely drawn in the poem. The parallel which it offers to that of Shakspeare's Lear cannot fail to suggest itself to the critical student.

HECTOR.

Character

16. In the character of this hero, as in that of his father, good and evil are so curiously blended, that it is hard to say which element predominates. Homer, partly it would seem in order to maintain a fair show of impartiality, partly to enhance the glory of the Greek warriors by whom the Trojan champion is successively worsted, magnifies his prowess in general terms, as of the most transcendant order. But these eulogies are confined alone or chiefly to words. In actual achievement Hector is greatly surpassed by the leading Greek heroes. He rarely enters the lists on equal terms with an enemy of equal rank, but he is beaten; and his whole series of triumphs is artfully so described as to appear owing less to his own valour than to supernatural interference. The moral courage of Hector, on the other hand, is worthy of all praise. Though easily over-elated by success, he is not, like the Greek commander, apt to be cast down by discomfiture. The vaunting bravadoes with which he pursues the tide of victory in the absence of Achilles are, it is true, singularly unbecoming in a leader who, before the secession of that hero, never ventured to quit the protection of the city walls. This timid policy, however, he himself pointedly describes as having been imposed on him by the Trojan elders¹; nor on the reappearance of his formidable adversary is he disheartened, but endeavours, like a brave soldier rather than a prudent tactician, to maintain his newly acquired superiority. Towards the close of his career, although he flies before Achilles when first brought face to face with him on the field, yet, having once made up his mind to the combat, he acquits himself manfully, and submits to his fate with calmness and dignity.

Among the heroes of the Iliad, Hector is the one whose social virtues are exhibited in the most engaging colours, less perhaps from any actual superiority to various other chiefs, to Ulysses for example or Menelaus, in those qualities, than from the greater opportunities for their display. His chaste affection for one virtuous spouse appears the more admirable as contrasted with the licentious habits of his race. Helen, also, bears lively testimony to that unvarying courtesy and fraternal kindness which supported her under the mortifications to which she was exposed from the rest of her paramour's family², so well deserved on her part, so heartlessly inflicted on theirs. The deep distress which his death spreads over the city is a testimony to his worth, both as a benefactor and a warrior; and the interview with Andromache, where his virtues as a husband, a parent, and a patriot, are so beautifully portrayed, is too familiar to every student of the poet to require comment. These finer ingredients of his character also shine forth in a singularly amiable light in his first personal encounter with Achilles, where his habitual terror for the invincible hero suddenly gives way on seeing his youthful brother Polydorus pierced before his eyes by the Myrmidon lance. The electric effect on his energies is described in one of the poet's most brilliant sketches: XX. 419.

ὡς ἐνόησε κασίγνητον Πολύδωρον, εντερα χερσὶν ἔχοντα, λιαζόμενον προτὶ γαίῃ, κάρ ῥά οἱ ὀφθαλμῶν κέχυτ' ἀχλὺς· οὐδ' ἄρ' ἔτ' ἔτλη δηρὸν ἐκὰς στρωφᾶσθ', ἀλλ' ἀντίος ἦλθ' Ἀχιλλῆος, ὁξὺ δόρυ κραδάων, φλογὶ εἵκελος.

With a clearer insight into the difference between right and wrong than was common among his fellow-councillors, Hector was sufficiently alive to the crime of Paris, and the consequent iniquity of the Trojan cause. Yet the national spirit of indifference extends even to him. In stigmatising, as he frequently does, his brother's guilt, no account is taken of his own, as accomplice or abettor. His share in the prevailing levity is also painfully exemplified in his conduct regarding the duel of Paris and Menelaus. It was his imperative duty, as Trojan commander, and original proposer of the truce, to have enforced, at whatever cost, the fulfilment of its terms, so solemnly ratified by his father in his own presence; but so far is he from showing even a desire to preserve faith, that the base mode of its violation meets with his virtual sanction and approval.

His oratory.

17. But the characteristic defect of Hector, of which Homer chiefly avails himself to individualise his portrait, is his turn for vainglorious boasting. The success which has here attended the poet's efforts cannot be better illustrated than by the fact, that the name Hector is familiar to this day in our own tongue, as a popular synonyme of our vernacular phrases "bluster" and "swagger." In Hector the infirmity assumes a more offensive form than in the Greek heroes who indulge in it, owing to the magnitude of his deeds being, as a general rule, so little in keeping with that of his words. During the brilliant career of Diomed in the fifth book the Trojan chief, it is indirectly implied, was either bewildered or intimidated; for the first notice of his presence on the field is a reproof levelled at his backwardness by his Lycian ally Sarpedon. The justice of the taunt is proved by the mode of its reception: "Hector makes no reply, though cut to the heart."¹ It rouses him, however, to exertion, but his valour is still directed only against the secondary Greek warriors; nor does he venture to face Diomed until reinforced by Mars in person. After the discomfiture of the god by Diomed, no more is heard of Hector, until, quitting the field, he proceeds to the city to propitiate divine aid against the formidable Greek.² On his return, guaranteed on divine authority³ against all personal risk, he challenges the best champion of the enemy to single combat, in an address full of vainglorious pomp; but, on Ajax entering the lists, Hector is described as trembling, and ready to evade the contest could he have done so with a good grace.⁴ In a subsequent battle, when Diomed is actually forced off the field by the thunderbolts of Jupiter, after struggling, with a heroism altogether unknown to the Trojan chief, against his irresistible adversary, the assertion by Hector of the whole credit of a victory in which he had no share, and his exulting taunts against the Greek hero, form a climax of bullying rhodomontade: VIII. 164., cf. 532.

ἔρρε κακὴ γλήνη! ἐπεὶ οὐκ, εἴξαντος ἐμεῖο,
πύργων ἡμετέρων ἐπιβήσαιοι. . . .

The same tone is maintained in the ensuing address to his troops; and here may be observed another characteristic of his vaunting rhetoric, that his allusions to the past, present, or anticipated successes of the Trojans are habitually, if not invariably, couched in the first person. By his single arm the whole Greek army was to be cut to pieces, their fleet to be destroyed: VIII. 178.

ὡς πυρὶ νῆας ἐνιπρήσω, κτείνω δὲ καὶ αὐτούς.¹ . .

In the sequel his scorn for "the girlish caitiff" Diomed, is somewhat damped by his defeat in single combat by that hero, from whom he escapes his death-blow by a timely flight.² The blunt simplicity of the Greek hero's style of asserting his real superiority is here finely contrasted with Hector's inflated tone of exultation, often called forth by victories in which he had no share. His contempt for Achilles while absent, is equal to that for Diomed, and is amusingly displayed in his present by anticipation of the Myrmidon chief's horses to Dolon, in reward of his proffered services as spy.³

Another favourite form in which his vainglorious spirit displays itself, is his prospective enjoyment of the eulogies to be passed by posterity on his exploits.¹ This weakest point in his character is also illustrated by one of the happiest similes in the Iliad. When charging with impetuous valour, and threatening, in his usual tone of menace and bluster so long as he meets with no resistance, to annihilate Greeks, ships, and ramparts, but suddenly halting and retreating before a body of resolute opponents, he is compared to a fragment of rock rolling furiously down a precipitous declivity, but brought to an immediate standstill on reaching the level plain.²

It is, however, in the last scene of the life of Patroclus, that this unfavourable side of Hector's character is most broadly exhibited. On the panic produced by the sudden appearance of the friend of Achilles on the field, Hector is the first to fly, strenuously exhorting his troops to follow him.³ No sooner however had the death-blow of Patroclus been inflicted by another hand, than Hector steps in, and, putting the finishing stroke to his sufferings, forthwith arrogates to himself the whole credit of the conquest.⁴ The dying words of Patroclus are a spirited reproof of the meanness and ferocity of this conduct. In the ensuing struggle for the body, the risk of a meeting with Ajax upon equal terms is avoided by a speedy retreat into the ranks. This pusillanimity calls forth two successive reproofs from the Lycian prince Glaucus⁵, similar to the one formerly administered by that hero's brother Sar-pedon. The same afternoon Hector flies terror-struck before the mere voice of Achilles, standing naked in the distance. Yet, in the evening council of war, he affects to disdain the notion of any superiority in the mighty Hellene, on whom he even pledges himself¹, scorning the wise caution of Polydamas, to inflict summary chastisement on the following day. It need scarcely be added, that this bravado was as completely falsified by the issue of the ensuing combat as it was fatally expiated.

ÆNEAS,

Character
of Æneas.

18. The commander next in rank to Hector is one of that respectable and blameless class of heroes, who, without salient features either of singularity or defect, have been often promoted by popular epic poets to the dignity of protagonist. In this capacity, as the experience of most readers can testify, they seldom fail to acquit themselves with much propriety perhaps, but with a proportional degree of dulness.² In the Iliad however the commonplace attributes of Æneas,

² Among the great poets of antient or modern times, there is none more deficient in that highest attribute of his art, the portraiture of human character, than the elegant and popular bard of Rome. It is therefore both a curious and a fortunate coincidence, that precisely the one among Homer's heroes whom the nature of Virgil's subject led him to select as the protagonist of his own poem, should be the one whose equality of disposition came more immediately within the sphere of its author's talent. Hector or Diomed would in his hands infallibly have forfeited their genuine Homeric spirit. An elaborate effort to maintain their distinctive features would have resulted but in servile imitation; an attempt at novelty would have invested them with the ranting ferocity of Turnus, or the solemn dignity of Æneas himself. Even the slight variations in the character of the Dardanian chief are not successful. While they fail to enliven its tameness, they divest it of that moral worth which in the Iliad forms its most agreeable attribute.

unshackled as he is with any such higher responsibility, are not without their value. They add at least a pleasing variety to the other livelier traits of human nature, and a seasonable relief to the levity which forms the general characteristic of the hero's countrymen. The valour of Æneas, if less impetuous, is more steady than that of Hector. His undertakings are always equal to his professions, and often superior to his means of performance. He engages manfully both Diomed and Achilles, and on each occasion acquits himself with credit.¹

It was not to be expected that the portrait of such a character would be marked by any broad dramatic touches; yet Homer has managed to shed a warmer ray of interest over it, by allusions to certain peculiarities in the political destiny of the hero, of some importance in their connexion with the mythic cycle of which the Iliad forms the nucleus. During the early part of the assault on the Greek lines Æneas is described as standing aloof, from resentment at some indignity lately put on him by Priam, and which is implied to have been but one of a series of similar slights proceeding from the same quarter.² Neither the time, place, nor manner of the offence are mentioned, as being probably matters familiar to the poet's public, and embodied, like other legends to which he incidentally alludes, by other popular organs of mythical lore. Some light, however, is thrown on the mystery by the circumstance that Æneas, in spite of his royal blood and personal merit, is never represented as taking part in the deliberations of the Trojan council. One of the most important meetings of that body, in which the proposal of Antenor to accommodate matters by restoring Helen was discussed and rejected, was held immediately before the action where Æneas is described as offended at Priam.¹ All this must be taken in connexion with the cyclic legend, that Antenor and Æneas alone among the Trojans had from the first advocated conciliatory measures. Such conduct could hardly fail to be personally offensive to Priam, as the abettor of his son's iniquities. Hence it may be supposed that the insult resented by Æneas was connected with the late suggestion of Antenor; and the intimacy between the two heroes is confirmed by the circumstance, that the sons of Antenor are described as lieutenants of the troops of Æneas.² In the sequel, the patriotism of the Dardanian chief gets the better of his wrath³, and the next allusion to his personal history is on occasion of his encounter with Achilles. His safety is here described as an object of interest even to the deities most hostile to Troy, and Neptune, in delivering him when defeated, proclaims the decree of destiny, that on the destruction of Ilium and extinction of the race of Priam, "Æneas and his descendants shall continue to reign over the Trojans."⁴ From this text it has been not unreasonably inferred that in Homer's time there existed a state, probably in the Troad or its neighbourhood, which traced its origin to a remnant of the Trojan people, and the reigning family of which claimed a descent from Æneas.

Character
of Hecuba.
Funeral
dirge of Hector.

19. The spirited individuality imparted to the other leading Trojan characters, Hecuba, Andromache, Paris and Helen, is the more remarkable in proportion to the limited nature of the parts which they respectively perform. The portrait of each appears to be worked up with the same distinct traces and lively colours as those of Achilles or Hector; yet, on examining the machinery by which so much effect is produced, we find it amounts to but a few incidental speeches or turns of dramatic action.

Hecuba's most prominent appearance on the scene is during the climax of national and domestic calamity consequent on the death of her son. Her character, as there exhibited under the influence of sore affliction and excited passions, is a mixture of the fond mother, the devoted wife, and the high-tempered vindictive virago. While feelingly alive to the cruelty of the Hellenic invaders, she entirely overlooks the provocation they had received, or the folly and iniquity of its authors. In her reply¹ to Priam's announcement of his purpose to visit the quarters of Achilles, her affectionate solicitude for her husband's welfare displays itself, not in the calm persuasive remonstrance suited to such an occasion, but in an impetuous burst of reproof on the madness of his enterprise. Her invectives against Achilles in the sequel of the same address, bespeak the ferocity of the bereaved tigress, rather than the grief of the human mother. In her imputation to him of those very vices of treachery and falsehood which especially attached to her own family, but with which he of all men was least chargeable; and in her broad misstatement of the merits of the cause in which Hector fell, and of his conduct as its champion, the loose morality of her race appears in graphic conjunction with her own ardent temper and revengeful spirit: XXIV. 205.

αἰμηστῆς καὶ ἄπιστος ἀνὴρ ὅδε, οὐ σ' ἐλεήσει,
 οὐδὲ τί σ' αἰδέσεται· . . .
 τοῦ ἐγὼ μέσον ἦπαρ ἔχοιμι ἐσθήμεναι προσφῦσα· τότε ἄντιτα ἔργα γένοιτο παῖδός ἐμοῦ! ἐπεὶ οὐ ἐκακίζόμενόν γε κατέκτα, . . .
 . . . οὔτε φόβου μεμνημένον οὔτ' ἀλεωρῆς.

Another natural, though far from pleasing, trait of Hecuba, is her harsh treatment of Helen. That heroine herself keenly contrasts the unkindness of her mother-in-law with the unvarying gentleness and courtesy of the generous Priam.

The funeral lamentation¹ uttered alternately by Hecuba, Andromache, and Helen, over the corpse of Hector, is another example, to be classed with the debate in the tent of Achilles, of Homer's talent of adapting to different speakers their proper vein of oratory. The tone of Hecuba is here comparatively subdued, as befitted the occasion. Yet, in the midst of her fond ebullition of maternal grief, her vindictive spirit against Achilles still breaks forth, in her expressions of sarcastic triumph over the previous death of his friend by the hand of Hector.

In Andromache, all spirit of anger, so little congenial at any time to her gentle nature, is absorbed in excess of woe. She dwells on her own widowed state, on her infant bereaved of such a father, her country of such a protector. Her mind, wandering with mournful pride over his former glories, anticipates with prophetic horror the approaching fall of the city, and the cruel fate reserved by the Greeks for those nearest and dearest to the author of so much disaster to themselves. Any general remarks on the character of this most interesting heroine will be reserved for the Odyssey, where the parallel between her and Penelope will aid in illustrating the common genius of the two poems.

Helen's affectionate testimony to the social virtues of her slain brother-in-law, though replete with tender feeling, and expressed with all the suavity and grace which became her, is alloyed by something of the querulous captious spirit which also appears in her whole demeanour throughout the poem. She mourns his death, less as a national calamity, than for the loss it entailed on herself of a friend and supporter under the humiliations to which she was exposed from her other relatives, to whose conduct she cannot withhold a taunting allusion.

20. The best answer perhaps, to the charge of incapacity in a "a poet of so rude an age" to conceive so elaborate a composition as the Iliad, is to be found in the characters of Paris and Helen, the hero and heroine on whose destinies the action of the poem fundamentally hinges. Their joint portrait also illustrates a former remark, that the intermediate stage of manners, equally removed from barbarism and refinement, which supplied such materials for the epic art, is precisely that best adapted to secure its perfection. Paris and Helen are the beau and the belle, the man of fashion and the woman of pleasure, of the heroic age. Such characters are essentially unpoetical in more civilised periods. No two can here be more in harmony with the genius of the poem or with each other. Both are unprincipled votaries of sensual enjoyment; both self-willed and petulant, but not devoid of amiable and generous feeling. Both are distinguished for personal graces and accomplishments, and the consequent importance they attach to elegance of attire, and other means of turning those advantages to account. In both, this combination of attributes has been shadowed forth with a graphic precision, the more remarkable considering the limited appearance of each on the scene.

The general conduct of Paris exhibits that mixture of conflicting qualities, of bravery and effeminacy, petulance and good-humour, self-conceit and submissive respect for the superior worth of others, so common, as the experience of every man of the world can testify, in persons of similar tastes and habits. It is obviously not the effect of accident, that in the opening scene of the first battle¹, this gallant adventurer, the primary cause of the whole mischief, appears as the prominent figure, strutting with all the airs of a national champion in front of the Trojan lines. No sooner however does he observe Menelaus advancing to engage him, than conscience-smitten and crest-fallen he retreats into the ranks: but the moment after, stung by the reproof of Hector, he proposes and manfully sustains a single combat with his rival. The ensuing altercation in the chamber of Helen, and the mode in which by mutual consent it is brought to a close, are equally characteristic. After lounging the greater part of the day in her apartments, he is found by Hector² engaged in burnishing his armour; and when again roused to activity by his brother's reproof, he issues to the battle with an ostentatious gaiety illustrated by one of the finest similes in the Iliad, that of the horse emancipated from the stall and prancing across the plain to the river.³ The more rational side of his character is exhibited chiefly in his interviews with Hector, whose martial superiority commands his profound respect. He submits in silence to the most cutting reproofs of his noble brother, and cheerfully obeys all his suggestions. It is true, on the other hand, that Hector's remonstrances are directed solely at his want of energy in the field. They never touch on his amorous indulgence, or the duty of reparation for his crime. The proposal of Antenor to the latter effect is received in a very different spirit, with the petulant effrontery of the spoiled child and pampered man of pleasure.

Helen is the female counterpart of Paris. Daughter of an illustrious royal house, the most beautiful princess of her age, she is wedded in extreme youth to a husband who, however worthy of her choice, seems not to have engaged her affections. She becomes, consequently, an easy victim of the fascinating adventurer destined by the goddess of love as her future partner. Helen, as frequently happens with frail women, a natural result perhaps of the same susceptibility in which their failings originate, is distinguished by tenderness of heart and kindly disposition. Traces of better principle seem also to lurk under the general levity of her habits. Though a faithful consort to Paris, who on his part is no way deficient in the duties of husband or lover, she still entertains a fond remembrance of her days of youthful innocence. She looks back at times with remorse and regret, almost with longing desire, to her native land, her deserted child, and the home of her fathers; and is as ready to acknowledge and condemn her own faults, as to appreciate the opposite virtues of others.¹ The finer touches with which her portrait is worked up are all of the more delicate dramatic description. In the emotion she displays at the invitation of Æneas to go forth to the ramparts and witness the preparation for the duel between her past and present husband; in her dignified advance to the admiring old senators; in her grief and self-reproach at the distant view of her countrymen and former friends; in her petulant argument with her patron goddess after the defeat of Paris; in the taunts thrown out against his cowardice, coupled with returning fondness for his person; in her frank acknowledgment to Hector of the common failings of herself and lover; and in her affectionate lamentation for the fate of her noble brother-in-law, mingled with selfish tears for her own distresses, are exhibited to the life all the finer features of that mixed female character, which, while we pity and condemn, we are constrained to love and admire.

If the facts in the foregoing analysis be correctly stated, and the citations admit of being verified, it seems difficult to understand how any impartial reader, who has carefully weighed those facts and citations, can believe it possible that a series of such singularly delicate portraits, individualised by so subtle a unity of mechanism, not only in their broader features of peculiarity, but in the nicest turns of sentiment and phraseology, can be the produce of the medley of artists to which the Wolfian school assigns them. It were about as probable that some ten or twenty sculptors of the age of Pericles, undertaking, without previous concert, each a different part or limb of a statue of Jupiter, should have produced the Olympian Jove of Phidias, as that a number of ballad-singers of the ante-Olympic era should have combined, by a similar process of patch-work, in producing the Achilles, or Agamemnon, the Priam, the Hector, or the Helen of Homer.

After all the other heroes of the Trojan war had either perished or resettled in their homes¹, Ulysses, bereaved of his fleet and companions, victims of their own impiety in slaughtering the oxen of the Sun², is detained in exile by the sea goddess Calypso in her island of Ogygia.³ The origin of his disasters is traced to the vengeance of Neptune, who, indignant at the blinding of his son Polyphemus, had vowed unrelenting persecution, to any extent short of death, against the hero, up to the moment when he should set foot on his native island.⁴ The rest of the gods, friendly to Ulysses, take council concerning him in Olympus, during the absence of Neptune in Æthiopia.⁵ Pallas entreats Jove to send Mercury to Calypso with an order for his release.⁶ She then proceeds to Ithaca, to instigate Telemachus, after protesting in public assembly against the oppression of his mother's suitors, to undertake a voyage to Pylos and Sparta⁷, and inquire of Nestor and Menelaus, the most recently returned among the heroes of the war¹, concerning his father's fate. In the disguise of Mentes, a neighbouring chief, she is hospitably received by the young prince. Phemius, the court bard of Ithaca, attends unwillingly at the banquet² of the suitors. In the course of the various dialogues mention is made of the distressed condition of old Laertes in his country retirement³, and of the vengeance recently inflicted at Mycenæ, in the eighth year after the fall of Troy, by Orestes, on Ægisthus the murderer of his father Agamemnon.⁴

II.

The next morning the Ithacan assembly is held. The debate is opened by Ægyptius, father of Antiphus, one of the mariners of Ulysses devoured by Polyphemus. Antinoüs and Eurymachus, the ringleaders of the suitors, justify their own conduct and blame Penelope, who, after authorising their courtship by a promise to select a husband from among them on completion of her pretended web⁵, had treacherously failed of performance. They make light of the projected voyage of Telemachus, not expecting he will have the spirit to carry it into effect.⁶ After the council, Telemachus offers up a prayer to Pallas, reminding her of her promises and advice of the day before.⁷ She appears to him in the form of Mentor an old friend of his father. With her assistance he takes his measures the same night; collects his crew, borrows a vessel of Noëmon⁸ another friend, and sets sail, communicating his intention to no one in the palace but his father's nurse Euryclea, on whom he enjoins secrecy.⁹

III.

In the morning he arrives with Mentor at Pylos. Nestor describes the fate of the heroes of Troy, all of whom, with the single exception of Ulysses, had either perished or resettled in their native seats.¹⁰ Nestor also mentions the recent death of Ægisthus by the hand of Orestes, eight years after the murder of Agamemnon.¹¹ He advises his guest to visit Sparta, where Menelaus, being lately returned from his own eight years of wandering¹², will be more competent to afford the desired information. Next morning Telemachus sets out in a chariot with Pisistratus son of Nestor, and on the second night is hospitably received at Sparta by Menelaus.

IV.

On the morrow Menelaus relates his travels, and informs his guests of what he had heard of the detention of Ulysses in the island of Calypso, from Proteus the prophetic sea god of Egypt¹, who had also predicted his own return in the eighth year, just after the death of Ægisthus by the hand of Orestes², as since fulfilled. During the absence of Telemachus, the suitors are apprised of his expedition by Noëmen³, who, in want of his vessel, inquires of them the probable period of his return. They are astonished at the prince's boldness, supposing him to be only absent at his farm.⁴ By advice of Antinoüs they determine to waylay and murder him on his voyage home. Antinoüs fits out a vessel for that purpose, and takes his station at the island of Asteris.⁵ Penelope, informed by Medon⁶ the herald of the suitors' plot, extracts the particulars of her son's expedition from Euryclea⁷, and sends for the chief gardener Dolius from the farm, in order that he may convey the intelligence to the old king Laertes.⁸

V.

In the council of Olympus Pallas again complains of the fate of her favourite Ulysses, and Jupiter assures her that both the hero and his son will safely return and baffle the designs of the suitors. He then dispatches Hermes⁹ to procure the release of Ulysses, and his passage from Ogygia¹⁰ to Scheria; whence the Phæacians will transport him, laden with rich presents¹¹, to Ithaca. On the fifth day afterwards the hero sets sail on a raft. After an eighteen days' voyage¹² he arrives within sight of Scheria, where Neptune, on his journey from Æthiopia¹³, descries him, raises a storm, and dashes the raft to pieces. Ulysses, under the joint protection of Pallas and the sea goddess Leucothea, after swimming during two days on a plank, reaches the shore of Scheria in safety, but cold and naked, near the mouth of a river¹; and, nestling in the bushes falls asleep.

VI.

Nausicaa, daughter of Alcinoüs king of the Phæacians, warned by Minerva in a dream, descends in the morning with her damsels to the river², to wash the family clothes. Ulysses, roused by their voices, awakes and implores her protection. She supplies him with food and raiment³, and instructs him to follow her into the city at a later hour, and, on arrival at the palace, to appeal to the good offices of her mother Arete⁴, who will procure him a safe convoy home from her father. Pallas continues to befriend the hero, though secretly for fear of her uncle Neptune, whose wrath against him was to remain unrelaxed until his arrival in Ithaca.⁵

VII.

After sunset the hero enters the city, guided by Minerva in the disguise of a Phæacian maiden. Through the intercession of Arete⁶ he is hospitably received by Alcinoüs, and promised a passage home. The queen recognises the clothes⁷ given him by Nausicaa, as part of her family wardrobe. On being questioned on the subject, he relates his eighteen days' voyage from Ogygia⁸ and shipwreck on their coast.

VIII.

On the following day he is honourably entertained by the Phæacians, and presented with valuable gifts, which queen Arete packs in a precious box.⁹ During the banquet Alcinoüs mentions an antient prophecy, that one of his vessels would be destroyed on its return from friendly convoy of some wandering stranger to his home, and that their city would be overwhelmed with an earthquake by their patron and progenitor Neptune, from jealousy¹⁰ of their skill and activity in naval affairs. He then requests Ulysses to relate his history.

IX.

The hero complies; and, commencing with his departure from Troy, describes his attack on the Ciconians, his visit to the Loto-phagi, and his adventures in the cave of Polyphemus. He relates how that giant, furious at the loss of his eye, offers up a successful prayer to his father Neptune¹ for vengeance on his mutilator: "that, if ever destined to revisit his native land, the hero might return a solitary wanderer, after the entire destruction of his fleet and comrades; and that on his arrival in Ithaca he might be welcomed by fresh troubles and calamities."

Ulysses next describes his arrival at the island of Æolia, and hospitable reception by the lord of the winds, who at parting gives him the adverse gales secured in a bag, Zephyrus being left out to guide his course. The good intentions of the god are defeated by the folly of the mariners, who open the bag and the fleet is driven back to the island. They then sail to the port of the Læstrygonians, by whom the whole armada is destroyed, with the exception of the hero's own vessel and crew. He next arrives at the island of the goddess Circe, where, after baffling her magic arts by aid of Hermes, and checking an attempt at mutiny by his lieutenant Eurylochus², he is entertained by the goddess during a year. At its expiry he sails by her instructions to the infernal regions, to consult Tiresias³ regarding his future destinies. In the hurry of departure Elpenor⁴, one of his mariners, heavy with sleep falls down the stair and breaks his neck.

XI.

On arrival in the Shades Ulysses conjures up the ghosts in the mode enjoined by Circe. The first to appear is that of Elpenor⁵, who complains of his neglected obsequies, and is promised satisfaction on the hero's return to the upper world. Tiresias⁶ predicts

A mysterious prophecy is added concerning his subsequent destiny.³ His mother, Anticlea, next appears, and acquaints him with the state of his family at the epoch of her own death from grief for his supposed loss; Penelope is described as a mourning widow, and Laertes as wasting his life in solitude at his farm.⁴ After relating his interview with the shades of other celebrated females, the hero pauses, and Arete congratulates the audience on the genius of the guest she has been the means of introducing to them.⁵ In the sequel he relates his dialogue with the ghost of Agamemnon, who describes his own murder⁶ by Ægisthus and Clytemnestra. While praising the superior virtue of Penelope, he warns Ulysses against over-reliance even on her fidelity, advising him, on his return, first to ascertain, in disguise⁷, the state of his domestic affairs. After interviews with Achilles, Ajax, and other heroes, Ulysses sails back to the island of Circe.

XII.

He performs the promised rites to Elpenor⁸, and commences his voyage homewards, with directions from Circe how to escape the perils of the Sirens, Scylla, and Charybdis. She charges him more especially not to meddle with the oxen of the Sun on the shore of Thrinacia. On approaching the dangerous passes he encourages his crew by the remembrance of their former escape from the jaws of Polyphemus. With the loss of two men, devoured by Scylla, he reaches the Thrinacian coast. His crew, instigated by the mutinous Eurylochus⁹, land, in spite of his remonstrances, and slaughter the sacred cattle.¹⁰ On again setting sail the vessel is destroyed by a tempest. Ulysses alone escaping is carried to Ogygia, the isle of Calypso. Here he ends his

The Phæacian nobles load the hero with presents, in addition to those in the box of Arete.¹ The next evening he embarks in a Phæacian galley, and on the ensuing morning is set ashore in Ithaca fast asleep, together with his valuables.² Neptune complains to Jupiter of the hero's convoy home with so rich a cargo, as an interference, on the part of the Phæacians, with the decree "that he should reach his native land in forlorn condition³;" with Jupiter's sanction, therefore, the god inflicts on them a part of the punishment decreed against their officiousness, by changing their vessel into a rock.⁴ Ulysses awaking, is accosted by Minerva, who informs him of his son's absence in Sparta, and of the ambush of the suitors.⁵ She promises greater efforts in his cause, being now no longer exposed to collision with her uncle, Neptune⁶; and he supplicates her to guard him against the fate of Agamemnon.⁷ She then transforms his outward appearance into that of an aged beggar⁸, gives him a staff⁹, and, bidding him proceed to the hut of his swineherd Eumæus, departs for Lacedæmon¹⁰ to attend to the affairs of Telemachus.

XIV.

Ulysses, on approaching the farm of Eumæus, is attacked by the dogs, and loses his staff.¹¹ He is protected and hospitably entertained by the swineherd, to whom he relates a series of fictitious adventures.

XV.

Pallas, on arriving at Sparta¹², warns Telemachus in a vision to return home, avoiding in his voyage the ambush of the suitors¹³; and on reaching Ithaca to visit the swineherd. The prince accordingly, retracing with Pisistratus his former route, arrives at Pylos. When about to embark for Ithaca he is accosted by the seer Theoclymenus¹, a fugitive from Argos on account of homicide, to whom he affords a passage to Ithaca. The vessel escapes the ambush of Antinoüs by a circuitous course. The same evening Eumæus describes the death of Anticlea, mother of Ulysses, from grief for the supposed loss of her son², with the low condition of Laertes.³ Telemachus, on reaching the nearest shore of Ithaca, lands, and, committing Theoclymenus to the care of Piræus⁴, one of his crew, until his own arrival in the city, sends the vessel on to port⁵, and proceeds direct to the swineherd's dwelling. Theoclymenus, before parting, prophesies⁶ the speedy restoration of the affairs of Ulysses.

XVI.

Telemachus finds Ulysses at breakfast with Eumæus, whom he sends to apprise Penelope of his return. Ulysses, restored by Pallas to his natural form⁷, reveals himself to his son. They concert measures for the destruction of the suitors, by removing the arms from the palace hall⁸, and assaulting the gang unawares. In the meantime the vessel of Telemachus enters the port of Ithaca.⁹ The valuables he had collected in his travels are deposited in the house of Clytius.¹⁰ Soon after, the suitors' galley, disappointed of its object, returns.¹¹ Antinoüs proposes a fresh attempt on the life of Telemachus, but is dissuaded from it by the less depraved Amphinomus.¹² Penelope, apprised by Eumæus of the arrival of Telemachus, reproaches the suitors with their late designs against her son's life, communicated to her by Medon the herald.¹³ Eumæus, in the course of the evening, rejoins Telemachus and Ulysses, now retransformed by Minerva into a mendicant.¹⁴ receives Theoclymenus under his protection from Piræus¹, to whose care he consigns the goods brought from Peloponnesus, in order to save them from the suitors' rapacity.² He repeats to his mother what he had heard from Menelaus on the authority of Proteus, concerning his father's detention by Calypso³, and Theoclymenus renews his prophecy of the hero's speedy reappearance.⁴ Eumæus, and Ulysses in his character of beggar, provided with a new staff⁵ by the swineherd, set out later in the day for the town. On the way the hero is insulted by Melanthius one of his own goatherds, son of Dolius and a favourite of Eurymachus.⁶ Ulysses, on arriving at the palace, is contumeliously treated by Antinoüs. Eumæus, in answer to Penelope's inquiries concerning the mendicant guest, informs her of his own three days' entertainment of him at the farm, and of the tidings he professed to have brought of her husband. The queen appoints an interview with the stranger for that evening, in order to make her inquiries in person.⁷

XVIII.

Ulysses chastises the insolence of the beggar Irus, a habitual frequenter of the suitors' banquet. Antinoüs and Eurymachus continue to take the lead in levity and riot. Amphinomus, with better feelings, has gloomy forebodings of evil, which, however, are not sufficient to induce him to flee from the wrath to come, destined as he was to fall by the hand of Telemachus.⁸ Ulysses is insulted by Melantho, daughter of Dolius, one of the faithless maidens of Penelope, and paramour of Eurymachus.⁹ The revellers soon after retire to repose.

The gift of Eumæus is, he asserts, incompatible with xiii. 437., where Ulysses was already provided with a staff by Minerva. their previous plan, remove the arms from the palace hall.¹ Penelope holds her interview with her disguised husband², who is again exposed to the insolence of Melantho.³ The queen explains her stratagem of the web, by which she had deceived the suitors.⁴ Euryclea, while washing the hero's feet, recognises him by a scar received in his youth from the tusk of a boar, when hunting in Parnassus⁵; but, warned by Ulysses, she conceals her discovery. Penelope resolves to entertain the suitors on the morrow with a contest of archery, in shooting through a row of axe-heads⁶ with the bow of Ulysses, the winner to have a prior claim to her hand.

XX.

Ulysses reposes in the outer court of the palace, where his slumbers are disturbed by the wanton maidens going forth to join their paramours among the suitors.⁷ The next morning being the feast of Apollo, the revels of the suitors are renewed at an early hour.⁸ Melanthius⁹ the rebel goatherd, and Philœtius¹⁰, a loyal oxherd, arrive with cattle for the daily banquet. The murder of Telemachus is again proposed in the council of suitors, and the project again dropped at the instance of Amphinomus.¹¹ Ctesippus throws an ox-heel at the head of the disguised king.¹² Theoclymenus warns them of their approaching fate, but is ridiculed by Eurymachus, and retires to the lodging of Piræus.¹³

XXI.

Penelope, as had been arranged, proposes to the suitors the trial of archery with the bow of Ulysses¹⁴, which not one of them is able to string. The hero reveals himself to Eumæus and Philœtius¹⁵ the oxherd, by means of the same boar-tusk wound observed by Euryclea.¹⁶ He begs for a trial of the bow, but is refused by the suitors. request, retires to her apartments. He then obtains possession of the bow, bends it, and shoots the arrow through the axe-heads.

XXII.

Supported by Telemachus, Eumæus, Philæti¹, and Pallas, Ulysses assaults the suitors. Antinoüs and Eurymachus are slain by Ulysses, Amphinomus by Telemachus², who supplies his party with fresh weapons from the armoury above stairs.³ Melanthius, detected in a similar attempt, is bound and placed in durance. Philæti⁴ kills Ctesippus, telling him ironically that his death-wound is in return for the cow-heel aimed at the head of Ulysses.⁴ In the end the whole suitor crew are destroyed, except Phemius the bard⁵ and Medon the herald⁶, both having been secretly faithful to the interests of the family, amid an apparent adherence to the suitors. Melanthius and the traitorous females are hanged in the court.

XXIII.

Euryclea informs the queen of the return of Ulysses, of the death of the suitors, and of her recognition of the hero by the scar on his leg.⁷ Penelope, at first incredulous, is convinced by other proofs of his identity. Ulysses anticipating a tumult among the relatives of the suitors, resolves to withdraw in the morning to the farm of Laertes, and take further measures for the reestablishment of his authority. On retiring to rest he recapitulates his past adventures to Penelope, with the mysterious prophecy of Tiresias relative to his future destiny.⁸

XXIV.

Hermes conducts the souls of the suitors to Hades. Ulysses, on arrival at the farm of Laertes, finds him working in his garden⁹, and reveals himself. The friends of the suitors, instigated by Eupithes father of Antinoüs, march to avenge the death of their patrons. Ulysses and Laertes, with Dolius and his sons, attack and defeat the rebels; and, through the interposition of Minerva, peace and the royal authority are restored.

2. In pointing out, on a former occasion, the simplicity of design and continuity of action in the Iliad, as important elements of its characteristic dignity and grandeur, the plan of the Odyssey was appealed to in the way of contrast. In proportion as the adventures of the latter poem are more lively and varied, ranging over a longer period of time and wider extent of space, they naturally involve a greater complication of plot and a more heterogeneous body of actors. This variety of materials the poet, in consistently following out the genius of his subject, has embodied with a corresponding variety of arrangement. In spite however of that chequering and interlacing of the narrative, and those frequent transitions from one to another part of the widely extended scene of action, the dramatic interest of the poem is no less united in itself, and no less firmly concentrated around its one main object, the destinies of Ulysses, than the graver and more solid plot of the Iliad around those of Achilles.

It is further evident, that although this complexity, as producing a greater apparent disconnexion of the parts of the poem, may seem at first view to favour the theory of their independent origin, yet, if the corresponding nicety of the mode in which they are interwoven be taken into account, the result is even less compatible with any such theory than the more simple arrangement of the Iliad. Hence, while with some more zealous but less critical followers of Wolf, the comparatively disjointed action of the Odyssey has supplied ground for still more determined attacks than have been directed against the Iliad, the more sagacious commentators of the same school have admitted the difficulties interposed by this intricacy of mechanical structure to be most formidable or even insuperable. This might be made the more apparent, by submitting the integral portions of the poem to the same specific test of analysis formerly applied to the corresponding subdivisions of the Iliad. In the present case however, leaving the reader who may be so disposed, to follow out such narrower scrutiny for himself by aid of the foregoing compendium, we shall be content with a few general remarks on some of the more delicate or more characteristic links in the general chain of connexion.

"Apologue
of Alcinoüs,"

3. The "Apologue of Alcinoüs"¹ is perhaps, upon the whole, the subdivision of the Odyssey combining the greatest amount of those requisites which, by the aid of a certain degree of alteration, addition, or curtailment, might constitute it an independent poem; and as such, accordingly, it has been classed by modern authorities.² It would however be impossible, by such expedients, to reduce it to any other form than that of a personal or autobiographical narrative. But it may safely be pronounced altogether foreign to the genius of the primitive epic muse that such a narrative should stand alone. In modern times the hero of a romance may, with, or even possibly without, the ceremony of a prefatory notice in the title-page, be introduced relating his history to an imaginary audience: but in an age to which scarcely an alphabetic letter, still less a written volume, is conceded, the supposition of a poet or rhapsodist, not content with telling his story in his own person, actually presenting himself to his audience in that of his hero, cannot for a moment be entertained. This series of adventures must, therefore, from the first have belonged to the body of narrative with which it is now connected. The rule obviously extends with still greater force to the subordinate cantos of the series. They may possibly be interpolations. But the notion of three or four such original independent specimens of personal narrative were still less admissible than that of a single one.

In the Odyssey however, as in the Iliad, it is even less perhaps in these bulkier heads of adventure, embodying standard points of national legend, that the mechanical unity of parts is displayed, than in a class of minor transactions which could hardly by any possibility be other than the personal invention of the poet. Attention may here again be directed to the easy artless manner in which the secondary actors are brought forward, dismissed, and reproduced, from time to time, often in widely separate portions of the drama. The names, for example, of three or four leading suitors, with the principal traits of their character, may have been matters of common tradition; but no such indulgence can be extended to the heralds, waiting-maids, goatherds, bards, beggars, and other petty performers, who all fulfil their respective functions with the same consistent unity as the protagonist himself. The following examples have been selected, among many perhaps still more to the purpose, as illustrating at the same time other features in the mechanism of the poet's art.

4. In the second book Telemachus, when about to sail for Pylos, after the refusal of the suitors to lend him a ship, procures one from a friend called *Noëmon*¹, otherwise unknown to fame, but who, in the fourth book, is again introduced as in want of his vessel, and anxiously inquiring¹ as to the period of its return. This circumstance is in itself somewhat strange. The wealth of the Ithacan royal family must have comprised ships, and it is nowhere implied that this particular portion of that wealth had been confiscated by the suitors, while the existing heir was left in possession of his lands, cattle, and other goods. To whatever cause the anomaly be due, it is not likely to have been consistently followed up by more than one poet. The borrowed ship is manned with volunteers selected by Mentor from the youth of the city. On reaching Ithaca, on his return from the voyage, the prince lands at his farm, and sends on his vessel to the port, commissioning Piræus², a confidential comrade, to take charge of his property, and protect during his absence a stranger of distinction, to whom he had afforded a passage from Pylos. We then leave the ship, and accompany Telemachus across the country to the cottage of Eumæus. After a long interval, in the latter part of the next canto, we rejoin the ship already in port, and are somewhat surprised to find the goods of Telemachus lodged, not in the house of Piræus to whose care they had been committed, but of another person called Clytius³, of whom nothing had yet been heard. At the commencement of the seventeenth book, however, Telemachus on arriving in the town finds Piræus in the marketplace, who accosts him, and begs he will send servants from the palace to his (Piræus's) house, to receive the property lately lodged in it. Here then, on first view, there is a manifest discrepancy. In one place Piræus, in another Clytius, is made to take charge of the goods. The matter, however, is explained by reference to the passage where Piræus is first mentioned, and where the patronymic Clytides is added to his name. He was therefore, like Telemachus, a youth as yet unsettled in life, and resident with his father; his friend's goods are carried consequently, as a matter of course, to his father's house, which is afterwards familiarly described as his own. This artless chain of mutual connexion supplies evidence, both of original unity in the parts of the poem, and of an audience familiar with many minor details of the subject, the suppression of which might give trouble to a reader of an age some three thousand years removed. Had Homer, in the first address of Telemachus to Piræus, happened to omit his patronymic, as he might very naturally have done, this series of passages, which now so clearly evinces the unity of composition, would have been adduced as conclusive argument of patchwork.

5. The male representative of the rebellious vas-salage of Ulysses is the goatherd Melanthius. The female ringleader of the same faction is Melantho¹, waiting-maid of Penelope. The correspondence of name and disposition naturally leads to suspect some blood relationship between the two. Nowhere however is there any notice to that effect on the part of Homer. It is only by collation of incidental passages, at widely distant intervals, that we are led to infer they are brother and sister. Melantho is described, in xviii. 321., as the daughter of Dolius, head gardener and favourite servant of Laertes, and as having been educated by Penelope with great tenderness for her own service, but now lost to all sense of shame or duty, and the mistress of Eurymachus. Melanthius is also styled son of Dolius ; and, although it is nowhere said that this Dolius was the same person as the father of Melanthe, the fact may be inferred from the circumstance of her paramour Eurymachus being also described as the patron of Melanthius, who accordingly occupies a place by his side when admitted to the table of the suitors.¹ The intimacy with the sister sufficiently explains the favour shown to the brother.

seer.

Piræus, the friend of Telemachus already noticed, has another bond of connexion with the body of the poem, through the medium of an important, though in some sense superfluous episode, that concerning the seer Theoclymenus², towards whom, in the absence of the prince, Piræus fulfils the duties of hospitality. Neither the first introduction of this stranger, the detailed genealogy of his race, nor his presence in the sequel, has the smallest necessary relation to the historical substance of the action. While it is not therefore very apparent, on first view, what may have induced even a single Homer to admit him at all, it is next to impossible that any number of independent authors or interpolators should have conspired in carrying his interference so systematically through the subsequent stages of the history. There suggests itself however, on closer consideration, a somewhat deeper motive than mere caprice, in the mind of the poet, for the prominence assigned to the mysterious refugee. Among the most valuable expedients for imparting supernatural effect to any great catastrophe was that of prophetic agency. In the Iliad are several distinguished organs of the divine will; Calchas, Helenus, Polydamas. In Ithaca no such character is mentioned, with the exception indeed of Leodes, himself one of the suitors, and as such virtually disqualified for the office of warning his companions of their impending fate. Homer, therefore, has thought fit to introduce one from abroad; nor could a more appropriate selection have been made than that of Theoclymenus, who, as lineal descendant of the Argive Melampus, represents the most distinguished line of Hellenic soothsayers. He is ushered on the stage under circumstances replete with mystery and terror, fleeing the vindictive wrath attendant on one of those crimes from which even the noblest natures in unguarded moments are not exempt; and his presence and interposition become essential to the moral conduct of the plot. The contempt with which his warnings are received, and his brutal treatment by the suitors, while adding to the measure of their enormities, supply, as will be seen hereafter, material for one of the finest scenes of preternatural horror in the whole volume of descriptive poetry.

6. A still more important illustration of the delicacy and depth of the poet's divine mechanism is contained in a series of allusions to certain mysterious peculiarities in the period and circumstances of the catastrophe of the poem. These allusions, taken separately, may appear little more than unimportant commonplaces or puzzling enigmas; but, in the true spirit of their epic connexion, they reflect in a new and brilliant light both the unity and the grandeur of the poet's genius.

influence of Apollo.

Ulysses, soon after his return to his native island, on two successive occasions, and in terms too solemn to be misunderstood, places the epoch of that return, and of the vengeance to be inflicted by him on the suitors, about the new moon; or, literally, "at the expiry of one month and commencement of another."¹ In the Greek religious calendar, the first days of the month were sacred to Apollo from the remotest period; and the Neomenia, or feast of the New Moon, celebrated in honour of that deity, continued to be one of the most popular festivals in every age of classical antiquity.² On the morning of the day destined for the destruction of the suitors, the fourth after the arrival of Ulysses, they appear earlier than usual in the palace hall. The reason assigned is, "that it is a great public festival,"³ the feast of Apollo in fact, as stated a few lines afterwards, where the heralds are described as leading the victims in procession through the city, and the people as assembled in the Grove of Phœbus. Now it will be remembered that Apollo was, in the primitive mythology, and in that of Homer in particular, the god of sudden death⁴; and the bow, his favourite weapon, was the emblem of his destructive attributes. The bow was also the weapon with which Ulysses was to consummate his vengeance on the suitors. Hence the competition of archery with the hero's bow, appointed by Penelope the day before as a test of their prowess, is selected with ominous propriety as the gymnastic entertainment of the feast of the god. Mark then how impressive the combination.

The light-hearted traitors, like moths playing round the flame of a candle, were destined, while in the act of honouring the god of the bow and of sudden destruction, on his own feast day and with his own weapon, to be suddenly destroyed by the bow of their injured sovereign. How fearful the self-irony of their unconscious appeals to the patronage of the very deity at whose altar they were about to be sacrificed! In order, however, rightly to apprehend the spirit of these mysterious forewarnings of the impending fatality, it will be proper to trace them as they occur dispersed throughout the latter half of the poem, and for the most part in the mouths of persons who seem to have no distinct consciousness of their import.

The disembarkation of Telemachus on the shore of Ithaca, with his inspired guest Theoclymenus, is greeted by the appearance of a hawk, designated "the swift messenger of Apollo,"¹ tearing a dove to pieces, and strewing the feathers on the earth around the hero. This omen the seer emphatically pronounces to be significant of prosperity and power to the royal house of Ithaca. The allusion to the strewing of the bodies of its enemies by the weapons of the god, as the feathers of the victim had been scattered by his winged messenger, is abundantly obvious.

After the insult offered by the treacherous Melanthius to the disguised Ulysses on his walk to the city, Eumæus puts forth a prayer for the speedy return of his master, to curb and punish such brutal conduct. The goatherd scornfully retorts² with a wish, "that Telemachus were as sure of being smitten that day by Apollo in the palace hall, or of falling by the hands of the suitors, as he is sure that Ulysses will never return to Ithaca." Now when it is remembered, that not only was Ulysses to return, the minister of his own wrath and that of the god whom the base peasant invokes, but that Melanthius himself was to be involved in the same speedy destruction as his licentious patrons, these few lines, which the careless reader passes over as mere matter of epic routine, will appear replete with ominous allusion to the impending catastrophe.

Penelope, in the course of the same day, hearing that Antinoüs had violated the rights of hospitality in her hall by striking her disguised husband, expresses a wish, in the warmth of her indignation, "that he himself might be stricken by the bowman Apollo:" XVII. 494.

αἶψ' οὕτως αὐτόν σε βάλοι κλυτότοξος Ἀπόλλων· and the mode in which the old nurse emphatically follows up the invocation shows that it is pregnant with more than common import: 496

εἰ γὰρ ἐπ' ἀρῆσιν τέλος ἡμετέρησι γένοιτο, οὐκ ἂν τις τούτων γε εὐθρονον ἦϊ ἴκοιτο.

The queen wishes that "the archer Apollo" would destroy Antinoüs; Euryclea rejoins, that, "if her desire were fulfilled, not one of the suitors would see the morrow." Now the morrow was Apollo's day; and on it the suitors were destined to be slain by the bow. The nurse's answer therefore, while in its familiar sense merely expressing a wish for their speediest possible destruction, indirectly defines the period appointed for its accomplishment.

On the fatal day itself, Antinoüs, having vainly attempted to string the bow of Ulysses, proposes to put off the contest until the close of the festival, and after prayer to the god for better success. Here, again, observe the portentous self-irony of some of his reasons : XXI. 258.

ἀγνή· τίς δέ κε τόξα τιταίνοιτ' ;*

“Who would pollute so pure a festival by feats of archery?” The disguised king commends this proposal, adding sarcastically, that doubtless on the next morning the god, if it be his good pleasure, will inspire them with fresh vigour for the undertaking ; but in the meantime begs to be allowed a trial. In this request he is supported by Penelope, who promises that, should Apollo grant him success, his prowess shall not go unrewarded.¹ His petition is, however, scornfully refused by the suitors ; and when Eumæus, in compliance with the queen’s wish, is about to hand the weapon to the hero, Eurymachus, in his customary tone of scurrility, tells the faithful peasant that “he will make him food for his own swine.” At length when Ulysses, bending the bow and shooting the arrow through the axe-heads, strips himself of his tattered disguise, and mounts the pavement of his palace hall ready to commence the bloody work, he utters the terrible sentence, that “he is now about to aim at a mark which no man yet hath hit, but which he hopes to pierce by the favour of Apollo :” XXII. 6.

This whole train of allusions therefore, in a great measure pointless if taken separately, assumes collectively an awful significance as concentrated around the fatality, that Ulysses was suddenly to destroy the suitors with the bow, on the sacred day of Apollo, the god of archery and of sudden destruction. The catastrophe was to take place at the moment when they were assembled to celebrate, with their characteristic levity of demeanour, the festival of the god, and while engaged in a trial of skill with the weapon which, sacred to him, was to deal death to themselves; with the very weapon too, of the man they were outraging, and whose wife and plundered goods were the promised reward of the victor.

What however it may be asked, has induced the genius who conceived this grand poetical moral, to shroud it under so enigmatical a veil?¹ A sufficient answer to such questions might perhaps be, that we have no right to ask them. The following however suggests itself as a natural explanation of the mystery. The special patroness of Ulysses was Pallas. She had been his guardian angel during the Trojan war, and had conducted him safe through the dangers of his late adventurous course. To her therefore the first, and ostensibly the sole credit was to remain of completing the work she had begun.

¹ The fact of a coincidence between the catastrophe of the poem and the feast of Apollo has been observed by O. Müller (Einl. zu ein. Wiss. Myth. p. 360.): but, overlooking the whole train of delicate allusions to that coincidence, he has arrived at the strange opinion that Homer himself was unconscious of their spirit and value; that he is merely the mechanical organ of some obscure tradition, which he neither understood nor appreciated. The equally strange argument by which this view is supported, that the poet nowhere specially directs attention to the fact of Apollo being an agent in the destruction of the suitors, is sufficiently disposed of by the series of passages above cited.

Had the agency of Apollo been brought forward in the prominent form to which its importance might otherwise seem to entitle it, Minerva would have been eclipsed, or a multiplicity of divine interference have resulted, injurious to the harmony of the action. The influence therefore of the god of the bow, with its train of portentous contingencies, has been very properly kept in the background of the picture. The few incidental touches by which it has been shadowed forth speak home, through their very obscurity, with the greater force to the minds of those who appreciate the true spirit of the poem, but must remain a dead letter to such as read it on the principles of Hermann, Wolf, or Heyne.

Comparative genius of the two poems.

1. THE fundamental difference in the genius of the two poems has been accurately pointed out by Aristotle.¹ The Iliad he defines as pathetic and simple; the Odyssey as ethic and complex. Our previous analysis of the plot of the Iliad, in conjunction with the character of its hero, has been accordingly little more than a commentary on the philosopher's concise and pithy definition. The whole machinery of that poem revolves around the single object of exemplifying, in the person of one great ideal being, the effects of those passions which, in poetry or real life, chiefly excite admiration or terror. The Odyssey is no less truly described, by the same critic, as a varied picture of character and manners. We must, however, guard against too rigid an interpretation of the letter of this distinction. While the characters of the Iliad, from the comparatively limited nature of its subject, are confined to a limited class, they are perhaps on that account the more wonderful in the variety and delicacy of their conception. In the Odyssey, on the other hand, although the ethic element predominates, yet the individual displays of passion and feeling fall no way short, either in liveliness or truth, of those of the Iliad.

While therefore the Iliad, from the greater solidity and simplicity of its design, and the superior dignity of its subject and style, ranks as the nobler poem of the two, the Odyssey must be admitted to display a greater extent and fertility of inventive genius. Nowhere can a work of art be found combining so great a multiplicity of parts in so harmonious a unity of whole, or exhibiting in the treatment of so rich a variety of materials such masterly design or vivid colouring. In the raging of the storm, in the tumult of war foreign or domestic, it displays all the grandeur of the Iliad. In the terror of the giant or cannibal, the fascination of the siren, or the delusive arts of the sorceress, the bold fancy of Oriental romance is combined with the genial simplicity of Hellenic fable. In the spacious halls of the imperial palace, or the still seclusion of the landward farm, the reader feels equally at home; and partakes with equal zest of the cheerful frugality of the rustic board, and the gorgeous munificence of royal hospitality. He listens, as if present, alike to the fierce altercation and the familiar dialogue, to the song of the bard, the traveller's tale, and the scurrilous jest of the licentious brawler. He imagines himself as busily engaged in the daily routine of indoor life, as in the bustle of the market, or the stormy debate of the council hall. In the passage of the vessel from coast to coast or island to island, we hear the flapping of the sail, the dash of the oar, and the cry of the mariner. We rejoice with the good ship as she glides over the waves before a prosperous breeze, and shudder for the fate of her gallant crew amid the tumult of warring elements. In the characters are exhibited, with the same unvarying truth and nature, the patient but dignified demeanour of rank and worth under grinding oppression; the heroic constancy of the devoted wife, amid endless trials and temptations; the unshaken fidelity of the affectionate husband; the modest simplicity of the ingenuous youth; the bold enterprise, cunning artifice, and stern endurance of the daring adventurer; the mixture of insolence and servility, squalid misery and rapacity, in the professional beggar and vagabond. The gravity of the sage, and the dry humour of the satirist, are contrasted with the levity of the frivolous courtier, the abandoned rake, or the giddy populace; the base treachery and ingratitude of the rebellious vassal, with the devotion of the faithful subject; the sportive coquetry of virgin innocence, with the wanton pertness of the courtesan; the deliberate villany of the heartless reprobate, with the vacillation of the half-repentant sinner. The Odyssey is, in fact, a rich picture gallery of human life as it existed in that age and country, embracing every subject, from the sublime to the ludicrous, from the terrible to the burlesque, with so close an adherence to nature, yet so careful a softening down of its more offensive features, as to charm as much by the purity as the truth and brilliancy of the representation.

This difference in the genius of the two poems involves a corresponding variety of their poetical structure. The Iliad hinges on a single all-absorbing interest, the excited passions of Achilles. In the Odyssey, besides the main scope of the narrative, the restoration of Ulysses to his kingdom, numerous separate interests present a proportional complication of underplot. Such are the private schemes of the suitors, and their persecution of Telemachus; the wrath of Neptune against Ulysses for his treatment of Polyphemus; and the love of Calypso for the same hero. Hence, while the fate of Ulysses, like that of Achilles, equally forms the centre of the action, the subordinate adventures acquire a far greater degree of separate integrity, and the persons who figure in them a more independent range of activity, than in the Iliad. While Ulysses is the hero of the whole poem, Telemachus is the protagonist of its first four cantos. Ulysses himself in his Apologue to Alcinoüs appears as the hero of a distinct action. Even the suitors assume, towards the close of the poem, a prominence which never belongs to any secondary performer of the Iliad. This difference in the composition of the Odyssey, while precluding any such concurrent analysis of the genius of the protagonist and of the whole work as in the case of the Iliad, renders it expedient here to follow out the same principle in detail, by examining each of the subdivisions above alluded to conjointly with the characters of their more immediate heroes. The whole action of the Odyssey may thus be ranged under three comprehensive heads: 1. The adventures of Telemachus alone; 2. The adventures of Ulysses alone; 3. The adventures of the two together, after their return from their travels. The first claim on attention belongs to Ulysses, whose character, though graphically portrayed throughout his appearance on the stage, will be best considered in connexion with his exclusive occupation of it from the fifth to the twelfth books. The same series of narrative comprises also the court and people of the Phæacians, an episode offering one of the most spirited satires ever conceived on some of the more amusing weaknesses of human nature. The character of Telemachus connects itself in a similar manner with the opening books, where he figures as principal performer; while the suitors, Penelope, and other personages of inferior note, assume importance in the latter part of the poem.

Character

2. The hero of the Odyssey also acts a leading part in the Iliad; but the remarks suggested by his share in that poem have been reserved for the present occasion, his character, in justice both to its own merits and the unity of the poet's conception of it, requiring to be considered as one consistent whole. It will also be proper to keep in view the relation in which Ulysses stands to the protagonist of the Iliad, as illustrative of the poet's tact in adapting the ingredients of each work to the spirit of its composition.

Achilles represents the grandeur of the heroic character, as reflected in the very excess of its noblest attributes. Ulysses represents its virtue, possessing, as he does in greater number and higher degree than any other chief, the qualities which in that age constituted the accomplished king and citizen. In him the impetuous valour of the invincible paladin gives place to the cool intrepidity of the discreet veteran. Instead of that intuitive horror of so much as the semblance of deceit which animates the haughty Myrmidon, Ulysses combines with a just regard for the real principles of equity, a more rational estimate of the talents he had received from nature for promoting the legitimate objects of his ambition. To a ready turn for dissimulation and a never failing self-command, he unites a patient endurance of suffering, and even of insult, when essential to the attainment of his ends. In the Iliad, where his attributes of warrior and politician are alone exemplified, he is constantly put forward in those emergencies where a combination of courage and diplomatic tact is required. He is intrusted by Agamemnon with the delicate office of restoring Chryseïs to her home, and propitiating the wrath of the terrible deity to whom her father ministered. On the bad success of Agamemnon's experiment on the temper of his troops, and the bewilderment of that commander, Ulysses, with the aid of his guardian genius Minerva, restores order and discipline to the disorganised host. He takes the chief conduct of the negotiation with Achilles, and in the sequel, as representing the more intellectual element of military enterprise, he executes, in appropriate conjunction with Diomed's combative prowess, the midnight reconnoitre of the Trojan camp. He is also, conjointly with Diomed, an energetic opponent of Agamemnon's dastardly plans of desertion or flight.¹ In the games, baffling brute strength by dexterous art, he bears away from the mighty Ajax the prize of wrestling. This victory was but a prelude to that afterwards obtained in a more glorious competition with the same rival, when the voice of his fellow-warriors pronounced him the hero who, by his various talents, had, next to Achilles, promoted the triumph of the national arms. The justice of this verdict was soon after tested, by his undertaking and successfully managing the stratagem of the wooden horse¹, the most dangerous, as it was the most decisive, measure of the war. On a former occasion² he had performed a little less hazardous exploit, that of entering Troy in disguise, for the purpose of obtaining cooperation among the inmates of the city in any attempt to take it by surprise.

Skilled however as he is in the arts of intrigue, he never turns them to unworthy account. The stratagems above referred to, with other parallel displays of political tact or patient endurance in the sequel of his career, are traits which, foreign as they would have been to the genius of Achilles, are appropriate and honourable in the hero of the Odyssey. His habitual prudence was indeed modified, or even at times overcome, by his thirst for glory, and by an eager pursuit of the marvellous which led him into perilous adventures. Proof against the temptation to sensual indulgence where to yield were discreditable, he displays no stoical contempt for the sweets with which fortune, in the worst of times, occasionally tempered the bitterness of his cup; and a ready vein of comic humour enlivens the gloom, while it seasons the description, of his most disastrous vicissitudes. But even the brilliancy of his intellectual qualities is obscured by his social excellences. He is not only the brave soldier, astute politician, and bold navigator, but the affectionate husband and parent, the just and paternal ruler, and the kind and benevolent master. Throughout his career of adventure, the ruling objects of his thoughts or desires are still his wife, his son, and native fireside¹, in his own little sea-girt island, lowly and insignificant as he himself describes it², and as it would to this day have remained, but for the glory which his own and his poet's genius have shed on its rugged cliffs.

3. There is perhaps no hero whose character, as conceived by Homer, contrasts more broadly with the form it assumes in the fable of the Cyclic poets and the Attic dramatists. The valiant soldier is there transformed into the skulking poltroon, the sagacious politician into the plotting traitor, the man of honour into the low-minded villain. The critical reflexions suggested by this metamorphosis belong to another place; it will here suffice to observe, that there is nothing in the part played by Ulysses in either poem, which affords the slightest reasonable pretext for such imputations. He is not, it is true, exempt from the occasional weakness to which Homer, with a just regard for the laws of human nature, subjects even his most perfect characters. Yet his courage fails him but once³, under all the trials to which it is exposed by land or by sea, and that before the arm of God rather than man, when not only Agamemnon and Menelaus, but Ajax and, with the single exception of Diomed, the whole Greek army, were infected with the same panic. There are however varieties of courage as of other human virtues. If Ulysses might, in such company, fly before Hector backed by the thunderbolts of Jupiter, Diomed, or even Achilles, might have displayed less composure in the cave of Polyphemus or the Shades of Erebus, or have offered a less determined resistance to the temptations of hunger in the island of Thrinacia. Still less countenance is afforded by the Odyssey to the charges of the later fable against its hero's honesty. While the vicissitudes of his destiny render a succession of intrigues indispensable, yet on no occasion is an untruth uttered or a manœuvre practised for a base object, or where a man of strict honour and integrity, in any age or country, need have felt shame in turning his abilities to similar account.

ingredient.

With respect to the comic ingredient in the genius of Ulysses or of the Odyssey, the inquiry may suggest itself, how far, in a poem where the leading incidents are grave and serious, and the catastrophe deeply tragical, any such infusion of the burlesque be consistent with poetical propriety? The best general answer to this question is, that the operations of great original genius are scarcely compatible with an observance of those restraints to which the professional masters of the art, in later ages, have been subjected. A certain blending of the two ingredients seems also indispensable, on the principle of contrast, to the full effect of either the ethic or pathetic in such compositions. Even in the sublimely dignified Iliad many traits of humour are discernible. Such are the episodes of Thersites, and the scenes of domestic life in Olympus, to which, as of more questionable propriety, attention will be turned in treating of the theological mechanism of the poems.

In this respect the parallel is obvious between Homer and the two greatest poets of modern times, Dante and Shakspeare. The Hellenic minstrel however as a general rule, excels his rivals, if not in the broader point of his comedy, in the propriety at least of its management, by making it season rather than rudely clash with more serious matters : and in one respect he stands nobly superior to them, that all obscenity is banished from his jest, or, if a vestige of such levity can be discerned, it is only through the veil of cautious and delicate enigma.

Judged by a more fastidious standard, the boxing match with the beggar Irus has objectionable features ; yet, if the poet was justified in disguising his hero as a mendicant, he was bound to carry him through his part with spirit. Ulysses certainly appears as the prince of beggars ; nor probably was his royal dignity tarnished, in the spirit of heroic manners, by the righteous chastisement inflicted on the base profaner of his palace hall. The transformation by Circe of the hero's navigators into hogs has also moved the spleen of critics of high authority.¹ But the fault may here lie in their too narrow estimate of the moral of the poet's romance. Such treatment, degrading as it may be to heroes of the Trojan war, is essential to the ethic spirit of the adventure. Lions or bears might have furnished a more dignified metamorphosis than hogs ; but then the real point of the satire would have been lost. Their punishment is evidently adapted to their offence, the swinish eagerness with which they swallowed the intoxicating draught of the sorceress.²

history subsequent to his departure from Troy, as embodied in the action of the poem.

Voyage of Ulysses.
Ciconians.

4. The "Apologue of Alcinoüs," whether in the variety or curiosity of its adventures, or in the brilliancy of their description, stands to this day unrivalled as a tale of supernatural wonder, the model on which succeeding romancers have planned their fairest structures, and the source to which they have been indebted for their choicest materials.

The superiority of native inspiration to imitative art may here be appreciated, by comparing the course of Homer's hero with the closely parallel episode of Virgil, the Voyage of Æneas to Latium. In the spirit that guides the Trojan chief no spark can be discovered of that electric fire which ought to animate the bosom of a chivalrous adventurer. Like an escaped prisoner who has yet but half shaken off his fetters, moaning over his cruel fate, he wends his melancholy way, shunning not merely every opportunity of valorous exploit, but even the remotest appearance of danger; trembling, above all, at the very thought of again falling in with those terrible Greeks! Compare more especially the outset of the two expeditions. Æneas lands on the coast of Thrace with the intention of founding a colony.¹ The limits of the new city were marked out, and its buildings in rapid progress, when he is apprised, through an omen, of the ferocious character of a neighbouring potentate, once an ally of Priam, but who had murdered a son of that monarch confided to his protection. What was to be done? In the spirit of Homer's fable he would at all risks have made

ἤτοι κεν πόλιν ἔπραθεν ὤλισσε δ' αὐτούς !

But no: terrified by the thought of so dangerous a neighbour, he at once abandons his half-built town, hurries on board, and takes to flight. How different is the first adventure of Ulysses on the same coast! As a whet to the courage of his handful of heroes at the commencement of their voyage, and a passing compliment to an old national enemy, he assaults, sacks, and plunders the city of these same Thracian allies of Priam.¹ The adventure would have been crowned with complete success but for the folly of his men. Deaf to his orders to reembark with the spoil, they remain carousing on the field, until swarms of kindred barbarians from the surrounding region collect and attack them; and it is only after a long and desperate conflict against overwhelming numbers that he succeeds in effecting his retreat. After this every thing is life, activity, and energy. When driven off his homeward course by the adverse elements, every new or strange country is visited, every wonder explored, every enterprise courted which held out a prospect of glory, or where conduct could insure success.

It will be observed, as a pervading rule of this whole train of adventures, supplying in its moral application a tribute to the virtue of the chief at the expense of the inferior order of intellect vouchsafed to his men, that while all the more brilliant and successful enterprises are undertaken at his instance, often against their will, every disastrous catastrophe is brought about by their folly, sensuality, or mutinous disobedience of his orders. The arm of retributive destiny is no less signally displayed in the issue of their respective careers. While the hero, in spite of infinite obstacles, reaches home in safety, not one of his unfortunate comrades escapes destruction; and for the reason concisely assigned by the poet :

αὐτῶν γὰρ σφετέρῃσιν ἀτασθαλίῃσιν ὄλοντο !

phagi.

On arriving at the country of the Lotophagi, two men with a herald are sent to explore. Partaking of the delicious diet of that hospitable race, they forget their friends and home, and resolve to pass the rest of their lives amid the delights of the "Land of the Lotus." Ulysses at once seizes and binds the delinquents, drags them to the beach, hurries them on board¹ with the rest of his crew, lest they too should taste of the intoxicating fruit, and hastens from the dangerous shore.

Cyclops.

5. On reaching the coast of the Cyclops, the case is altered. The mariners, after plundering the well-stocked dairy of Polyphemus, horror-struck at the distant view of the giant, are eager to return with their booty to the ships. But the hero's thirst of glory is now inflamed, and must be gratified. He achieves accordingly the honour, reserved for him by the decree of Fate, of punishing a blood-thirsty cannibal, and disabling him from prosecuting in future his brutal practices. This adventure is still the best extant specimen of poetical gigantophonia, and the prototype of all or most of those which have since acquired celebrity. It exhibits that happy mixture of the serious and burlesque, the terrible and risible, which constitutes perfection in popular romance. The more delicate of its humorous ingredients is the combination, in the character of Polyphemus, with his flocks, milk, butter, and cheese, of the primitive simplicity of pastoral life with the ferocity of the giant and cannibal.

The arrival of the fleet at the island of Æolus introduces a fable of more elegant cast and refined moral application. The Lord of the Winds, feasting with his twelve sons and daughters in the palace hall of his brass-bound islet, receives and honourably entertains the distinguished stranger; and, on his departure, deposes to him such control over the elements as would secure his direct and speedy voyage home. The mode in which these kind intentions are fulfilled is described with much drollery. The adverse gales are sewed up in the hide of one of their master's oxen, slaughtered and skinned on the spot for the purpose¹; and so securely is their leathern prison bound with silver cords, that not a breath of unfavourable air could escape. Here again, the sordid sensuality of the mariners and its fatal results appear in the usual contrast with the virtue of their chief. During ten days he watches the progress of the vessel, the sleepless guardian of its airy cargo. On the tenth, overcome with fatigue, he slumbers, and their folly and avarice prevail. The moment selected for the opening of the bag is most appropriate; just as the culprits were within sight of the curling smoke of their native hearths, and anticipating the speedy enjoyment of the treasure which they supposed the mysterious wallet to contain. The winds, on their escape, as a seasonable reprisal on the author of their late durance, blow him straight back to their master's island. The account of his foolish appearance, on presenting himself again at the court of Æolus, has much dry comic humour. After inquiring the reason of so speedy a return, and listening quietly to the hero's explanation, his flatulent majesty sends him summarily about his business, as one whose inveterate ill luck, according to the familiar superstition of every primitive age, renders him an unfit object of countenance or sympathy.¹

The Læstrygonians.

On reaching the port of the Læstrygonians, the rest of the squadron, attracted by its beauty and tranquillity, enter and take up their moorings. Ulysses alone remains with his vessel in the open roadstead, till better informed of the nature of the country by the messengers whom he sends to explore it. The description even of this most tragical adventure is seasoned with the customary touches of the burlesque, by the combination of domestic and civilised habits in the Læstrygonian character (as of pastoral simplicity in that of the Cyclops) with the ferocity of the giant and man-eater. The maiden whom the ambassadors accost on her way to the fountain, and who proves to be the king's daughter, with ready politeness conducts them to her father's city and palace, and introduces them to the queen her mother, whose "mountain-stature" and hideous aspect freeze their breasts with terror. The queen, as becomes a prudent housewife, takes no step without consulting her husband, whom she summons from the forum, where he was engaged in public business. On his arrival, without saying a word, he seizes one of his guests, kills him on the spot, and orders him to be dressed for supper. The two others save themselves by flight. But the alarm is given, and the adventure ends in the total destruction of the fleet in the haven. Ulysses alone, with his vessel and crew, escapes. The catastrophe is painted with the poet's usual power. He brings before our very eyes the collected population of ogres hurling the masses of rock from the surrounding cliffs; and we hear the crush of the vessels and the cries of the mariners, harpooned like tunnies for the evening meal of their cannibal destroyers.¹

The hero's next resting-place is the island of Circe. Circe. Here he divides his men into two bodies, who cast lots for the service of exploring the country. The lot falls on the party headed by his lieutenant Eurylochus. Its members, with the exception of their leader, who here emulates the caution of his chief, yielding to the allurements of the enchantress are changed by her into hogs. They are delivered by Ulysses who, aided by Mercury, here a plain figure of the hero's intellectual superiority, baffles Circe at her own arts, after checking with energetic severity a first attempt at mutiny on the part of the same Eurylochus.

After a year's residence on the island he achieves The Necromancy. his voyage to Hades. From the narrative of this expedition every trait of the burlesque is judiciously excluded. The gaiety with which the royal adventurer had so lately recounted even his most calamitous vicissitudes gives place to a solemnity often rising to the sublime, in his description of the dismal terrors of the mansions of the dead. The consideration of the poet's doctrine of a future state, as embodied in this episode, belongs to the chapter on his mythology. Nowhere, perhaps, does the contrast between the Ulysses of Homer and the Ulysses of the later fable, between the high-minded fearless adventurer and the mean-spirited insidious manœvrer, appear in a more prominent light than in the "Necromancy." The shade of Achilles himself expresses astonishment at the composure with which a solitary mortal wanders, without divine escort, among scenes of preternatural terror, at which even a living Achilles might have shuddered.

The Sirens.

The adventure with the Sirens inculcates, in a beautiful allegory, the duty incumbent even on the most vigorous minds, not only to resist but to avoid temptation. The sage who exposes himself to its influence is here exhibited overcome by its power, and only escapes through the intervention of the same vulgar agents whom his own wise precautions had placed beyond its reach. But in his encounter with Scylla, his martial ardour overcomes his habitual forbearance; and the cruel destruction of two of his comrades, described by him as the most heart-rending of all his calamities, is admitted to be a judgment for his neglect of the divine injunction, to trust in this emergency not to his own valour, but to the protection of the gods, for deliverance. In the immediate sequel the insubordination and impiety of the crew, instigated as before by the mutinous Eurylochus¹, bring their own wanderings to a lamentable close, while the hero himself alone escapes, at the expense of eight long years of banishment and captivity.

6. On his delivery from the thralldom of Calypso, another course of maritime disaster brings him to Scheria, the land of the Phæacians. This episode is, perhaps, the most brilliant specimen of the poet's combined talent for the delineation of character and for satirical humour. While there is no portion of his works a right understanding of which is so indispensable to a full estimate of his genius, there is none perhaps which has been so little understood. Appeal may be made to the tenor of the most esteemed commentaries, still more perhaps to the text of the most popular translations, where the gay sarcastic tone of description and dialogue which seasons the whole adventure, is replaced by the tragic solemnity of the gravest scenes of the Iliad.

Scheria and
acians.

Whether Scheria is meant to represent a real or a fictitious country is a question which does not now immediately concern us. There can, however, be little doubt, from the distinctive peculiarities with which the poet has invested its inhabitants, and the precision and force of the sarcasm displayed in his portrait of their character, that the episode is intended as a satire on the habits of some real people with whom he was familiar.¹ The Phæacians are described as combining certain magical or supernatural attributes with a large share of human weakness. They were a maritime colony² which had migrated to Scheria from another distant shore, and are still, from taste and habit, rather than commercial zeal, extensively engaged in nautical enterprise. They are represented as wealthy and luxurious, devoted to pleasure and diversion ; careless of all but the present moment and its enjoyments ; vain, garrulous, and ostentatious ; liars and boasters ; yet, withal, kind-hearted, good-humoured, and generous. But even their good qualities are subservient to their vanity. One chief inducement to their munificent treatment of strangers was, by their own avowal, the prospect of glory that would accrue to themselves on their praises being sounded by the wanderer on his return home.¹ Nor does the marked urbanity of the royal family, or of the graver members of society, afford a sufficient security to their guest from the roguish tricks of the populace, or the impertinence of the young nobles of the court.²

The scene in which the hero is first introduced to his new friends is singularly pleasing and characteristic.³ The dream of Nausicaa, the most charming of her nation and her sex, her conversation with her father, descent with her maidens to wash the family vestments at the river mouth, the nymphish sports with which they enliven their task, and their encounter with Ulysses, offer a beautiful picture of the antient simplicity of domestic manners, and of virgin innocence, vivacity, and tenderness. The hero's address to his benefactress, correctly characterised by the poet as "gentle and cunning," is precisely that mixture of delicate flattery and winning supplication best calculated to produce its effect on female sympathies. The portrait of Nausicaa, as sketched here and in the sequel with a few masterly touches, is the most excellent of its kind in either poem. It combines, in the most attractive form, and under such modifications as became her sex, the more favourable charac-

7. Minerva finds it necessary to escort the hero through the streets of the town to the royal residence, enveloped in a cloud to protect him from the impertinence of the populace. He is welcomed with a profusion of courtesies by the king, queen, and nobles assembled in the royal banqueting-hall. The harangues of king Alcinoüs, the type, like Priam, of his people, are made by the poet, in this and the following scenes, and with his usual dramatic skill, the instrument for developing the common genius of the race over whom the orator holds sway. The characteristics of his eloquence are egotism and self-laudatory bombast, balanced by an equal share of hyperbolical compliment to his guest, good-humour, diffuseness, and incoherent wandering from subject to subject, as vanity prompts the one, or levity dismisses the other. His first short speech, on recovering from the bewilderment into which the sudden appearance of a stranger of so dignified a presence had thrown himself and his company, displays at once the genius of the orator and of the society over which he presided. "If," says he¹, "our guest be a man, our business is, first by handsome treatment of him while among us, to banish care from his breast, and then to help him home to his native country. There let him take his chance of the lot the Fates have decreed him. But if he be a god come down from heaven to visit us, let the gods themselves look to the matter. tables, but familiarly joining us in our journeys and occasional walks ; for we are, in fact, like the Cyclopes and Giants, their neighbours and cousins." The effect of this effusion is much enhanced by the caustic dryness of the hero's answer. Nor can there be a better proof how completely the spirit of this portion of the poem has been misapprehended, than the pompous solemnity by which the whole humour of the dialogue is supplanted in the popular modern paraphrases.¹

In the sequel queen Arete, who during the harangue of her husband had been scrutinising the outward man of the stranger, for the women engross the chief share of the small stock of common sense allotted to the community, seasons the general levity of the discourse by asking him who and what

¹ VII. 208. The subjoined version of this address, with however little pretension to poetical elegance, may claim at least to embody, nearly to the letter, the ethic spirit and point of the passage, which disappear in the popular translations :

" Alcinoüs, judge better of my case ;
 No god am I, nor like the heaven-born race ;
 Nor outward form in me nor inward mind
 Betoken aught surpassing human kind.
 But if thou e'er hast known a mortal wight Harassed, pursued, by Fortune's cruel spite,
 Worn out in body, and perplexed in heart,
 Of him in me behold the counterpart.
 More I could tell of my disastrous fate,
 And all I've suffered through celestial hate ;
 But let me sup, I prithee, though distressed,
 By Belly's importunity hard pressed,
 That ruthless despot of the inner man,
 Whose stern behest dispute no mortal can.
 Vexed though I be, borne down by many a grief,
 Yet eat and drink I must for his relief ;
 All cares forego, and check the gushing tear, Whilst I replenish him with wholesome cheer."

he was, and how he came by the clothes on his back, which she recognised as part of her family wardrobe. His answer to this question calls forth from Alcinoüs a severe reflection on his daughter's defective hospitality. The hero vindicates his fair benefactress by a gallant but glaring misstatement of fact.¹ Soon after, Alcinoüs, in the course of another turgid oration², incidentally makes offer to his still unknown guest of his daughter's hand in marriage, together with a handsome establishment, if he will consent to remain among them; but is careful to assume in the same breath, that the stranger's patriotism will never admit of his acceding to such an arrangement. He then congratulates Ulysses on his approaching passage home, vaunting the marvels of his own navy and the enterprise of his seamen, to whom the helm was useless, as his vessels knew their own way from port to port.

The next morning the Senate assembles to deliberate on the best mode of honouring the stranger. In the ensuing banquet, Alcinoüs gives an agreeable proof how much real politeness he combined with his levity, in the ready tact with which he checks his bard's song of the Trojan war, on observing how painfully it affected his guest.³ This he does by a proposal to pass on to the gymnastic games, "in order," as he adds, "that the stranger, on his return, may inform his friends how greatly superior the Phæacians are to all other men in boxing, wrestling, and the like martial exercises." After some display by the young nobles Ulysses is invited to make a trial. He declines, on the triple plea of fatigue of body, anxiety of mind, and the privilege of a stranger.

³ VIII. 94.

His refusal exposes him to some impertinence from the young princes, one of whom taunts him with fear of the superior prowess of himself and comrades. Provoked to compliance, the hero sends a quoit far beyond the mark of their best men, and with a force which made the Phæacians "quail beneath its whirl." He then challenges them to produce a champion to match him in any other feat of strength or dexterity. Alcinoüs no way abashed evades the proposal, giving, with ready effrontery, the lie direct to his own just uttered vaunt, and a new turn to the whole affair. He now requests Ulysses to inform his friends on his return home¹, "that the Phæacians are a peaceful race, who make little account of boxing, wrestling, and the like martial exercises, but that they excel all other men in the arts of good living, and are the most skilful navigators, the swiftest runners, and the best singers and dancers in the universe." A show of the latter accomplishments then takes place. The song of the bard, the only approach to licentious description in the poem, is here so completely in character, and so essential to the spirit of the whole scene, as to supply strong argument against the otherwise plausible opinion of its being a later addition to the original text. On Ulysses complimenting his host on the performance of his sons, Alcinoüs turns with delight to his courtiers, and commending the hero as a man of sense and judgement, requests each of them to make him a handsome present. At the same time he orders the youth who had insulted him to apologise², and all obey with great good-humour and alacrity.

Among the richer specimens of the Scherian

monarch's meandering eloquence is the harangue in which he requests Ulysses to relate his adventures, and explain more particularly "why he always appeared so much affected by any allusion to the Trojan war;" an event, he gravely adds, which, with the destruction of the human race it involved, "was ordained in order to supply the festive board with agreeable subjects of minstrelsy." Equally characteristic is his comment on his father's prophecy of the destruction that overhung his own city, from the divine jealousy of their maritime exploits: "so spake the old man, and the gods may fulfil his words or not, as they think fit:" VIII. 570.

ἌΩς ἀγόρευ' ὁ γέρων· τὰ δέ κεν θεὸς ἦ τελέσειεν,
ἦ κ' ἀτέλειστ' εἶη, ὥς οἱ φίλον ἔπλετο θυμῷ.

The names given by the poet to his Phæacian heroes, with the notices of their origin or previous history, are all, directly or ironically, allusive to their favourite pursuits or their flighty ostentatious character.¹ Nausithoüs, the "swift navigator," founder of the state, was son of Neptune, by Peribœa, the "widely celebrated," daughter of Eurymedon, the "wide-ruling," king of the giants. This connexion of the good-humoured effeminate race with giants and Cyclops, the poetical types of barbarism and ferocity, is conceived in the finest spirit of irony. Nausithoüs had two sons, Rhexenor, "Crusher of men," and Alcinoüs, "Strong of intellect." The satirical allusion in the latter title to the levity and frivolity of its owner is sufficiently obvious. "Crusher of men" left an only daughter, Arete, the benevolent, literally the "exorable," who espouses her uncle, Alcinoüs, the reigning prince. To her both Minerva and Nausicaa, with appropriate reference to her name and character, counsel Ulysses to address his supplication on arriving at the palace.¹ The remaining twenty names of noble personages are but so many ingenious compounds significant of maritime pursuit, with the exception of two, one of which, Laodamas, "subduer of the people," is but a modification of that of the owner's grandfather, the "crusher of men."

Among the specimens of primitive "mock heroic" in this episode, attention may be drawn to the simile of the lion, employed to illustrate the hero's first appearance before his benefactress Nausicaa; no figure can be less appropriate, if taken in a literal sense, or happier if considered as a travesty of the more dignified epic style.² The account of the gymnastic games, with the descriptive catalogue of the doughty Phæacian candidates, is also a burlesque paraphrase of parallel passages of the Iliad. The facetious spirit³ of the adventure is maintained to the close. Laden with compliments and presents, the hero embarks in the evening, in a galley expressly fitted out for his service. Before daybreak the ship reaches the coast of Ithaca, where he is conveyed gently from the deck on his bed by the waggish crew, and deposited fast asleep¹, together with his goods, on his native rocks. On awakening he is at a loss to know where he is, when he is relieved from his embarrassment by the appearance of his divine patroness, Minerva.

8. It is in the latter part of the poem that the higher ethic attributes of Ulysses are chiefly displayed; in the conduct of his deep-laid plot; in his stoical command of temper and feeling under the trials to which both are exposed from the brutality of his enemies or the affection of his friends; and in his skilful enactment of the fictitious characters which he assumes. Attention is especially due to the care with which, in his part of beggar or vagabond, he guards against too great a sacrifice of his personal dignity, as well as the risk of detection, by giving prominence to the circumstance of noble birth and reduced condition, when called upon from time to time for an account of his previous life.² That the language of Ulysses should be marked by the same distinctive individuality as that of some of his fellow heroes were consistent neither with the versatility of his genius, nor the variety of parts he is called upon to act. The characteristic feature of his eloquence is an appropriate adaptation to the circumstances in which he is placed. Like the fabulous Lycian sphinx, which combined the nature of the lion and serpent with its own proper body of Chimæra, Ulysses, whether the king, the beggar, the warrior, or the traveller, is still in word and deed Ulysses. In the Iliad he speaks and acts as the wise counsellor, the energetic disciplinarian, and the skilful diplomatist. In the indignant retorts provoked by the insolence of the suitor tribe, his eloquence assumes a vehemence worthy of Achilles.¹ His address to Nausicaa is in the most insinuating style of courtly flattery. In the banqueting-hall of her father a tone of sarcastic raillery is blended with the self-satisfied bombast of its habitual guests ; as, for example, in the proud catalogue of his own athletic attainments, with which he overwhelms the already crestfallen party in the gymnastic arena.² In his interview with Pallas on the shore of Ithaca, he calls forth the admiration even of the goddess of stratagem, by the readiness with which he disguises the struggle of excited feelings under the ingenuous bewilderment of the benighted voyager³ ; and in the hut of Eumæus, accommodating his manners to those of his landlord, he combines the garrulity of the veteran soldier with that of the itinerant beggar.⁴

TELEMACHUS.

Character
of Tele-

9. The character of Telemachus, if little distinguished by the prominence or the brilliancy of its features, is second to none of either poem in the delicacy of its shades or of the touches by which it is delineated. To be rightly estimated, it must be considered in its parallel with those of other youthful heroes of the same rank ; with that of Achilles, for example, or of his son Neoptolemus. The former hero, at the outset of his career of conquest, was several years younger than Telemachus. Neoptolemus is also described, at the same early age with his father, as taking a lead, both in the council and the field, among the Greek warriors ; while Telemachus is represented as without energy, shy of danger, and incapable of spontaneous action or exertion. Herein may perhaps be figured the first symptoms of that degeneracy, mythical or real, in the race of Achæan warriors subsequent to the Trojan war, which, coinciding in the third generation after that event with their expulsion from their native seats by the Dorians, forms the line of distinction between the heroic and the historical age of Greece. That the falling off was understood by Homer to commence in the immediately ensuing stage of descent is implied in a speech of Nestor, where he remarks on the Ithacan prince's want of spirit: II. 276.

οἱ πλέονες κακίους. . . .

In fact, with the single exception of Neoptolemus, not one of the sons or immediate descendants of the heroes of Troy is celebrated, in popular tradition, for warlike genius. The suitors, as sprung from the secondary class of Achæan nobles, are altogether an inferior race. Neoptolemus, being himself within the age which admitted his taking part in the war, might be numbered rather to the contemporaneous than to the subsequent generation. There are however special peculiarities in the case of Telemachus, tending to explain and palliate his inferiority. Deprived in infancy of a father's tuition, he had been educated within a small island, among objects calculated to inspire a taste for tranquil life, by an anxious mother, herself of a gentle disposition, and far more feelingly alive to the dangers to which warfare exposed her objects of affection, than to the glory of success or victory. On approaching manhood he became, with herself, victim of a conspiracy of his father's vassals, by whose systematic oppression whatever spirit he inherited from his ancestors was for a time effectually subdued. Hence, though at heart a noble and generous youth, he appears, up to the moment when his father's return elicits his dormant energies, as remarkable for langour and backwardness as were the youthful heroes of the Trojan war for precocity and spirit.

During the early part of his career therefore, our compassion for his painful lot is mingled with surprise and irritation, that a prince of some twenty years of age should tamely suffer, not himself alone, but his mother, to continue the victim of a base faction, without so much as meditating an effort for her deliverance. One feels provoked to exclaim, as Nestor and his other friends frequently do: Why does he not put his own shoulder to the wheel, instead of querulously longing for his father's return to make good his inactivity? Why does he not rally his own party in the state against the rebels? Why limit his Peloponnesian expedition to a fruitless inquiry after Ulysses, instead of asking from his powerful friends in that country a military force to assist in subduing his treacherous enemies? One evident motive with the poet for thus diluting the character of his youthful hero was to enhance the glory of the father, whose destinies and influence are made the sole pivot on which the fortunes of his kingdom and family depend. Telemachus in fact, from the commencement of his domestic troubles, had been led by his mother to look for his father's eventual reappearance as their only sure, though postponed remedy. This consideration also explains the sudden change which his character seems to undergo on the arrival of Ulysses, into whose daring schemes he enters with ready devotion.

10. Here, as usual, the poet's mode of delineation is purely dramatic. He vouchsafes not a word of description, burthening the youthful hero with the whole duty of exhibiting his foibles through his own language and behaviour. He is first introduced sitting in his paternal hall, an unwilling partaker in its festivities, and "brooding with sad heart on his disappointed hopes of his father's arrival to scatter the audacious crew." Minerva, in the disguise of a stranger chief, an antient friend of Ulysses, appears at the door, and is received by the prince with prompt hospitality. His recapitulation, in a tone of querulous helplessness, of his woes, of his longing for his father's return, and of his despair of doing anything for himself, moves the spleen of his divine guest, and draws forth a smart reflexion on his degenerate spirit:

I. 252.

τὸν δ' ἐπαλαστήσασα προσηύδα Παλλὰς Ἀθήνη·
ὦ πάποι! ἣ δὲ πολλὸν ἀποιχομένου Ὀδυσῆος δεύη. . . .

Urging him in the sequel to avenge his own cause, she taunts his boyish inactivity by a contrast with the different conduct of Orestes: 296.

οὐδέ τί σε χρὴ
νηπιᾶας ὀχέειν· ἐπεὶ οὐκέτι τηλίκος ἐσσί!
ἣ οὐκ αἶψαι οἶον κλέος ἔλλαβε δῖος Ὀρέστης πάντας ἐπ' ἀνθρώπους, ἐπεὶ ἔκτανε πατροφονῆα; . . .
καὶ σὺ, φίλος, μάλα γάρ σ' ὀρώω καλὸν τε μέγαν τε, ἄλκιμος ἔσσι! . .

VOL. I.

E E

He is induced by her remonstrances to assemble the great council of the island, and solicit the public sanction to his proposed voyage to Peloponnesus. His address to the assembly opens in a spirited tone of invective against the usurpers of his rights, but speedily subsides into the usual strain of lamentation over his juvenile incapacity, which here assumes a very characteristic tone of querulous petulance: II. 58.

οὐ γὰρ ἔπ' ἀνὴρ,
οἷος Ὀδυσσεύς ἔσκεν, ἀρὴν ἀπὸ οἴκου ἀμῦναι· . . .
ἦ τ' ἂν ἀμυναίμην, εἴ μοι δύναμις γε παρείη. . . .
νῦν δέ μοι ἀπρήκτους ὀδύνας ἐμβάλλετε θυμῷ.
ὥς φάτο χαόμενος, ποτὶ δὲ σκῆπτρον βάλε γαίῃ,
δάκρυ' ἀναπρήσας. . . .

His introduction to Nestor is an agreeable picture of the bashful ingenuous youth, suddenly finding himself, on first setting out on his travels, in the presence of one of the most illustrious sages of Greece.¹ In his intercourse with the Pylian chief the same morbid diffidence of his own powers is expressed in the same complaining tone which marked his late dialogue with Minerva. Nestor, like the goddess, is surprised that a fullgrown youth, son of such a father, with the example of Orestes before him, and backed by the patronage of Pallas, should tamely put up with oppression and insult; and counsels him to a bold attempt, by his own resources, to reestablish his affairs.² Telemachus is quite bewildered by the magnitude of the proposal, and exclaims: III. 226.

ὦ γέρον, οὐπω τοῦτο ἔπος τελέεσθαι οἶω·
λίην γὰρ μέγα εἶπες! ἄγῃ μ' ἔχει!³ οὐκ ἂν ἔμοιγε
ἐλπομένῳ τὰ γένοιτ', οὐδ' εἰ θεοὶ ὥς ἐθέλοισιν.

This speech provokes the disguised goddess again to denounce the want of spirit, which would distrust not only his own but the divine exertions in his cause. He replies by a request that the subject may be changed: 240.

Μέντορ· μηκέτι ταῦτα λεγώμεθα, κηδόμενοι περ· . . .
 νῦν δ' ἐθέλω ἔπος ἄλλο μεταλλῆσαι καὶ ἔρσθαι.

Ulysses himself, in his mendicant disguise and as yet unrecognised by his son, utters an equally energetic reproof of his unmanly backwardness: XVI. 99. sqq.

αἱ γὰρ ἐγὼν οὕτω νέος εἶην τῶδ' ἐπὶ θυμῷ . . .
 αὐτίκ' ἔπειτ' ἀπ' ἐμεῖο κάρη τάμοι ἀλλότριος φῶς,
 εἰ μὴ ἐγὼ κείνοισι κακὸν πάντεσσι γενοίμην.

From the moment however in which Ulysses discovers himself, the dormant energies of the young hero are rapidly developed, and he ardently co-operates in all his father's hazardous schemes.

In his intercourse with the suitors he shows that, with all his youthful diffidence and timidity, he combined also some of the political talent of Ulysses; and the mode in which the social relations between his oppressors and himself are maintained, with the mutual care to preserve amid mutual hatred a certain outward show of harmony, may be cited among the examples of Homer's tact in working up the details of his plot.¹ The suitors, though barefaced usurpers of their prince's house and goods, are still anxious to be so in the capacity of his own and his mother's guests. They continue therefore, even in outrage and insult, to pay a sort of formal deference to him as landlord. Telemachus, on his side, shows an equally cautious discretion, and, with an occasional remonstrance, is yet contented to fulfil the part of host in the mortifying farce. Almost the only provocations which tempt him to menace open rupture, are the brutal violations of the sacred rites of his domestic hospitality committed by the crew of revellers.¹ The suitors on these occasions, partly from policy partly from contempt, pocket the affront; and in this way the same insolence is successively checked, and the rebuke successively submitted to, each party avoiding to come to extremities.

THE SUITORS.

Characters
of the
suitors.

11. The characters of the suitors offer a variety of the poet's dramatic art peculiar to the Odyssey, that of portraying the more odious features of human nature. In the disposition and habits of this confederacy, the levity of men of pleasure is combined, not, as in the case of the Phæacians, with good-humour and generosity, but with insolence, profligacy, rapacity, and cruelty. They may be considered as representing a class of society with which Homer was still familiar, though gradually becoming obsolete, the race namely of petty tyrants, unworthy scions of heroic stock, whose degenerate habits accelerated the downfall of the old patriarchal system, and the change throughout Greece from monarchical to republican institutions.

The proceedings of the fraternity, amid an indiscriminate course of outrage against all others, are marked by a singular degree of harmony among themselves. Yet the individual members of the gang present much diversity of character. The "ring-

leaders,"¹ Antinoüs and Eurymachus, are the worst of the whole, and ready, should it seem expedient, to shed the blood of their young prince as remorselessly as they ravage his property. They are the chief spokesmen, and organs consequently of that vein of scurrilous drollery which marks the habitual demeanour of the party. In their joyous festivities, their solemn councils, or their murderous plots, every thing becomes matter of jest, often with a lively wit, which though it may offend does not fail to amuse. This combination of waggery and brutality, of ferocity and fun, so characteristic of the same class of persons in every age, is carried through with a tact and consistency bespeaking the same master-hand which gave life to the more pleasing frivolities of the Phæacians. The character of the two leaders, in addition to other odious vices, is stained with base ingratitude. Ulysses, as they themselves admit, had been to them and their families, not only a paternal sovereign but a kind patron and benefactor.² These sacred obligations are however not merely set at nought; like all other subjects they are made matter of ridicule in those ironical professions of friendship with which they attempt, or rather affect, to blind Telemachus to their more outrageous schemes. Detestable as are both characters, there is yet a marked difference in the mode in which their wickedness displays itself, favourable on the whole to Antinoüs. He is, from first to last, the open, reckless, unblushing villain. Eurymachus combines more deceit and hypocrisy with his depravity, and occasionally succeeds in so far disguising it under the mask of better feelings, as partially to impose on both mother and son. These different shades of villany in the two leaders are maintained with unvarying consistency throughout the action of the poem.

Amphinomus.

Such unmitigated depravity, however, was not to be expected in the whole of so numerous a band of young noblemen even of the most licentious habits. Others, of whom Amphinomus¹ may be considered the representative, are exhibited as susceptible of better influences; and, although led away by the pernicious party spirit which animates the fraternity, to acquiesce or to share in the nefarious counsels of their leaders, are ready at times to check the execution of their more atrocious designs. A third class may also be distinguished, of whom Liodes² is the spokesman, comprising mere passive well-intentioned suitors of the queen, whose crime consists chiefly in their connexion with such bad company, and who, though unwilling to abandon their chance of the prize, would, if left to themselves, have been contented honourably to compete for it.

These general remarks on the genius of the association will now be tested by the portions of the text in which it is most prominently exemplified.

Oratory of the suitors.

12. The first speech of Antinöus³ affords a fair specimen of his style of satirical bantering, often pregnant with a savour of wit worthy of a better mouthpiece. Telemachus had been emboldened by his interview with Minerva, to a remonstrance of no very sturdy nature against the usurpation of his domestic rights. The reply of Antinöus is an ironical sneer at the weak points of the prince's character, couched in the form of a complaint of his

domineering spirit, habitually renewed in the sequel. It concludes with a burlesque petition to the gods, "to avert the day when such a sovereign as Telemachus should mount the throne of Ithaca!"

The mock farewell of the party to Telemachus, previous to the voyage which they never suspect he will have the boldness to undertake, is in the same style of insolent drollery. The epithets of overbearing, insulting, and the like (ὑψαγόρη, μένος ἄσχετε, ἡμίας αἰσχύνων), which here, as on other occasions, they ironically select in their addresses to him, are precisely those which least apply to his conduct and most pointedly to their own.¹

In the council held after the failure of their plot to waylay and murder the prince on his voyage homeward, Antinoüs proposes another attempt on his life. Amphinomus objects, and the argument by which he dissuades them is very characteristic:² "To murder a prince of royal blood, without the express authority of the gods, were a terrible impiety. If therefore the gods enjoin the deed, I shall agree, otherwise I protest against it." In the ensuing dialogue between Penelope and Eurymachus, that prince of ruffians, at the very moment when he is plotting against the life of her son, declares, that "should any man venture to raise a hand against his dearest friend Telemachus, the son of the benefactor who had so often dandled him on his knee, and fed him with wine and dainties, that man's blood should flow in torrents from his spear!"³ The whole following scene is admirably worked up, and, amid our disgust at the brutality of Antinoüs, it is impossible not to be amused by the humour of some of his sallies. Such, for example, is the mock lecture which he administers¹ to Eumæus, when the latter introduces Ulysses in mendicant disguise to solicit a few crumbs from their table, on the inconsistency of the old rustic's conduct in thus bringing in hungry vagabonds to consume his master's store, the very same thing for which he was in the habit of blaming himself and comrades. He soon after assails the disguised king in a similar tone of facetious insolence. Ulysses is provoked to retort. Antinoüs in a fury throws a stool at his head. Even his fellow-revellers are scandalised at their leader's violence, and interfere to prevent further outrage. The calm indignation and stern purpose of vengeance, on the part of the hero and his son, are here finely contrasted with the surrounding tumult, in one of those expressive formulæ with which the poet loves to identify the recurrence of any striking image: XVII. 490.²

ἀλλ' ἀκέων κίνησε κάρη, κακὰ βυσσοδομέων.

In the next book the entrance of the beggar Irus ushers in another equally vivid scene of brutal fun and riot. The puerile delight with which the giddy crew hail the quarrel between their two ragged guests as a novel source of diversion, and their alacrity in ranging themselves as backers or bottle-holders of the combatants, are described with a spirit and truth which must strikingly recall to many a reader the follies of his own schoolboy days: XVIII. 36.

ᾧ φίλοι ! οὐ μὲν πῶ τι πάρος τοιοῦτον ἐτύχθη, οἷην τερπωλὴν θεὸς ἤγαγεν ἐς τόδε δῶμα !

 χερσὶ μαχίσασθαι ! ἀλλὰ ξυνελάσσομεν ὥκα.
 ὥς ἔφαθ'· οἱ δ' ἄρα πάντες ἀνήϊξαν γελόωντες. . . .

When the unfortunate beggar is actually stretched bleeding and bellowing on the floor, their merriment is at its height, and "they are ready to die with laughter." Ulysses, who has so much contributed to their diversion, before despised and insulted, is now suddenly admitted into a high degree of favour, which however serves but as a prelude to fresh insult.

Here the farcical tenor of the proceedings is relieved by an impressive scene. Amphinomus had good-humouredly presented the royal mendicant with a cup of wine, adding kind wishes for his future lot. Ulysses, aware of the better feelings of this misguided youth, addresses him in return a friendly remonstrance on the guilt of his present courses, warning him emphatically to flee from the wrath to come. Though deeply smitten by the words of his disguised lord, the ill-starred vassal yet wants strength of mind to break the ties which bind him to the scene of his destruction, but, "shaking his head and foreboding evil," he silently resumes his place among his fellow-victims.

It is now the turn of Eurymachus to take the lead in the course of facetious scurrility and insult, of which Ulysses continues the chief butt, in order, as we are frequently told, "that the full measure of their crime, and his indignation, may be completed against the approaching hour of retribution." This interference of the divine agency is expressed, from time to time, by the recurrence, according to the poet's familiar practice, of the same emphatic form of words : XVIII. 346.

μνηστῆρας δ' οὐ πάμπαν ἀγήνορας εἶα 'Αθήνη
 λώβης ἴσχεσθαι θυμαλγέος, ὅφρ' ἔτι μᾶλλον
 δύη ἄχος κραδίην Λαερτιάδεω 'Οδυσῆος.¹

There is here a plain analogy between Homer's mode of subjecting the moral conduct, as well as the destiny of his actors to the control of the deity, and the mode employed by a still more divinely inspired poet. The "hardening of Pharaoh's heart," for a similar purpose, is expressed by the recurrence of a parallel form of expression.

13. In the banquet of the following day, Theoclymenus the prophetic guest of Telemachus is introduced, and his part in the action relieves the prevailing course of revelry by an appalling scene of preternatural terror.

Ulysses had just been subjected to another practical joke by Ctesippus, to the high entertainment of the party, when the merriment on their faces is suddenly, by the agency of Pallas, "distorted into a ghastly grin. Their eyes fill with tears; their minds with forebodings of a yet dark but terrible future; and the flesh of the animals on which they are feasting appears dripping with gore."² Theoclymenus here takes up the word, and, pointing to the outward change on their persons, proclaims the further omens of their impending fate which, though hidden from their eyes, his spirit of second-sight revealed to his own: "their heads and feet involved in preternatural darkness; wailing and lamentation resounding from their lips; their cheeks streaming with tears, and the walls and roof of the hall with blood; the courts of the palace crowded with ghosts hurrying down to Erebus; the sun darkened in the heavens, and the atmosphere overspread with mist." Eurymachus, who with his companions had in the meantime resumed his previous levity of demeanour, replies in the usual strain of facetious contumely, by ordering the attendants to "conduct the stranger into the open street, since he is so much incommoded by the darkness of their saloon." The prophet calmly replies: "that he has no need of escort; that the eyes which could see, and the mind that could apprehend, the signs of their approaching fate, will safely conduct him from a place so soon to be filled with death and horror." He thus takes his final leave of the scene of action. The revellers, nothing abashed, commence bantering Telemachus on the offensive character of the guests who visit his palace: "first a beggar, and then a croaking prophet." The prince, no longer heedful of their impertinence, sits watching his father's eyes and motions for the signal to commence the work of vengeance.

The catastrophe now rapidly approaches. The trial of archery ensues. The jollity of the victims is kept up to the last moment. The first blow falls on Antinoüs, while holding the festive cup to his lips¹ unconscious of danger. It strikes him in the throat, the organ of his gluttony and insolence, when in the act of swallowing the produce of his destroyer's vineyards. His companions, on seeing him fall, unable to believe there could be willing mischief in the shot, suppose it accidental. No sooner, however, are their eyes opened by the hero's full disclosure of his person and intentions, than the surviving ring-leader Eurymachus, with dastardly effrontery, attempts to exculpate himself and propitiate the wrath of his enemy, by denouncing his fallen colleague as the chief author and instigator of their joint enormities, and by submissive promises of repentance and future good conduct.¹ Perceiving however all hope of mercy to be vain, he dies at last like a scion of heroic stock. Rushing on his adversary with drawn sword and battle shout, he is met and pierced by the fatal shaft, and his body is soon buried under heaps of his slain comrades.

PENELOPE. ANDROMACHE.

Parallel of Penelope
and Andromache.

14. The two heroines selected by Homer as the joint representatives of ideal excellence in female character, the one for the Iliad the other for the Odyssey, are Andromache and Penelope. The qualities of each are fundamentally the same; gentleness, modesty, and tenderness of heart, womanly discretion, and the several virtues of the wife and mother. The native purity of Homer's taste has been signally displayed, in thus excluding from the qualities of his higher class of female characters such as at all savour of masculine spirit. The attempts, so popular with later poets, to form an interesting heroine by combining the boldness of the virago with the softer graces of the woman, may impart vivacity to an action deficient in more genuine portraits of human nature, but can inspire the sound critic or moralist with little sympathy or admiration. It can hardly be supposed that originals for such pictures as

Camilla or Clorinda were wanting in an age when the traditions of Hippolyta and Penthesilea were rife, and among a nation which produced the race of Spartan dames. Homer therefore, it is obvious, has, in the conception of his leading female characters, repudiated these bolder features from choice, not from want of opportunity for their delineation. That this correspondence in the essential attributes of the two heroines arises from no want of the same fertile talent displayed in his male portraits may also be evinced by a glance at the varied characters of Helen, Nausicaa, and Hecuba. Upon the last has been bestowed the small share of masculine sternness which he allows the sex: but even in her person, where it sits so well, it is meant to appear as a blemish, not as an ornament.

The poet has however managed, even in the case of Penelope and Andromache, without any essential modification of his original idea, to impart, through the difference of their lot in life, distinct features of interest to each. The part of Andromache, in the Iliad is one of suffering rather than action. At the commencement of the poem she is the anxious and devotedly affectionate wife, in the catastrophe the mourning widow. The only strong emotions she is called on to display are, tender solicitude for the welfare of her husband and poignant grief for his loss. Her appearances, too, on the scene are rare and brief. Yet there is, perhaps, no heroine in the whole range of poetical fiction who inspires more powerful feelings of admiration and interest; a fine proof of the poet's faculty of imparting life and reality to his actors with the smallest apparent amount of machinery. How striking is her first appearance on the scene! Hearing in the seclusion of her chamber that the tide of battle had turned against her husband, she hurries forth "like one distracted,"¹ followed by her nurse and infant child, to the tower that overlooks the plain. The ensuing interview with Hector, whom she encounters returning to the field on completing his pious errand; her allusions to her previous heavy load of domestic sorrow; to the loss of her father, brothers, and native home, to her husband as supplying the place of all; her supplication, by his love for her and their common offspring, to moderate his valour, and have mercy on a life so dear to every thing most dear to himself, are all of the last degree of tenderness. How beautiful the description of her smiling through her tears, as she receives back the unconscious babe from his father's caresses into her arms; and of the mute suppressed emotion with which, yielding to Hector's gentle reproof for her attempt to weaken the firmness of his patriotism, she submissively retires to indulge her anxieties in solitude! Nor throughout the distressing scenes at the close of the poem, in her outbreak of agony on beholding her husband's corpse mutilated and outraged beneath his native walls, or in her touching lament over it in the sequel, is the meek affliction of this most innocent and sensitive of sufferers alloyed by a single expression of anger or bitterness, even against the hand which had successively bereaved her of father, mother, brother, and husband. Had Andromache combined but a small share of the sternness of the Spartan wife or mother with her anxieties for the safety of Hector, had she uttered a few natural ejaculations of vindictive wrath against his destroyer, the charm which renders her the most angelic and interesting of her sex would at once have been dissolved.

There is this difference in the fate, and by consequence in the conduct of Penelope, that, while Andromache is merely doomed to suffer, the heroine of the Odyssey, under little less severe misfortunes, is also called upon to act. There is however also the somewhat curious analogy, that in each case the all-engrossing objects of solicitude are a husband and an only son. Although the love of Penelope for Ulysses, and her grief for his loss, are as lively as on the day of his departure, she begins to despair of his return. As hope grows fainter from hour to hour, the necessity of some effort to establish her son in his rights forces itself more and more on her attention: but far from encouraging him to resort to violent measures against the usurpers, her great object is to prevent such dangerous schemes from entering his head. If but once assured of the death of Ulysses, she is even ready to offer herself a sacrifice at the altar of peace, by selecting a second husband from the ranks of her persecutors.¹ If she occasionally gives way to expressions of indignation against her unmanly courtiers, they are rarely if ever provoked by her personal sufferings, but solely or chiefly by the wounds inflicted on the honour of her husband or family. In the absence of her lord, the deference due to him is transferred to Telemachus, now arrived at the age which qualified him to inherit his father's rights both public and domestic. The more prominent examples of her implicit acquiescence in his orders are where, after having been tempted by her fears or her interests to descend and take part in the transactions of the palace hall, she is desired by Telemachus to withdraw from society so little congenial to her own feelings. She obeys at once, and in silence. These scenes, in their occasional recurrence, are described in one of the usual graphic formulæ by which the poet loves to individualise events and characters : I. 356.

“ ἄλλ’ εἰς οἶκον ἰοῦσα τὰ σ’ αὐτῆς ἔργα κόμιζε ἰστόν τ’ ἡλακάτην τε, καὶ ἀμφιπόλοισι κέλευε ἔργον ἐποίχεσθαι· μῦθος δ’ ἄνδρεςσι μελήσει πᾶσι, μάλιστα δ’ ἐμοί· τοῦ γὰρ κράτος ἔστ’ ἐνὶ οἴκῳ.”
 ἡ μὲν θαμβήσασα πάλιν οἰκόνδε βεβήκει.

The same lines occur in the Odyssey xxi. 350., and in the Iliad vi. 490. at the close of the interview between Hector and Andromache; with the slight variation required by the circumstances of each case.

The pensive melancholy which forms the habitual tone of Penelope's mind, is similarly dramatised by an appropriate trait expressed in a single recurring form of words. When under the influence of any painful emotion, after some afflicting announcement, or fresh mortification at the hand of her persecutors, she is described as retiring to her chamber, throwing herself on her bed, and weeping over her absent lord and domestic woes until slumber relieves her sorrow. For example, after the scene in which she reproaches Antinoüs with his insidious designs against the life of her son, it is added : xvi. 449.

 κλαῖεν ἔπειτ’ Ὀδυσῆα, φίλον πόσιν, ὃφρα οἱ ὕπνον
 ἡδὺν ἐπὶ βλεφάρῳσι βάλε γλαυκῶπις Ἀθήνη.¹ . . .

15. The subordinate actors of the Odyssey are delineated with the same spirit and propriety as its leading characters. The cottage of the swineherd presents¹ a lively picture of the habits of rustic life, and the better sort of relation betwixt landlord and serf in the poet's age. Eumæus is one in whom gratitude to a beneficent master, if it have not obliterated the recollection of his own early days of freedom, has at least extinguished all desire for a change in his present condition. His patron, and his patron's family, are the objects around which his thoughts and affections are now concentrated, and the favourite theme of his rustic eloquence. His only griefs are the prolonged absence and supposed death of Ulysses, and the domestic distress of the royal house; his only cares to husband his master's store, cherish his memory, and long for his return. His hospitality to the afflicted wanderer is prompted even more by his desire to support the credit of his lord's establishment, than by his own benevolent disposition.

In the treacherous goatherd Melanthius, on the other hand, we have to the life the base-born, low-minded, rustic blackguard, whose brutal conduct and scurrilous tongue made him a fit partisan and associate of the faction whose cause he had espoused.² The affectionate, and at times officious zeal of the faithful old nurse Euryclea, or the housekeeper Eurynome, is equally well contrasted with the insolent levity of the wanton Melantho. Nor can there be a more spirited portrait than that presented in the beggar Irus, of the lazy idle vagabond, or of the bully and sycophant, blusterer and coward, united in such a character. The poet's faculty of individualising his actors equally displays itself where there is the least apparent intention or opportunity, even where they extend beyond the pale of human nature. The mutineer Eurylochus, the poor sluggard Elpenor, the seer Theoclymenus, the enchantress Circe, the monster Polyphemus, Æolus, Proteus, and the Læstrygonian ogres, are all instinctively, as it were, assigned their place in the imagination, under some proper variety of person and conduct.

Nestor.
Menelaus.
Helen.

Among the internal evidences of unity of origin in the two poems, attention has already been drawn to the close similarity of the mode in which their author's faculty of conceiving and representing human nature, under every difference of scene and subject, is displayed in each. That similarity is, perhaps, most delicately exemplified in certain pairs of characters belonging one to each poem, between whose lot, or the parts they are made to perform, there happens to be some analogy. The parallel of Penelope and Andromache has already been considered. There is, also, little difficulty in recognising in the beggar Irus the hand which delineated Thersites, or in the placid gossip of Eumæus the dramatic skill which animates the more dignified loquacity of Nestor. Ulysses indeed, in his assumed character of veteran warrior, exhibits the peculiarities of the old Pylian hero, even to certain idiomatic turns of his oratory, with a fidelity which, free from all suspicion of imitation, seems to guarantee the two portraits as works of the same master.¹ A similar inference results from the consistency with which the characters of the Iliad are reproduced in the Odyssey. This point has already been illustrated in the case of Menelaus. The distinctive qualities assigned to that hero in the Iliad, whether in his personal capacity or his relation to his fellow-chiefs, re-appear in the Odyssey in such precisely identical colours, as to leave no room for doubt that the author of each poem, whether the same or different, had, at least, the very same prototype present to his mind.¹ The remark applies with more or less force to Ulysses, Nestor, and Helen. The examples of Menelaus and Ulysses are important in a historical point of view, from the refutation they afford of a popular doctrine of the Separatist school, which would account for the harmony of characters, facts, and style in the two poems, by a corresponding unity in the genius at large of the primitive epic minstrelsy. Upon this principle, the same harmony would be observable in the works of other accredited organs of that genius. But the reverse is notoriously the case; both these heroes being invested by the remaining poets of the Epic cycle, or the Attic dramatists who borrow from them, with very different and very degrading attributes.²

Nestor, even during his short appearance on the scene, has time to display the same essential peculiarities which distinguish him in the camp before Troy; the same benevolence, cheerfulness of temper, and frankness of demeanour; the same affectionate familiarity with youth; the same love of conversation and good cheer; the same fluency of oratory, with the same tendency to wander from the immediate subject of discourse, on his own topics of egotistic enlargement.¹

The Helen of the Odyssey, reconciled to her home and husband, is the same Helen whom we knew in the Iliad as the paramour of Paris, under such small degree of variety as was warranted by change of destiny and lapse of time. Although described as still beautiful, her person and manners are shaded by a veil of matronly gravity, to be expected after an interval of ten years, and under such altered circumstances. She is distinguished by the same elegance and courtesy, and the same voluptuous habits. She enters the hall of the Spartan palace² with a pomp of female luxury never assigned by Homer to any other heroine, preceded by three waiting-maids, one bearing her throne, another soft rugs or cushions, a third her richly stored silver work-basket. In the course of the dialogue, there appears the same mixture as formerly of self-reproach and easy indifference, in her allusions to her past conduct; while the longing after her first husband and native land, which in the Iliad also occasionally came over her mind, is here described by herself as having, towards the close of the war, so grown upon her, as to render her as false to the cause of the Trojans as she had formerly been to the bed of Menelaus.³ A curious trait of primitive luxury, which the poet, with a fine adaptation to her character and habits, obviously therefore not without some moral signification, has attributed to her⁴, is the use of a drug calculated to banish thought, and promote oblivion of past or indifference to present subjects of vexation. This drug was a present from the queen of Egypt, whose court she had recently visited with her husband. The view of some commentators that it was opium, used in the East, as they suppose, from time immemorial as at this day for the same purpose, is certainly not devoid of probability.

1. THE analysis of the plan and structure of each poem, in so far as bearing on the question of their authorship, has hitherto been limited solely or chiefly to their internal evidence of unity and consistency. It remains to consider those incongruities to which so great importance has been attached as arguments on the opposite side. That many such discrepancies do exist, is undeniable; and the mere adduction of a certain amount of them has, in many quarters, been considered as an adequate triumph of the ingenuity of the critic over the unity of the poet. Nor have the adherents of the old opinion ventured by any bold line of criticism to impugn such inferences. They have usually been satisfied either with attempting by subtle explanations to strain palpable discordances into harmony, or with accounting for them by interpolation or corruption; expedients which tend, in fact, but to strengthen the case of their opponents. The subject will here be taken up on broader principles, involving considerations of no small moment, as affecting not merely an insulated point of Homeric criticism, but the genius at large of epic poetry in every stage of its cultivation.

The first question which here presents itself, and one of momentous bearing on the whole inquiry, is : How stands the case with regard to other epic authors, and what would be the consequence of an equally rigorous enforcement in their case of the same tests applied to Homer ? It would require no very rigid scrutiny of many an elaborate poem of modern times, which it were absurd to doubt is, in its integrity, the genuine work of the author whose name it bears, to satisfy any impartial reader that such anomalies are much more frequently the result of oversight, of the contempt of genius for petty details, or even of wilful intention on the part of a single poet, than of that discordance which marks the operations of many. The action of the Æneid, to select the example most apposite in the eyes of the classical student, presents incoherences and self-contradictions far surpassing, both in number and degree, the utmost that have ever been detected in either Iliad or Odyssey. The same holds good, to a greater or less extent, not only of Dante, Milton, and probably every other great poet, but of many a standard prose writer, sacred and profane.¹ Before therefore such anomalies can supply ground for any legitimate inference, it must be established upon some sound principle, what portion of them in any given case is to be ascribed to the one, and what to the other, of the two classes of causes above specified. As preliminary to any such inquiry, another no less important question offers itself: Whether the Iliad and Odyssey are to be judged in this particular by the same law as any similar work of historical times, or by certain by-laws applicable to them alone? To this question there can be but one answer in any reasonable quarter: that the same rule ought to be applied to all; or that, if any exception be made, the strongest claim to indulgence belongs to the poet of a period least provided with technical aids to accurate composition. If then it can be proved, by the same internal criteria as would be valid in regard to Virgil or Dante, that the anomalies of Homer are, in a large number of cases, such as cannot reasonably be explained otherwise than by the purely personal class of causes, we are in some measure precluded, by the fundamental law that every author is his own best interpreter, from judging other cases, where possibly the same criteria may not exist, by any more subtle rule.

Example
Odyssey.

2. In order to have the general question more tangibly before us, it may be proper, by an illustrative example, to form some clear estimate of the mode or extent in which the peculiarity here under review is observable in the structure of either poem. The example about to be selected is one generally held to be the most intractable, even by the keenest defenders of Homer's unity. It occurs in the Odyssey, in the comparative chronology of two parallel courses of the action: the journey of Telemachus, and the voyage of Ulysses from Calypso's island. Telemachus starts on the evening of the second day after the poem opens, with the intention of being back in Ithaca on the twelfth at furthest.¹ He arrives on the morning of the third day at Pylos, and on the evening of the fifth at Sparta, where the poet leaves him on the morning of the sixth, to return to the affairs of Ithaca. In his conversation with Menelaus on that morning, the young hero is pressed to remain ten or twelve days at Sparta. This invitation he declines, adding that he would willingly spend a year there, but that his companions whom he had left at Pylos were already impatient for his return.¹ The next book takes up the history of Ulysses. Mercury is dispatched to Calypso's island, on the next day at soonest, it may be presumed, after that on which we parted from Telemachus; the seventh, consequently, from the opening of the poem. The raft of Ulysses is ready on the fourth² day afterwards (the 11th from the commencement). He sails seventeen days (28th); on the eighteenth (29th) his raft is destroyed.³ After being tossed on the waves two whole days⁴, he reaches the island of Scheria on the third (32nd). He remains there three days⁵ (35th), and on the fourth is landed on his native island⁶; the 25th since parting from Calypso, and the 36th from the opening of the poem.

Now Telemachus does not reach Ithaca, on his return, until the day after his father, the thirty-seventh of the poem, and the thirty-sixth since his own departure from home. He had, therefore, been absent three times the period originally promised. We left him at Sparta on the sixth day, determined to return home forthwith; add three days for his journey and voyage, deduct the nine from the whole thirty-seven, and it results that he had remained twenty-eight days with Menelaus, more than double the twelve proposed by that hero and declined by himself. He had consequently kept his companions, formerly described as so anxious for his return, together with his borrowed ship, lying off the coast of Pylos a whole lunar month. Here then is a very palpable discordance, perhaps the most important in the text of either poem, and which has therefore been very plausibly adduced as an argument of original disconnexion between these two portions of the Odyssey.

The validity of any such inference must, however, depend on another consideration of no small importance as affecting this and other similar cases of anomaly: Whether they be less compatible with the genius of a single poet, ranging with the native freedom of a lively imagination over an extensive subject, than with the cautious artifice of the professional bookmakers whom the modern theory substitutes in his place? Considering the wonderful ingenuity displayed by these supposed amalgamators of discordant materials, the pains they must have been at to soften down so many discrepancies of fact or allusion, to connect by mutual references so many petty incidents, even where the absence of such mechanical links would never have been felt, is it likely, or even possible, that they would have overlooked an error of eight-and-twenty days in the chronology of a narrative the whole duration of which does not exceed forty? The functions of these supposed compilers were obviously, as regards mere mechanical combination, equivalent to those of original authors. Their productions were as much entitled to the credit of original design, as any modern Roman building constructed by Vignola or Fontana with columns and cornices supplied by the ruins of antient edifices. It were quite as probable that one of those artists would have been contented, in the adjustment of his borrowed masonry, to place a Corinthian and Ionic capital side by side in the same series, as that such a blunder as that above noticed would have been left uncorrected by the masters of the Pisistratian school of patchwork epic architecture.

This consideration goes far to vitiate, in its source, the whole train of sceptical reasoning usually resorted to in such cases. The introduction, for example, of warriors severely wounded on one day, fresh and vigorous on the next, or even on the same, is a license, and no small one certainly, of familiar occurrence in the Iliad. A critical study of the text, however, evinces it to be one inherent in the spirit of the old epic muse, and as inseparable from the subordinate parts into which it is proposed to subdivide the poem as from its collective integrity. But even setting aside this fact, were such license more compatible with the cautious artifice of a bookmaker than with the genius of an original author, in a narrative working throughout on supernatural mechanism? Compilers of such tact and skill as those here in question would never surely have ventured, without some precedent in the usage of epic art, arbitrarily to introduce, in a poem which they were about to offer as the most finished specimen of that art, a novelty calculated to shock either the judgement or the taste of their public.

3. It is an old and sound remark¹, that faultless precision of detail is the attribute of mediocrity; anomaly the invariable characteristic of the higher order of genius in every branch of imitative art. Among the modes in which that anomaly displays itself in poetry is a disregard of the strict rules of narrative probability, especially where likely to interfere with the general effect of a composition. Similar violations of rigid truth or nature are often observable in the works of the great antient sculptors and modern Italian painters, even in those where the general result is most to be admired. Here, a shadow is made to fall on objects which, on strictly optical principles, it would not have reached; there, a figure filling up a space in the grouping of the background is larger or smaller, more or less distinct, than the strict rules of perspective enjoin.¹ Such license, in the abstract, cannot, it is true, be defended. It may, therefore, in so far, be subject of regret that Homer or Raphael should yield to artists of an inferior order in the mechanical adjustment of their works. It must however also be remembered, that had they been equally scrupulous, they would not have been Homer or Raphael, nor should we have had either an Iliad or a Transfiguration. Our limited knowledge of the higher economy of creation enables us to perceive the fact, though not to assign the cause, why so much in the visible works of nature which appears to us defective may yet be so connected with acknowledged advantages as to be indispensable to their existence. We often see a countenance in the individual features of which no actual blemish can be detected, but where we are as little struck by any beauty; on the other hand one is apt, on beholding a handsome face combining certain irregularities of feature, to imagine that by slightly varying its lineaments, by adding length or fulness in one part, or subtracting it in another, perfection would be the result. But, could the alterations be effected, they would probably but tend to prove how inferior the work of "nature's journeyman" was to her own; and, undoubtedly, the same secret blending of imperfection and excellence in the parts is as essential to aggregate beauty in the works of human genius as in those of nature.

This principle has been distinctly seen and laid down by both Aristotle¹ and Longinus.² Among the various classes of anomaly which it involves, that here in question has been comprehended by the former critic under what he defines, in scarce translatable phraseology, as the "Imitation of the Impossible." In the abstract he observes it cannot be defended, but is to be excused or even admired, where tending to enhance the general effect of a work. For illustration of the rule he appeals, as usual, to Homer; and one of the examples cited will be noticed in the sequel. In fact, one of the most remarkable of the poet's talents is this very one of making even discordances of detail contribute to general harmony of effect. Hence it is that such blemishes, palpable as they often are, have rarely been observed, still less condemned by those who judge the Iliad and Odyssey in the true spirit of their author. Nor, in the whole range of subtleties in which successive schools of Homeric criticism have indulged, is there one more fallacious or pernicious than the practice, lately so much in vogue, of picking petty flaws and holes in the mechanical structure of the poems, while all their grander features of moral and poetical harmony are overlooked. Against such an ordeal, no epic composition, even if indited by the pen of Calliope herself, could stand for a moment.

4. Admitting however, that such anomalies may proceed as well from the inadvertence, or even artifice, of a single poet, as from patchwork or interpolation, the question naturally arises: What are the criteria for ascribing those discernible in Homer's text to the one rather than the other class of causes? They are to be sought partly in the internal structure of the text itself, partly in the tenor of those same commentaries where the above distinction has been confounded. The discordances in question occur, in more or less palpable form, not only in the integral, and as regards subject or space least connected heads of narrative, but also in contiguous passages; and are often so closely interwoven with the minutest fibres of the text, as to be essential to the very pith and substance, not merely of its historical import, but of its syntactical structure. The cases, however, to which importance has been attached by the advocates of primitive non-integrity, are confined solely or chiefly to the former class, while the latter are either overlooked, or noticed as mere eccentricities of the poet or poets from whom the separate rhapsodies are supposed to emanate. But it is not easy to see upon what principle this method can be justified; or how so fatal an importance can be ascribed to discordances occurring at wide intervals, and where oversight were both natural and excusable, while the same irregularities, in a more glaring position of contiguity, pass unheeded. The only apparent ground of the distinction is, that the one class of examples supplied the sceptical doctrine with arguments possessing an outward show of plausibility, while a similar inference extended to the other would equally annihilate the textual integrity of the supposed separate elements, cutting them up into such shreds and patches as would have been found impracticable materials for the ingenuity even of the artificial compiler. Here there is an inconsistency on the part of the commentators quite equal to any imputed to the text, and which can only be avoided by the more logical conclusion, that the same peculiarities occurring throughout the same work, in the same forms, originate in the same cause, anomaly of genius in the same author.

The cases now about to be quoted may be classed under two heads. The one comprises incongruities to all appearance intentional, where Homer's object seems to have been, with a disregard or even a wilful violation of rigid consistency, to produce a certain poetical effect, or obtain a wider field for the exercise of his inventive powers; the remainder are such as seem to be altogether involuntary, resulting from the natural contempt of genius for minor details. The usual custom would here enjoin that precedence should be given to the text of the Iliad; but the example already selected as the basis of illustration having been derived from the Odyssey, it will be preferable to carry on the analysis in the first instance through the remainder of the same work.

Telemachus.

5. Among the integral subdivisions of the poem set apart in the popular theories on the subject as originally independent compositions, one of the most important is the description of the voyage of Telemachus to Peloponnesus, comprising the four opening books down to verse 624. of Delta. The young hero announces his intention in a public assembly of the citizens, and asks a vessel from the suitors, which is insolently refused. He afterwards borrows one from his friend Noëmon, and mans it with a select body of Ithacan youths. He then takes a formal leave of the suitors, informing them at the same time of his having elsewhere procured the means of transport to Pylos, and that the object of his voyage was to concert means for their destruction. In their reply they again turn his project into ridicule.¹ He next communicates his intentions to the old housekeeper of the palace, Euryclea², binding her by an oath to keep his absence secret from his mother until his return, or until a lapse of ten or twelve days from the date of his departure.³ Now let us consider what a tissue of anomalies is here. What can be more inconsistent than the conduct of Telemachus, in formally apprising the suitors, who had just before discountenanced his voyage, of the arrangements he had made to carry it into effect in spite of them, telling them also plainly that their own lives were at stake in the matter? It was little else than an invitation to them to arrest his person. In the next place, is it credible that a project proclaimed aloud by himself in the national assembly and the palace hall, a project already, like all other topics, matter of scurrilous jest with the suitors, should have remained a mystery to the housekeeper of the palace until announced to her, under a vow of secrecy too, by her young master? What more unaccountable than that Telemachus, after the pains he had taken to make the thing notorious to the whole town, after having, without any vow of secrecy, manned his vessel with twenty young citizens, whose friends must all have been privy to the affair, should yet have been such a simpleton as to believe, that the swearing in of a single old woman to silence would keep his departure secret from an anxious mother during a fortnight's absence, and amid the incessant gossiping of which she and her concerns were the principal butt on the part of the suitors and their adherents? Upon Wolfian principles, it is plain, that neither the passages in which Telemachus bids adieu to the suitors, nor that where he swears in Euryclea, could be by the author of the council-scene or of the previous account of the prince's conduct. The text however is here intractable, and the anomaly has been overlooked. In the sequel the case becomes worse. During several days, not only Penelope but the suitors are represented altogether ignorant of the expedition, until Noëmon, standing in need of his vessel, applies to them for information as to the probable time of the prince's return, in the very natural confidence that they must be cognizant of his motions. But they are as much amazed as if they had never heard a syllable of the matter, and inquire with much anxiety into the circumstances of his departure, "having been all along under the impression that he was gone into the country to look after his farm!"¹ All this incongruity appears the more glaring, when it is considered how easily it might have been avoided. The young hero might have been made, preserving silence in public, first to sound the suitors as to their acquiescence in his voyage. On discovering their repugnance to it, he might have said no more on the subject for the present, but, affecting to abandon his scheme and to be really going into the country for a week, might have secretly borrowed his vessel and taken his other measures without risk of detection. In this way, both his exaction of the vow from Euryclea, and the subsequent ignorance of his mother and the suitors, would have been quite natural.

The question then occurs, How can Homer, either as author of the whole Odyssey or of this particular rhapsody, be justified in such a disregard of probability? The answer is, first, that no unprejudiced reader probably has ever been offended by his mode of management; and secondly, that the more precise method above suggested might have been less conducive to the general effect of the poem. The prince's announcement of his project in the public assembly, with his request of a ship so contemptuously treated by the suitors, gives a spirited turn to the debate. Their subsequent indifference to so really important a matter, of which they had been so formally warned, supplies some graphic touches both to their own character and that of Telemachus, who, hitherto a quiet passive youth, had appeared to them incapable of venturing on any bold step for the assertion of his rights. Hence the contempt with which they treat his proposed voyage as but an innocent bravado, and their amazement on discovering its actual execution, are valuable ingredients of the ethic spirit of the Odyssey. That the publicity given to the expedition was incompatible with ignorance on the part of the servants and other secondary personages, cannot here enter into consideration. It is a fundamental principle of Greek poetry, epic as well as dramatic, and one largely exemplified in both Iliad and Odyssey, that none but the leading personages shall be entitled to know more or less of what is going on than suits the poet's convenience. Hence, on the Attic stage, by an exaggeration of this principle, all the secrets of the plot are intrusted to the chorus, which is often a body of females of the middle class, representing consequently the most loquacious and least trustworthy portion of the community; and on the modern theatre, under the rubric "aside," remarks are made within a few yards of the person from whom they are supposed to be kept secret, in a voice which would suit the commander of a battalion. To these partial inconsistencies the Greek audience, in its day, submitted, as does our own at the present, in consideration of advantages only to be obtained at their expense. By a parallel species of license, it is here assumed that the Ithacan public, in the vulgar sense, are not privileged to interfere. The poet has thus obtained a further opening for several interesting scenes: first, between Telemachus and his faithful old nurse, and afterwards between her and Penelope, when the truth is at last revealed to the queen. This crisis is brought about through the medium of

drama.

Noëmon, the lender of the vessel, and in so far a principal in the transaction, but who, a discreet and reserved person as his name denotes, had hitherto remained in the background, until under the pressure of his own affairs he applies to the suitors for intelligence; and thus, by the proper epic agency, the case becomes too notorious for either them or the queen to remain any longer in the dark.

Eurylochus in the
Circe.

6. This privilege of the epic art applies, not merely to ignorance but to knowledge, which will also be found, in numerous cases, to exist or be wanting at the discretion of the poet. For example, on landing on the island of Circe, Ulysses sends a party, headed by his lieutenant Eurylochus, to explore the country.¹ On their approaching the dwelling of the sorceress, she appears at the door and invites them to partake of her hospitality. All enter, with the exception of the leader, who suspected treachery. The party within are converted by their landlady into hogs. Eurylochus remains awhile expecting their reappearance, but in vain. He then returns, greatly alarmed, and reports them missing to his chief. Ulysses determines himself to go in quest of them, and orders Eurylochus to act as his guide, who, not yet recovered from his fright, refuses. The hero proceeds alone, defeats the arts of the sorceress, and returns to the vessel to bring up the rest of the crew to her palace. On his arrival the men surround him, eager to learn the fate of their comrades. He bids them, drily, put their equipage in order, and come themselves to see and partake of the good cheer that awaits them. Upon this Eurylochus interposes, and strongly dissuades them from obedience, assuring them that "the sorceress will convert them also into hogs or wild beasts."¹ Here then Eurylochus is suddenly inspired with a knowledge of the previous fate of his own detachment, which no part of the text admits of his having obtained by natural means. He had not seen what happened. The terror he displayed on returning to the ship was but the foreboding of some mysterious evil; nor, had he been privy to the real cause of his men's detention, could he have limited his report to a simple statement of their not being forthcoming. His knowledge therefore is evidently but an afterthought of Homer, introductory to the scene that followed, and supplying a few additional touches to the character of the mutinous lieutenant, a personage of some importance among the second-rate heroes of the Odyssey.

7. Another case which, from the more favourable arrangement of the text, has afforded a readier handle to casuistry, occurs in the variations made by the disguised Ulysses in the personal narratives with which he successively entertains Eumæus, the suitors, and Penelope. These passages are richly illustrative, not only of the conventional knowledge or ignorance authorised by epic usage, but of the hero's ready talent for dissimulation, and the spirit of comic humour which runs through the action of the poem. In every emergency he has at once a new and plausible version of his life and adventures at command, adapted to the circumstances of the case or the dress he has assumed. When accosted by Minerva, in her disguise of a shepherd boy, on first awakening from the sleep in which he had been deposited on his native coast, ignorant where he is, he inquires the name of the country. When told that he is in Ithaca, he is almost overpowered with joy, but suppressing all outward demonstration gravely replies, "that he had heard indeed of such an island in his own native land of Crete, but had never expected to visit it." He then enters on a fictitious account of his life, and the manner of his transport to this strange country.¹ His patroness hears him patiently to the end, and then, discovering herself, banters him on his unrivalled talent for the arts of intrigue.

On reaching the hut of Eumæus in his new character of mendicant, a longer and more varied series of fictions is required to amuse his host.² Little of his previous matter of fact is retained but his Cretan origin and certain exploits in the Trojan war. The additions comprise a predatory voyage to Egypt, and sundry adventures in Lybia, Phœnicia, and Epirus.

In the suitor's hall this account is again partly repeated, partly varied.³ His captivity in Egypt still forms the basis of the narrative, but the details are different.

Penelope, on the other hand, in their midnight interview⁴, is favoured with another version of the Cretan story formerly told to Minerva. On this occasion, no longer content with the humble capacity in which he had previously figured as natural son of a Cretan nobleman, he has the boldness to announce himself a brother of king Idomeneus.

This spirited series of fictions, so characteristic of the genius of the poem, so replete with the liveliest features of Homeric style, has yet been stigmatised by modern hypercriticism as interpolation or patchwork, and on the very ground which constitutes a chief part of its value: that the different accounts contradict each other! that it is "improbable," forsooth, "the beggar should address conflicting stories to the different members of the household, because, by communicating among themselves, they might have detected his self-contradictions."¹ Had Homer been obtuse enough, from any such considerations, to obtrude again and again the same hackneyed tale upon his audience, he would be as little entitled to the praise bestowed by Aristotle on his own inventive genius, as his hero would deserve the like compliment paid him by his patroness Minerva.

In the Phæacian palace this talent for innocent fibbing is still more broadly exemplified. When Alcinoüs reproves his daughter for want of hospitality, in not at once conducting the stranger from his landing-place to the palace, Ulysses vindicates her by an assurance that she had pressed him to accompany her, but that he, from modesty, had loitered behind.² The fact as previously narrated is the very reverse. The hero, noway disinclined to her escort, had postponed his entry into the city by her express order.³ His reply, evidently, is just what occurred to him at the moment to get his fair benefactress out of a scrape.

That this spirit of ready pretext was common to the Laërtian royal family, appears from another similar expedient on the part of Telemachus. While still an inmate in the palace of Menelaus, he is warned by Minerva in a dream to return home forthwith, for that his mother had consented to espouse Eury-machus⁴, and that his presence is urgently required to look after his own interests. The next morning, when Menelaus inquires the cause of such haste, Telemachus answers simply, that he has become anxious about the management of his property at home during his long absence.¹ Any mention of his vision or his mother's marriage, by exciting curiosity, might have involved delay; he therefore seizes the first pretext that offers, as a means of effecting his escape. Nor, on his arrival in Ithaca, does he express the least surprise at finding matters exactly in the same position as when he left home.

8. The preceding examples have been limited chiefly to cases where the anomaly appears more or less intentional on the poet's part. In the following it may be attributed solely to oversight or inadvertence.

His dialogue with the Cyclops;

Ulysses, on escaping from Polyphemus, pushes off his vessel "as far from the shore as a man's voice could be heard,"² and then triumphantly taunts his baffled enemy. The giant, in return, hurls a fragment of rock in the direction of the ship, which narrowly escapes destruction. The hero, nothing daunted, rows out to a distance "double that at which he uttered his first address," and again gives vent to his reproaches, to which Polyphemus again replies. The question, then, is: How could this second harangue reach the ears of the giant, if uttered at twice as great a distance as a man's voice could be heard?

Eumæus,

When Ulysses, in the hut of Eumæus, complains of cold, and asks for the loan of a blanket, the swineherd is made to remark in reply, that "in his establishment each man had but a single blanket for his own use." Six lines afterwards he is described as lending his guest "one both large and warm, which he always kept by him for a change, or for extra covering in very cold weather."¹

The account of the hero's arrival and reception in Scheria offers a most curious succession of glaring discordances, which yet, owing to the impracticability of the context, has never given serious umbrage in sceptical quarters. In the first place, the poet and his hero between them are guilty of making the sun set at least twice in one day. Ulysses in his narrative to Arete says, that on awakening from his slumber in the bush, "after the sun had gone down,"² he descried Nausicaa with her maidens playing on the beach. The poet, however, in his own previous account of the same events³, informs us that the sun set on that evening just before the party reached the grove of Minerva, several hours after it had disappeared according to his hero, allowing a reasonable time for the journey and other intermediate transactions. Aristarchus proposed to smooth down this difficulty⁴, very arbitrarily as well as unnecessarily, by altering the text. But even this remedy would be inadequate to the disease, for the sequel gives a virtual contradiction to both passages. Although Ulysses does not proceed from the grove to the city until after another considerable interval, consequently until after complete darkness must have spread over the land, yet the whole account of his entry implies it to have taken place in broad daylight. Not only was Pallas obliged to cover her favourite with a cloud, to preserve him from the impertinence of the populace, but he was himself able to take a minute survey of the objects of curiosity on his walk ; of the port and arsenal ; of the external ornaments of the palace ; the fruit trees, flower-beds, and fountains of the royal gardens. The mode in which this tissue of petty incongruities is interwoven with the nicest fibres of the text is not only such as to exclude the possibility of a solution, but amounts to a literary curiosity ; for the same sentence which describes the hero as gazing with admiration on the brilliant objects that adorned the exterior of the royal residence, introduces him into the banqueting-hall, where he finds Alcinoüs and his guests engaged in the usual solemnities before retiring to bed.¹

chus from Sparta.

9. Let us now return for a moment to the more serious chronological discrepancy from which we originally set out, and inquire how far it may be explained by the same twofold peculiarity of the poet's genius, a disregard of minute details, and a readiness to sacrifice them to poetical effect. Homer had undertaken to interweave the adventures of Telemachus with those of Ulysses, in the relation to each other of principal subject and episode. Telemachus is first sent to Pylos and Sparta. The circumstances under which his voyage takes place, with the state in which he left his mother and household, require that his excursion should be speedily performed, or at least that he should set out with the intention of using expedition. This intention is adhered to up to the moment when we leave him to attend to the affairs of his father. Here a different mode of management was required. Whether in deference to the popular legend, or from the poet's desire to magnify the adventures of Ulysses, nearly a lunar month is devoted to the voyage of that hero from Calypso's isle to Ithaca. In resuming the history of Telemachus therefore, either a tacit anomaly was unavoidable, or his previous arrangement must have been varied, in order to bring his course into chronological harmony with that of his father. This alternative, it seems, whether from oversight or indifference, did not occur to the poet; and he has allowed the case to remain as it stood, leaving us to explain it as we best can. It may be observed however, that although there is discordance there is here no actual self-contradiction. The inconsistency results merely from the reliance which the reader is led to place, naturally enough no doubt, on the previously expressed intention of Telemachus to return speedily. We are at least at liberty to imagine that Menelaus had found means in the interval to persuade him to remain three weeks instead of three days. The narrative of the visit, as resumed in the fifteenth book, implies indeed this alteration of plan. Neither the remonstrance of Pallas at his long delay, nor her account (which, though false, seemed true to the prince,) of the momentous change in his domestic affairs, appear compatible with an adherence to his original intention of remaining but a week or ten days from home.

It may be remarked, in further illustration of the chronological discrepancy in the voyage of Telemachus, that the computation of time throughout the Odyssey, with its greater variety of events and localities, has no pretensions to that regular and progressive accuracy observable in the Iliad.¹ Discordances of a similar, though less glaring, nature exist in other cases, where the structure of the text still more effectually excludes any sceptical inference. For example, on the night of the disguised hero's arrival in the hut of Eumæus, its inmates are sent to bed with the usual formalities.¹ That same night Telemachus, still at Sparta, is warned by Minerva in a vision to return home.² He sets out at daybreak, and, after a journey by land and sea of two days and nights, reaches the coast of Ithaca on the third morning. During his voyage we leave him³, and rejoin the party in the hut, who are found at dinner on the day after that on which they had been sent to bed. They again retire⁴ to rest, and we return to Telemachus, who lands, and leaving his vessel on the shore walks up and joins his father at breakfast in the hut⁵, on the third day after the arrival of Ulysses in the island, according to the chronology of his own adventures, but on the fourth according to that of his son's. The reckoning stands as follows:—

ULYSSES.	TELEMACHUS.
First night in the hut =	First night at Sparta.
Second night in the hut =	{ Second night at Pheræ.
	{ Third night at sea.
Third night in the hut =	Fourth night in the hut. ⁶

Nitzsch (Erklär. Anmkk. Bd. ii. S. liii.) would evade this incongruity, by assuming that Pallas appeared in vision to Telemachus at a later hour of the same morning on which her interview with Ulysses took place in the cave of the nymphs. This were out of Scylla into Charybdis; and as the poet has already been convicted of making the sun set twice in the same evening, he would here make it rise twice in the same morning.

Throughout the poem, it is said that Ulysses returned home on the tenth year after the fall of Troy, the twentieth after his own departure from Ithaca. But the chronology of his vicissitudes since the siege does not bear out that statement. He describes himself as having been detained seven years in the isle of Calypso¹ and one in that of Circe.² Add about seven months, as the sum of the lesser portions of time to be collected from the ninth to the twelfth books inclusive, the result does not exceed eight years and seven months. Let us now turn to the Iliad.

10. Several cases of incongruity have already been incidentally cited³ from the opening scenes of that poem, consisting in a certain accumulation of preliminary details at the expense of strict historical order, with the apparent object of laying a broader foundation for the ensuing narrative. These cases may be numbered to the class above described as originating in design rather than oversight. Such is the advice given by Nestor to Agamemnon in council as to the mode of marshalling his army; advice which, however appropriate it might have been in the first year of the war, was, historically speaking, quite out of place in the tenth. Such is the like injunction of Iris, disguised as Polites, to Priam, with her report relative to the advance and appearance of the Greek host. Another somewhat similar example is here subjoined.

Anomalies
of the Iliad.

During the nine years of the war previous to the quarrel of the chiefs, the Greek fleet and camp are

Fortification of the camp.

Minerva is plainly described as parting from Ulysses in broad daylight (xiii. 189. 344. sqq.): while it is distinctly stated (xv. 8. 49. sq.) that her subsequent appearance to his son was during the nighttime.

represented as having remained unprotected by any species of entrenchment, on an open coast, in the midst of a hostile country, under the poetical pretext that the terror of Achilles was a safeguard against hostile aggression.¹ The historical insufficiency of this pretext is obvious. Had every one of the 100,000 men who composed the host been an Achilles, their united valour would have been unavailing against the enterprise of a few daring peasants, armed with a tinder-box and favoured by a dark night and a scirocco wind. But setting this aside, it is further said that Achilles was occasionally absent for weeks² together, by sea and land, ravaging the country or besieging the towns of Priam's Asiatic allies. Why then, it may be asked, did the Trojans neglect these opportunities of attacking the enemy in his quarters, and setting fire to his tents and ships? The construction of the rampart belongs, therefore, historically, to the first year of the war.³ Yet the details of every portion of the poem so incontestably prove its poetical connexion with the tenth, as completely to exclude every species of sceptical inference. That a camp protected by Achilles should require no artificial defence was essential to the heroic grandeur of his character. The construction of the rampart, on the other hand, after his secession, was both an additional homage to his glory, and necessary to the future conduct of the poem; to relieve the monotony of a series of field

The knowledge which the Trojans are from the first assumed to possess of the quarrel of the chiefs, the secession of Achilles, and other transactions in the Greek camp, is altogether conventional. The text contains not a hint at the time or mode in which they obtained the information, or at the consequent change of tactics on their own side. In these details, the more methodical spirit of the modern Muse would have found abundant materials for episode. We should have had Trojan spies or treacherous Greeks sending notice to the city, a council held to deliberate on the important news, and a determination adopted to abandon the previous timid line of defence and face the enemy in the field. Homer probably saw no great poetical capabilities in such details. He therefore tacitly requests his readers to take them for granted, and introduces the Trojans at once familiar with all that had taken place, boldly marching out on the plain instead of skulking behind their city walls. Even Priam, in his dialogue with Helen, while obviously aware that the principal Greek hero was not present, neither makes any remark on his absence, nor betrays the least curiosity as to its cause.¹

¹ This simple fact, the absence of the principal hero from the field during three great battles and sixteen whole books of the poem, while all the other chiefs are exhibited in a state of constant activity, ought, with reasonable critics, to go far in itself to vitiate the attacks on the original integrity of the series of martial cantos. The hypothesis of a careful cutting out of all the passages bearing on the hero's presence, and the insertion here and there of the numerous allusions to his absence, a hypothesis which W. Müller plainly inculcates, and which the arguments of his fellow-commentators necessarily involve, seems an astonishing climax of sceptical credulity.

Hector and
Ajax.

11. In the seventh book, Apollo and Minerva consult as to the propriety of concluding the day's battle by a single combat between Hector and Ajax, and agree that Hector shall be the challenger. Helenus, the Trojan soothsayer, is then brought forward as the inspired medium of communication with Hector, whom he encourages to the adventure by an assurance of having overheard the two deities stipulate for his coming forth unscathed from the engagement.¹ Not a syllable however occurs of any such condition in their actual conversation. The intelligent critic will not fail to perceive the close congeniality of spirit between these cases and the previous examples of conventional knowledge or ignorance cited from the Odyssey. Nor can anything be more incongruous than that the Greeks, after the treacherous conduct of the Trojans on that very morning, should here complacently accept their renewed proposals of truce, and again place confidence in their oaths without the least notice of their late perjury. Yet every rational inference of a sceptical nature is excluded, by the distinct allusion of both Hector and Antenor² to that perjury; allusions so inseparably linked with the whole spirit of the context that no casuistry can get rid of them. The previous case of single combat, like the dream of Telemachus in the Odyssey, having served its purpose, is dismissed, and in no way allowed to interfere with the subsequent conduct of the action.

The gods in Ethiopia.

When Achilles requests his mother to interest Jupiter in his behalf, she replies, that he must wait until the return of the god from Ethiopia, whither he had gone the day before "with the rest of the deities.”¹ Yet we had just before been told, that on the morning of the day on which this dialogue took place, Pallas had been sent by Juno to check the fury of Achilles, and that, after having executed her commission she rejoined “the rest of the deities” in Olympus.² Apollo was also on that same morning still in the camp, shooting his arrows at the Greeks. Here is a naked self-contradiction which has yet, owing to the indissoluble connexion of the text, been passed over as a mere inadvertence by the keenest modern impugnors of Homer’s unity, and the antient commentators who notice it have been censured in the same quarters as hypercritical cavillers.³

On the night after the first great defeat of the Greeks, it is said, that “all the other chiefs⁴” slept soundly, with the exception of Agamemnon, kept awake by anxiety of mind. Yet shortly after, we are told that “Menelaus had passed an equally sleepless night” from a similar cause. In the sequel of the first quoted text, Agamemnon’s restless anxiety is described as amounting to despair, when he “looked across the plain and beheld the Trojan watchfires.” Yet a few lines afterwards it appears he was still in bed in his tent; for it is added that, after musing awhile what was to be done, he arose, dressed himself, and proceeded to the quarters of Nestor. This incoherence has been noticed by Aristotle in a non’s sleep.

³ See Heyn. ad II. i. 424. Since the above was written, the author has observed that Lachmann, undismayed even by Heyne’s sneer at such “grammatical subtlety,” has gallantly come forward to relieve the school of criticism to which he belongs from the discredit of having overlooked so important a link in the chain of evidence in favour of its doctrines. *Betracht. üb. passage of the Poetica, which is the more interesting from the circumstance that its author, who, like Homer, though seldom wrong in essentials is sometimes careless of details, has himself run into a very natural oversight, by quoting, as the basis of his criticism, instead of v. 1. of the tenth, the parallel exordium of the second book of the poem.¹

If the arms of Achilles fitted Patroclus, why does the former hero lament his inability to revenge his friend's death for want of arms², since the arms of Patroclus, which were lying in his tent, would equally have fitted himself? This inconsistency, though as palpable as many others to which sceptical importance has been attached, happens to be inseparably linked with the historical essence of the action; and,

αὐλῶν συρίγγων θ' ὕμαδον·

τὸ γὰρ πάντες ἀντὶ τοῦ πολλοὶ κατὰ μεταφορὰν εἶρηται.

The ἔλογον here imputed is twofold: first, the impossibility of Agamemnon looking across the plain while lying in bed in his tent; where it really exists: secondly, the impossibility of the Trojans making merry around their bonfires, if the whole human race except Agamemnon were asleep; the apology for which is, that the whole signifies metaphorically the greater part. In this latter case, however, the ἔλογον is chargeable on the philosopher himself, not the poet.

Such oversights are not uncommon with Aristotle in parallel cases. Yet this text, the spirit of which ought to be apparent to whoever competently apprehends the genius of either author, has so bewildered the commentators, that a recent respectable editor of the Poetica has even resorted in despair to the unjustifiable expedient of entirely omitting the words from ἅμα to ὕμαδον, in which lie the whole real pith and marrow of the passage. accordingly, the subtle attempts of the scholiasts to explain it away have been ridiculed by the same modern critics who are themselves in the habit of adducing far more trivial incongruities in support of their views, where the arrangement of the context happens to be more favourable.¹

It were tedious to enumerate the additional examples of Homeric self-contradiction derivable from the text of the Iliad. Enough has been said to bear out the original position, that as such anomalies can be proved by internal evidence, at least in a large proportion of cases, to originate in a corresponding anomaly of the genius of a single poet, the fundamental rule of all sound criticism, that every author is his own best interpreter, precludes any arbitrary attempt to explain other cases, where the same criteria may not be so distinctly applicable, upon any more subtle or far-fetched principle.

terposition in human affairs, as embodied by Homer.

1. THE religious mechanism of the Iliad and Odyssey cannot, for reasons stated in another place, be properly classed under any single one of the three more general heads, of action, characters, or style, into which the analysis of an epic poem resolves itself. It has therefore been reserved for separate treatment in the present chapter, with joint reference to the two poems, the questions it involves extending equally to both.

A belief in the direct agency of the Deity in the conduct of human affairs is a principle of natural religion common to every people and state of society. The devout Christian and the enlightened heathen each delight to trace the hand of a supreme being in the works of nature or the course of worldly destiny, and to acknowledge his retributive justice in the punishment of vice or the reward of virtue. Such sentiments, in all ages, are viewed with respect, even by those least susceptible of their influence. Yet, if the source in which they originate be more narrowly investigated, it would appear as if their value depended rather on the objects on which they are brought to bear, than on their own intrinsic reason or propriety; for the man who carries the same train of reflexion into the ordinary concerns of life, who discovers in every petty disappointment a sign of divine displeasure, in every trifling piece of good fortune a token of favour, is an object of derision rather than respect. It is, however certain, that the agency of the Deity, if exercised at all, is exercised as actively in the one as in the other class of cases. He would at least be a bold casuist who should pretend to mark out the relative amount of importance which entitles one transaction of this world to the special guidance of Providence, and leaves another to the independent management of its inhabitants. The causes of this different estimate of mere varieties of degree in the same moral sentiment, lie beyond the scope of the present inquiry. It will here suffice to remark that the distinction itself is justified by the practical experience of life. In the one case, such impressions are found habitually connected with good sense and intelligence; in the other, with weak judgement and infirmity of purpose. In the one therefore they are esteemed the philosophy of religion; in the other are condemned as bigotry and superstition.

The pantheon of Homer embodies the system of natural religion prevalent in primitive Hellas. The direct part assigned by him to the gods, in the conduct of human affairs, represents the same divine influence which, in purer systems, is limited to a single deity. The rule, therefore, above laid down for estimating the value of any theory of special interference by the importance of the objects on which the divine agency is brought to bear, supplies a fair general criterion for appreciating the celestial mechanism of classical fable. Not that, in every case where the influence of that theory were unbecoming the philosopher, it would be equally inappropriate in the hero of a poem: but the analogy holds good of each. Wherever the tendency of such influence is to destroy the freedom of human thought or action, and convert rational beings into irresponsible automata, the effect must be mischievous, whether exemplified in the creed of the devotee or the imagery of the epic muse.

But the agency of the Deity is not confined to the physical affairs of man. The disposition of his mind, its good and evil impulses, proceed necessarily from the same omnipotent first cause as the varieties of his worldly destiny. Hence that indisputable, though incomprehensible dogma of all religion, natural or revealed, that men are predestined, or in other words constrained, to the indulgence of passions and the commission of crimes which the same religion teaches them to avoid. The Greek mythology, while recognising this dogma in its full extent, differs in so far from that of most other antient nations, that instead of placing the two contending influences under the guidance of conflicting agents, the Deity and the Demon, it unites them in the same.¹ The Greek system acknowledges no independent Evil Principle, but exhibits the several personifications of divine attribute, according to their own partialities or the decrees of Fate, now encouraging to virtue, now tempting to crime and hurrying into perdition. This system, although involving in its details offensive anomalies, seems yet, if referred to first principles, the more reasonable of the two. If the existence of one omnipotent Deity be admitted, the influence of the Evil Principle can only become effective by his authority, and every impulse to which humanity is subjected must ultimately originate in the same source. To assign, therefore, a separate independent agency to that element of divine power which men are pleased to consider as hostile to themselves, can tend little either to the dignity or the consistency of the Supreme Being. With regard, again, to the question here more immediately in point, how far such a distinction be conducive to the spirit or propriety of a poetical mythology, the simplicity of the Greek plan seems greatly preferable to that collision of good and bad demons which forms, with most other nations, the mechanism of heroic poetry. Any such methodical separation of attribute would have been incompatible with that variety of character and freedom of action in the members of the Greek pantheon, in which its poetical value so greatly consists.

The doctrine of fatality, while replete with a mystery and terror which render it a fine instrument in the hand of an accomplished poet, is a philosophic rather than a poetical doctrine. Hence its full development in the poetry of Greece was reserved for a later period. Although it lies at the root of Homer's fable, it is seldom there put forward in so prominent a form as in the tragic drama. With Homer, naturally weak or wicked men are indeed instigated to folly or crime by the decrees of Fate or the agency of its ministers; but he takes no pleasure in exhibiting just or well-intentioned persons irresistibly impelled to guilt and consequent destruction, as in the case of Œdipus and other heroes of the Attic stage.

Human
cation of the divine
agency.

2. There can be little doubt that even in the rudest ages of Greece men of a high range of intellect had formed worthy notions of the divine attributes, many of which are embodied in the poetical mythology with a corresponding degree of dignity. On the other hand, the lively fancy of the race led them, in the popular developement of their pantheon, to extend its principle of petty interference with the daily concerns of life to an excess unparalleled, perhaps, in any other system. Nor was the principle of human personification, however essential to the poetical effect of the Greek pantheon, free from moral disadvantage. In the material polytheism of other leading antient nations, the Egyptians, for example, the incarnation of the Deity was chiefly, or exclusively, confined to animals, monsters, or other fanciful emblems. The preference by the Greeks, as their visible type of the Deity, of the only one among his creatures whose intellectual powers entitle him to a community with the divine nature, appears on first view far more consistent with the celestial dignity. The consequences were, however, in some respects unfavourable. The Oriental system was essentially allegorical. It brought the deities into but slight physical contact with humanity. Human apotheosis, with its attendant confusion of the social relations of men and gods, was there unknown ; and, even where the customs of earth were transferred to heaven, it was in so symbolical a form as to obviate much risk of humanising effects. In Greece, on the other hand, it was an almost necessary result of the spirit and grace with which the deities were embodied in human forms, that they should also be burthened with human interests and passions. Heaven, like earth, had its courts and palaces, its trades and professions, its marriages, intrigues, divorces. This community of the two races led to amorous intercourse between them, supplying another fertile source of abuse and partiality in the divine administration of the affairs of earth. If the infusion of celestial blood into human veins added lustre to the race of heroes, the promotion of mortals to the honours of Olympus detracted proportionally from the dignity of the host of heaven.

Homer's genius here, as in other respects, reflects that of his nation. The divine character and agency, as shadowed forth by him, combine the respective excellences and defects of the popular system. Replete for the most part with grandeur and beauty, his celestial portraits are apt to degenerate into the gross or fantastical ; and his supernatural mechanism, while often appropriate and effective, is at times trivial, misplaced, and detrimental to the spirit of his action.

3. The general scheme of divine management in both poems is consistent and well imagined. The supreme first cause, or efficient unity of the Deity, is Fate or Destiny. Her decrees, although the manner and time of carrying them into effect might be modified at the discretion of her agents, were unalterable. By one of them the destruction of Troy had been foreordained of old, as a judgement on the accumulated impieties of its royal family. The immediate motive of fulfilment was the crime of Paris. Jupiter, as confidential minister of the supreme fiat, is represented as impartial. Juno, Neptune, Minerva, and some other inferior deities, favour the Greeks. Apollo, Venus, and Mars take part with the Trojans. Jupiter himself however, at the crisis of the war which forms the subject of the Iliad, is involved in temporary hostility to the Greeks, by espousing the cause of Achilles, in repayment of a debt of gratitude for services rendered to himself by that hero's mother. The six deities above mentioned as taking a keener interest in the contest appear, when free from Jove's control, indefatigable in their efforts to promote the interests and stimulate the energies of their favourites; to rally them in defeat, reinvigorate them when fatigued or wounded, and, in a proportional degree, to depress the spirits and baffle the schemes of their adversaries.

The divine mechanism of the Odyssey, both in principle and in detail, offers the same essential features as that of the Iliad, under such incidental varieties as were involved by the corresponding variety of the subject and scene of action. Ulysses, the most virtuous hero of the age, is predestined, on his departure from Troy, to numerous trials and hardships before his resettlement in his native island. Jove, as the minister of fate, is friendly to him. The adverse power is Neptune, lord of the element which was the principal scene as well as cause of the hero's disasters. The moral springs of the celestial agency, though of an inferior order, are, in their operation and results, closely parallel to those of the Iliad. In the latter poem, Jove's not unreasonable advocacy of the cause of Thetis and her son entails on the Greeks, while asserting their own just rights, a series of severe calamities. In the Odyssey, his far less justifiable indulgence of Neptune's vindictive rage at the well-merited punishment inflicted on his cannibal offspring, subjects the blameless hero to nine years of banishment, and his innocent wife and family to nearly as many of cruel insult and oppression. The office of guide and protector to Ulysses is undertaken by Minerva, the divine representative of the qualities by which he was himself chiefly distinguished. She had already, during the Trojan war, been his constant patroness, and now as zealously counteracts the malignant schemes of her uncle. These are the only great Olympic deities who take a prominent part in the Odyssey. The other supernatural agents, Circe, Calypso, Æolus, Proteus, belong, consistently with the genius of the poem, to the mythological rather than the religious element of the Greek pantheon.

The mode in which the divinities interpose in the affairs of men is similar in each work. Sometimes they appear in their own proper person, sometimes in the disguise of mortals. In the rare instances where they assume the shape of animals, an exclusive preference is given to the winged part of the creation.¹ It seems doubtful, by reference to the passages bearing on the point, whether Homer's gods were essentially invisible to men, whose eyes were at times endued with the faculty of perceiving them, or whether their persons were naturally distinguishable to human ken, and only concealed or disguised by means of clouds or mists, as circumstances might require.¹ Even where they appear openly, the power of recognising them is usually limited to certain privileged individuals. Thus Minerva is visible to Achilles alone in the quarrel scene of the Iliad, to Ulysses alone in the cottage of Eumæus and in the removal of the arms²; Apollo, Venus, and Mars, to Diomed alone in the fifth book of the Iliad. Sometimes this divine privilege is figured less as a quality of the gods than as an incapacity of mortal eyesight, symbolised as a mist before the eyes, removable in the case of favoured heroes.³ The supernatural æther which habitually envelopes their own bodies is also frequently resorted to as a covering to such other persons or objects as they may be anxious to conceal. Even their material appendages, arms, chariots, and the like, when separated from their own persons, require this aid.⁴ Little or no description is given of the personal appearance of any deity, unless in the poet's usual indirect mode, by epithets or incidental notices. Thus the white arms and full round eyes of Juno; the majestic form and azure eyes of Minerva; the golden tresses and smiling countenance of Venus; the lofty stature and slender but athletic grace of Diana; the brawny arms and limping gait of Vulcan; the delicate youth and noble aspect of Hermes, are specified. The broad chest of the dark-haired Neptune, the waist of Mars, and the forehead and brow of Jupiter are also appealed to as symbols of strength and majesty.

bearing of Jupiter is distinguished, except in his conjugal relations, by a dignity befitting the ideal lord of the Hellenic pantheon. While never submitting, amid the conflicting interests of his subordinate deities and their rebellious opposition to his views, to the least compromise of his authority, he exhibits a happy mixture of severity and mildness in his mode of asserting it. Alone among the gods he abstains from all personal intercourse with his terrestrial subjects. His controlling power is exercised through the agency of inferior deities, while he himself sits apart on the summit of Olympus or Ida, contemplating, in proud consciousness of his surpassing glory, the progress of mundane events.

Juno is high-tempered, self-willed, and imperious ; with lofty notions of her own prerogative as queen of Jupiter, she is easily mortified and incensed by his slowness to admit her pretensions. Ardent in the pursuit of her objects, she is little scrupulous in her mode of attaining them, a warm friend and a bitter enemy.

The character of Neptune, allowance being made for difference of sex, has much resemblance to that of Juno. As vindictive as his royal sister, and haughty and impetuous like the element he rules, he is the only deity, besides Juno, who, presuming on the privilege of a brother, as she does on that of a wife, ventures boldly to follow out his own schemes in defiance of Jupiter's commands.

Apollo is the sublimest of Homer's gods. In the Iliad, to which poem his visible interposition is confined, his presence and power are portrayed under features of mingled beauty, grandeur, and terror. Even in the Odyssey, where he never openly appears,

Minerva, the patroness of intellectual pursuit and of the art of war in its nobler departments, is, even in the hurry of battle, calm and dispassionate, fertile in expedients, and a zealous champion of mortals who resemble her in character. Energetic in forwarding their views against her equals in rank, she exercises a politic forbearance when brought into collision with her superiors.

Mars is the type of the more offensive, as Pallas of the nobler side of the military character. His warlike ardour savours at all times of ferocity rather than valour, and degenerates in the heat of battle into blind indiscriminate fury.

Vulcan, in both poems, is the lowest of the Olympic host in the scale of divine dignity. He is represented as a mere blacksmith, distinguished but for skill in his art, brawny arms, his love of good cheer, and talent for buffoonery.

Venus, the divorced spouse of Vulcan, and now the paramour of Mars, combines with her familiar attributes of beauty, grace, and levity of habits, a tender and affectionate heart. On the few occasions where her concern for her son Æneas or her favourite Paris impels her to take part in the combat, her interference with the province of her more martial sisters is visited by severe castigation at their hands.

It will now be proper to illustrate the above remarks by individual cases, where the poet's mode of management appears more especially deserving of approbation or censure.

5. Perhaps the noblest example, in either poem, of divine interposition in human affairs is the pestilence inflicted by Apollo on the Greek host. The Apollo of Homer, it must be borne in mind, is a different character from the deity of the same name in the later classical pantheon. The attributes under which he is here chiefly represented, but which were afterwards obscured or superseded, are replete with a terror and mystery singularly adapted to the higher mechanism of epic poetry. His primitive proper function, common also to his sister Artemis, and forming by a natural train of association the basis of those which make up the fulness of his divine office, is that of angel or minister of death. Throughout both poems, all deaths from unforeseen or invisible causes, the ravages of pestilence, the fate of the young child or promising adult cut off in the germ of infancy or the flower of youth, of the old man dropping peacefully into the grave, or of the reckless sinner suddenly checked in his career of crime, are ascribed to the arrows of Apollo or Diana. The oracular functions of the god arose naturally out of the above fundamental attributes; for who could more appropriately impart to mortals what little foreknowledge Fate permitted of her decrees, than the agent of her most awful dispensations? The close union of the arts of prophecy and song explains his additional office of god of music, while the arrows with which he and his sister were armed, symbols of sudden death in every age, no less naturally procured him that of god of archery. Of any connexion between Apollo and the Sun, whatever may have existed in the more esoteric doctrine of the Greek sanctuaries, there is no trace in either Iliad or Odyssey.¹ He is there the god, not of life and light, but of destruction, who promptly responds to the call of his injured saint with his weapons of vengeance. The few verses in which he is described as "descending, dark as night, the sides of Olympus, his quiver rattling on his shoulders," and as dealing death at each twang of his silver bow, is one of the finest examples of that simple brevity with which Homer loves to shadow forth his grandest conceptions. Another exercise of Apollo's power, which can hardly be justified but in figurative connexion with this primary attribute, is his share in the death of Patroclus. The introduction of so noble a god in the character of a ruffianly pugilist, to stun a brave warrior with a blow of his fist, were otherwise irreconcilable with the fine taste and judgement of Homer. It may possibly symbolise some popular legend of this hero having been seized, in the heat of battle, with a vertigo or giddiness, which rendered him an easy victim of the second-rate warrior who dealt him his death blow. Such fatalities belong to the class ascribed to the agency of Apollo.

In the Odyssey, attention has already been directed to the brilliant exemplification of the mysterious power of this god, in his cooperation with Minerva for the destruction of the suitors. That poem also abounds with incidental allusions of a pointed, often touching nature to the sudden dispensations of the twin deities.¹

Closely parallel to the pestilence of Apollo, both in grandeur of conception and graphic conciseness of terms, is the description, in the Odyssey, of the destruction of the raft of Ulysses by Neptune. The god, returning from Ethiopia, descries, from the summit of the Asiatic mountains, the object of his persecution already, in spite of all his efforts, within sight of a friendly coast. With a brief ejaculation of wrath and surprise, "he brandishes his trident; the clouds gather, the sky is darkened, the winds rush forth, the billows rise," and, in a few seconds, the ill-starred voyager, his vessel shivered to pieces, is again abandoned to the fury of the waves.

Perhaps the boldest excursion of Homer into this region of poetical fancy is the collision into which, in the twenty-first book of the Iliad, he has brought the river god Scamander, first with Achilles, and afterwards with Vulcan when summoned by Juno to the hero's aid. The overwhelming fury of the stream finds its natural interpretation in the character of the mountain torrents of Greece and Asia Minor. Their wide shingly beds are, in summer, comparatively dry, so as to be easily forded by the foot-passenger. But a thunder-shower in the mountains, unobserved perhaps by the traveller on the plain, may suddenly immerse him in the flood of a mighty river. The rescue of Achilles by the fiery arms of Vulcan. Vulcan scarcely admits of the same ready explanation from physical causes. Yet the subsiding of the flood at the critical moment when the hero's destruction appeared imminent, might, by a slight extension of the figurative parallel, be ascribed to a god symbolic of the influences opposed to all atmospheric moisture.

Minerva.
The gods
as instigators to crime.

In the more remarkable cases where the Deity appears in either poem as instigator of crime, the divine agency is figured in the person of Minerva. In the Iliad, Fate requires the truce between the two armies to be violated, and Pallas is despatched from Olympus with a commission to that effect. She selects Pandarus, a prince of naturally treacherous character, as her instrument, and assuming the form of a comrade, tempts him to the act by seductive views of the favour it will insure him with Paris and his party. The Lycian chief is easily persuaded. His perfidious shot at Menelaus causes a renewal of the battle, in which, as a reward of his villany, he is among the first heroes who fall.

In the Odyssey, the same goddess exercises a similar, but still more cruel influence on the destinies of the suitors. The hearts of these, in great part rather weak than wicked, youths, when momentarily turned to repentance, are by her hardened and confirmed in the career of guilt which was to involve their common destruction.¹

the poet's divine mechanism.

6. Attention will now be turned to those cases where the active interposition of the gods appears in a less favourable light, whether from the extent to which it is carried, or the triviality of its object. It is in the battles that these defects of the poet's mechanism are chiefly observable. That the patron deity of a warrior should invest him with superhuman prowess, or accompany him in person on his career

of victory, is an allowable stretch of poetical license. The escape of a champion in a crisis of great danger, or the harmless consequences of an apparently fatal wound, may also, without any serious breach of poetical propriety, be traced to the same miraculous aid. Homer has ingeniously availed himself of these expedients to maintain the credit of his countrymen in defeat. All the hostile fury of Jove and his elements, directed in the face of Diomed or Ajax, is required to insure the retreat of those heroes before a victorious enemy; while Hector or Æneas rarely escapes from a Greek champion of equal rank but through the intervention of the gods. These displays of divine tactic amount, however, at times, to so complete a suspension of the independent action of the heroes, as is greatly injurious both to their own dignity and that of their patrons. It can tend but little to magnify the prowess of a victor, that his spear should be directed with surgical accuracy, by his patron god, into the most vital part of his adversary's body, while the return shot is, by the same agency, made to spend its force in the air. In the last combat between Achilles and Hector, this mixture of the frivolous with the tragical greatly tarnishes both the grandeur of the catastrophe and the glory of the conqueror. The balancing of the heroes' fates in the scale of Jove, the sudden departure of Apollo from the side of Hector on perceiving his destined hour to be come, and the occupation of the god's previous post by Minerva, to whom alone, as patroness of the Greeks, the issue of the battle was now intrusted, are a series of figures highly conducive to that feeling of ominous foreboding with which the mind loves to contemplate the approach of some great and fatal event. But when the same Minerva, after Achilles has missed his aim, nimbly picks up his spear and replaces it in his hand, while the Trojan hero, whose well-directed weapon rebounds harmless from the shield of his adversary, looks round in vain for a similar service from his faithless esquire, our previous sense of propriety in the supernatural interposition gives place to offence at such vexatious meddling. It was natural that the heroes, under these circumstances, should be powerfully impressed with their dependance on the arbitrary exercise of the divine authority. A belief that the brow of Jove frowns on their efforts is often a valid excuse for flight. If a sword shivers on the mail of an antagonist, the fault is attributed less to the temper of the blade, or the awkwardness of the thrust, than the displeasure of Minerva. If an arrow flies harmless from the bow, Apollo is taxed with partiality for the object at which it was aimed.

Where however the adventures described, and the style of the narrative, assume a familiar or humorous turn, such interference, if not more worthy of the divine majesty, is less prejudicial to heroic dignity, and at times has a lively agreeable effect. When Diomed, for example, in the chariot-race, is on the point of passing Eumelus, Apollo, of whom the Argive prince was no favourite, jerks the whip out of his hand. Minerva his patroness alertly restores it, and in revenge overturns the chariot of Eumelus. In the foot-race the same goddess, to favour Ulysses, causes his competitor to slip and fall among the cowdung, when on the point of success. Here the deities appear less as ministers of Fate than as familiar genii of the chiefs, promoting and taking part in their amusements.

The Iliad, in its continued series of battles, where the favourite warriors of different deities are pitted against each other, affords more frequent opening than the Odyssey for this officious exercise of the divine influence. The most signal example in the latter poem is found, accordingly, in the portion of the action which offers the nearest resemblance to that of the Iliad, the assault of Ulysses on the suitors. The darts of the enemy are here so carefully turned aside by Minerva as to prove harmless, while those of the royal party are guided with deadly accuracy into vital parts. The apology which here suggests itself, the completely miraculous nature of the whole adventure, is perhaps but another ground of censure on this portion of the poem. The destruction of above a hundred able-bodied young chiefs by four individuals, without so much as a wound on the part of the assailants, is in itself a violation of all historical possibility, only to be glossed over by a copious admixture of preternatural agency. The most pointed instance in the Odyssey of that more venial class of petty interference already exemplified in the games of the Iliad, is, by a similar coincidence, the favour shown by Pallas to Ulysses in the athletic arena of the Phæacians.

7. The foregoing remarks on the poet's pantheon have been confined to its members in their relation to the human species. It remains to consider their character as exhibited in their dealings with each other. The anomalies here observable are no less strikingly illustrative of the joint merits and defects of the system of human personification. In the

examples subjoined, it will be proper to distinguish between what is derogatory to the character of the Deity in the higher sense, and what is also inappropriate in a poetical point of view.

Domestic
Olympus.

When Achilles applies to his mother to intercede with Jove in his favour against Agamemnon, she postpones the fulfilment of her son's request for a fortnight, owing to the absence of the god at a festival of the Ethiopians in his honour. This is a figure noway inconsistent with the poetical dignity even of the king of Olympus. Omnipresence, or all-pervading control over mundane affairs, far from being an essential, was scarcely a possible attribute of the chief of a pagan pantheon; while, poetically speaking, the visit of the celestial host to the distant fabulous land on the banks of ocean, to grace with their presence the annual sacrifice of a favoured race of worshippers, is a fine image, and is repeated with like happy effect in the Odyssey.¹ On the return of Jupiter, the scene between him and Thetis, her supplication, his hesitation lest his indulgence of her wish should prove a source of discord with Juno, and his final concession of her suit, are all quite worthy of the poet and the Iliad. When however in the sequel, the divine king and queen actually come to high words on the subject, and the enraged husband threatens to lay violent hands on his spouse if she torment him further, while their lame son Vulcan excites the mirth of the deities by the ludicrous performance of his office of peacemaker, and finally restores good-fellowship by briskly circulating the goblet, neither the general spirit of the description, nor the grandeur of some of the passages it contains, can reconcile to such an exhibition, in the circle of the gods, of scenes discreditable to the humblest of their worshippers upon earth.

The frequent occurrence of such improprieties in the standard text-book of the national religion gave great offence to the early Greek philosophers, whose anxiety to maintain the dignity of Olympus, conjointly with the credit of Homer, gave rise to the allegorical system of interpretation, where not only the divine brawls, but a large portion of the facts or imagery of the poems, were fancifully explained as types of physical phenomena or ethic dogmas.¹ The attempts of modern commentators to reconcile the anomaly have not been more successful.² The only reasonable explanation or vindication of these passages is to assume their object to be satirical. They reflect partly the poet's own disposition to banter the extravagance of the popular theology, partly the inclination of the Greek public of all ages to extract materials for jest from the objects of gravest interest. They thus possess a historical, in addition to their poetical value, as the earliest specimens of a taste afterwards so characteristic of the genius of Hellenism. It must here be remembered that Homer's works were not composed for the perusal of a limited and fastidious public, but for the entertainment of a whole nation. In more refined periods, on the subdivision of the various orders of literary composition, such talent for the burlesque found exercise in its own proper sphere: but in an age when the popular minstrelsy formed the whole cyclopædia of literature, the temptation to administer to so important an element of national taste was irresistible, even in works with the general style of which Homer himself, or his more critical hearers, might have felt such license to be not strictly congenial.

This view is confirmed by the fact that these domestic squabbles are exclusively confined to the social intercourse of the gods, although many portions of the narrative in both poems offer equal opportunity for the exercise of the same satirical license in human affairs. In the Iliad, the household relations of the Trojan king and queen were easily susceptible of such touches of the ludicrous; and in the palace of Alcinoüs, where the whole action is seasoned with a broad tone of raillery, there was abundant opening for their introduction. The limitation is not difficult to explain. It is of the very essence of the higher class of satire that it should be aimed at the highest objects. Doubtless such scenes were really enacted in the palaces of the Greek chiefs, from which the poet has transferred them to the halls of Olympus. This reality, however, was precisely what destroyed their aptness for poetical treatment. Amid the simplicity of manners among all classes in those days, domestic broils were probably of too familiar occurrence in human families to supply popular subjects of comic allusion ; while their introduction in such cases would have been at variance with Homer's fundamental principle of exalting the character of his human race of heroes. The distinction here drawn is pointedly illustrated by the different turn given by him to his descriptions of matrimonial infidelity, in the respective cases of a divine and a human libertine. Agamemnon, to enhance the value of his sacrifice in parting with Chryseis, tells his assembled countrymen that he prefers her as a bedfellow even to his queen Clytemnestra. This is certainly, to modern ears, no very delicate allusion. It may, however, be urged in palliation, that the code of heroic morality was by no means severe as to the practice of extra-nuptial concubinage : and, in this particular case, a ten years' absence from home and domestic enjoyments might go far in the way of apology. Very different is the effect when Jove, on the summit of Mount Ida, in protesting the ardour of his amorous affection for Juno, assures her that it greatly surpasses what he had ever experienced for any other female with whom he had cohabited ; and then proceeds gravely to sum up¹ for her conviction his adulteries with Danaë, Europa, and some half-dozen other paramours, so celebrated in classic fable. It is impossible the poet could mean so strange an address to be taken seriously. He could have no other conceivable object but that of satirising this absurd chapter of the national theology.

class of satire should be more liberally indulged in the Iliad than in the Odyssey. In the former poem the general gravity of the subject was precisely what imparted zest to such traits of the burlesque; in the Odyssey, a work of an essentially humorous character, while the poet had less temptation to resort to Olympus for a comic seasoning of his narrative, its introduction from that source would have been proportionally less effective. The subject offered also in other respects less opportunity. In the Iliad, the brunt of the theological satire is concentrated around the domestic intercourse of Jupiter and Juno; in the Odyssey, the latter divinity takes no part. The only other deities of higher rank interested in the action, Neptune and Minerva, present neither in their personal character nor their adventures similar opening for ridicule. The theological pasquinade of the poem is therefore confined to the inferior deities, Proteus, Circe, Æolus; with the exception of the episode of Mars and Venus, in the song of Demodocus, which is indeed a brilliant specimen of this style of composition.

Divination.
Dreams.
Omens.

8. Another mode of interposition in human affairs, less direct but little less effective than the personal activity of the gods, is that of divination or theomancy. The same rules above laid down for estimating the poetical propriety of mythological mechanism here equally apply. That the future will of heaven may be imparted through the agency of dreams and other ominous warnings; that unusual phenomena of the visible world portend parallel vicissitudes in the affairs of its inhabitants, are doctrines countenanced even by enlightened systems of religion. On the other hand, there is no chapter in the intellectual history of man which exhibits his rational powers in a more degrading light than that which records the delusive influence of this species of superstition on the minds of the greatest heroes, or the conduct of the most important enterprises.

Homer's mode of management is here, upon the whole, judicious and elegant. Of the numerous forms of divination familiar in later times, those to which he has given prominence are comparatively few. The decrees of Fate relative to the course of events in each poem, being intrusted for their execution to the various members of the pantheon, may be divulged by them, as occasion suggests, to favoured mortals, either directly by means of prophetic inspiration, or through the medium of dreams and prodigies. The functions of the seer thus consisted partly of a simple knowledge of futurity received from the Deity, partly of his skill in the interpretation of omens.¹ There is no trace in Homer of the arts of divination having been yet reduced to system, as an element of public polity. Before a battle, the gods were propitiated by sacrifice; and, if an omen appeared on this or other similar occasions, it was hailed as more especially pregnant with prophetic import. But such indications do not seem to have been formally sought after, still less considered indispensable to the success of an enterprise. Neither the poet nor his heroes show any knowledge of those petty solemnities which exercised, in more civilised ages, so great a sway over the fortunes of both Greece and Rome, and are so happily described by our own satirical bard, as

¹ High authority exists for the belief that Homer endowed his heroes, when at the point of death, with the power of foretelling future events; that the soul, on the threshold of the other world, was admitted to a participation in its privileges. The passages quoted in favour of this view are, the dying assurance of Patroclus to Hector, that Achilles will speedily avenge his fate (xvi. 851.), and the similar prediction by Hector (xxii. 358.) of the death of Achilles. Conf. Plato, Apol. Socr. p. 39.; Heyn. obs. ad Il. xxii. 358.

Of old aruspicy and augury,
That out of garbages of cattle
Presaged the event of truce or battle ;
From flight of birds or chickens pecking,
Success of great'st attempts would reckon.” . . .

Prophetic dreams are classed by the antients under two heads: first, those where the Deity in person, or through agents, issues his commands directly to the sleeper; secondly, those where the events are shadowed forth in the action of the dream, either as they afterwards take place, or in the form of trope or allegory. The Iliad contains but two dreams, both of the former class. In the first, Agamemnon is warned by Jupiter to prepare for battle; in the second, the shade of Patroclus appearing to Achilles enjoins the speedy performance of his funeral rites. In the Odyssey, where, in the more familiar spirit of the subject, this species of omen is of more frequent occurrence, there is one example of the allegorical class. In both poems the apparition is described in one of those simple epic forms with which Homer loves to stamp identity on his favourite images. The spectre stands over the head of the dreamer, and after a short address vanishes, when the sleeper awakens.¹ In the mission of dreams the gods, as in their ordinary control of human action, are the agents of deceit as well as of instruction. This doctrine is formally inculcated in the Odyssey, where dreams are described as of two kinds, veracious and delusive, each kind passing to the region of earth through a different gate of heaven.¹ The same doctrine is illustrated in each poem by a closely parallel example. In the Iliad, the dream sent by Jupiter in the semblance of Nestor persuades Agamemnon to take the field, by a false assurance of the immediate conquest of the city. In the Odyssey Minerva, in her own person, urges Telemachus to return home from Sparta forthwith, by an equally false account of his mother's contemplated marriage with Eurymachus.²

The native purity of Homer's taste is signally displayed in the choice of his ordinary prodigies or omens. They are derived chiefly from the phenomena of the atmosphere or the motions of its winged inhabitants, whose importance in the system of Pagan divination was such as to have furnished the familiar names for the art. Nor, certainly, is there any part of the animal creation better entitled to the distinction. Their privilege of roving through the boundless realms of space to the very gates of heaven, might in itself prompt the fable of their being the chosen messengers of God to man: while the majestic soaring of the eagle; the rapid flight and fatal swoop of the falcon; the scream of the sea-fowl flitting around the projecting cliffs, amid the dash of the surge and the roar of the storm; the dismal croak of the raven from the stunted tree of the desert, are objects calculated, in all ages, to inspire feelings of ominous terror and mystery. The only other animal which, with Homer, enjoys a similar privilege is the serpent, a creature whose peculiarities have obtained it a like preeminence in the superstitious code of all the antient nations. The atmospheric prodigies of favourite introduction are, in each poem, thunder, sudden change from light to darkness, or the reverse; and, in the Iliad, the descent of red drops of rain, as a figure of bloodshed.¹ This phenomenon, if a mere fruit of the poet's imagination, might seem arbitrary or far-fetched. It is one however of ascertained reality, and of no uncommon occurrence in the climate of Greece.² The allotment to these various omens of their relative degrees of propitious or adverse import, by reference to the time or place of their occurrence, was the office of the professional soothsayer. In ordinary cases, however, popular opinion supplied common rules of interpretation. When the prodigy appeared on the right hand, it was favourable; on the left, the contrary.³ Its appearance immediately after an invocation of the Deity was usually considered in itself an answer to the appeal, and an earnest of divine sympathy.

Among the nobler examples of such prophetic warnings may be cited, from the Iliad, that vouchsafed to the victorious Trojans during their assault on the Greek rampart, the ultimate failure of which was portended.⁴ An eagle appears on their left, grasping in his talons a snake, which, wounded and enfeebled, still fiercely maintains the combat, until his enemy, agonised by a last decisive sting in the throat, drops him on the field and flies screaming from the scene of his discomfiture. The poet was partial to this class of images. The destruction of the suitors is prefigured to Telemachus by a hawk devouring a pigeon, and strewing its feathers on the ground; and to Penelope by an eagle destroying a flock of domestic fowls in the court of the palace.¹ Prophetic importance has rarely, if ever, been assigned by Homer to low or trivial images.² In the Odyssey, a dexter sneeze of Telemachus is indeed hailed as an omen by Penelope, but with a laugh, and evidently in the humorous spirit which pervades even the graver parts of the poem.³

9. Whatever prominence may have been given to the primitive arts of divination in the poet's description, it may still perhaps be a question how far he himself was imbued with a belief in their efficacy. Here and there the mind of the individual seems to shine forth superior to that of his age. Both Nestor and Priam, while deferring to the popular doctrine, are made to utter reflexions little respectful to its professors.⁴ But the reply of Hector to the Trojan augur's comment on the omen of the eagle and snake, XII. 237.

principles which strike at the root of the whole art of divination, and an equally free expression of which might have involved the fortunes or the life of an Athenian commander in the days of Pericles. In placing these noble doctrines in the mouth of Hector, who elsewhere shows himself so little under their influence, the poet seems but to avail himself of the habitually vainglorious tongue of that hero, to insinuate his own secret contempt for the ascendancy assigned by his age to blind fatality over personal exertion in the conduct of events. Similarly scornful allusions to the arts of augury occur frequently in the *Odyssey*¹, though chiefly placed in the mouths of unprincipled rakes: but the tenor of several, as of the remark of Penelope on the sneeze of her son, is plainly satirical.

His doctrine of a future state.

Nowhere does the poet's theology appear in a less favourable light than in his doctrine of a future state, as developed both in the Necromancy of the Odyssey and in parallel texts of the Iliad. The judgments of the infernal tribunal are limited to punishment. To reward there is, at least, no direct allusion; and the lot even of those whose lives were distinguished by great or good qualities is described as one of privation and gloom compared with that of the upper world. It is true that the poet's design was not to give a topographical description of the land of souls, but to narrate a visit to a particular region of it for a specific object. But when we consider the number and excellence of the heroes and heroines described by him as condemned to this dismal tenor of existence, there remains little room for even the hypothesis of an Elysium. If

Achilles, Ajax, Agamemnon, Tiresias, Alcmena, Ariadne, Leda, were excluded from its joys, who could have been entitled to share in them? The incidental notices of a better fate reserved for certain favoured heroes, imply rather their apotheosis than a mere improvement of their condition in Hades. In the Iliad, the allusions to the infernal regions are equally gloomy, and, both in sentiment and style, in the closest harmony with the more detailed descriptions of the Odyssey. This is not only a defect of Homer's system of mythology, but a striking eccentricity of his genius. That the exclusion of a Paradise from the world of souls could, in his day, have formed part of the popular Greek theology is incredible. It were repugnant, not only to the spirit of that system, as inculcated from the earliest to the latest periods of classical paganism by other little less valid authorities, but to the first principles of natural religion imprinted in the human breast, even to those of common sense and equity. In a system which enforced the law of retributive justice by such terrible inflictions on the wicked, the denial of recompense to the good, or, worse, the actual deterioration of their lot, seems absurd as well as unjust. This singular doctrine, therefore, must be considered as the poet's own, as the peculiar tone which he preferred giving to the more awful element of his poetical mythology.¹ The argument which so strange an anomaly supplies of unity of genius in the two works, where it is so harmoniously exemplified, is sufficiently obvious.

10. Throughout this analysis, Homer's poetical mechanism has been examined, not merely as illustrating his own genius, but in connexion with those fundamental principles of art which apply to the literature of all ages and countries. In following out the same object, a few remarks are here subjoined on the general features which distinguish his mythological agency from that to which recourse has been had by standard modern poets of a similar class.

The elegant facility with which the Greek mythology embodies in material forms the phenomena of both the moral and the physical world has been considered in a previous chapter.¹ The creations of that mythology are neither the arbitrary inventions of fantastic poets, nor the studied personifications of didactic allegory. They shadow forth, in their native freshness, the original views and impressions of the most gifted family of mankind concerning the structure and government of the universe. This harmony, or rather identity, between religious dogma and popular superstition, imparts to Homer's supernatural agency a poetical truth and reality which must be wanting in any system where those two elements are distinct. Hence the disadvantage under which the modern poet labours, in his attempts to impart the interest of the marvellous to his narrative. The pure spirit of the Christian religion essentially disqualifies it for the mechanism of a heroic poem. The popular sympathies of our own middle ages hinge, indeed, on the Roman Catholic legendarium, somewhat as those of the Hellenes on the Homeric mythology: but the spirit of the former class of traditions is as repugnant to the genius of the Heroic Muse as to that of the pure religion which they contaminate. Of this the more judicious poets of the romantic school seem to have been sensible, rarely admitting the agency of saints or martyrs into their epic mechanism. The aids to which they preferably resort, magicians, fairies, and goblins, have the other drawback of being in glaring collision with the standards of religious belief, and, by consequence, with an essential ingredient of that popular sympathy which it is their object to awaken. The attempt, on the other hand, to blend the religious with the magical element of romantic fable involves offensive anomalies. Of this we have a striking example in the most popular model of the modern epopee, the Jerusalem of Tasso; in the action of which poem the grave dogmas of spiritual theology, the delusions of Roman Catholic priestcraft, the terrors of Northern dæmonology, and the gay idealities of Pagan Polytheism or Arabian romance, are all worked up into a single heterogeneous compound. What can be more false, either in poetry or in reason, than that a few cabalistic words of some lascivious sorceress or malignant necromancer should have the power of thwarting the schemes of Jehovah for the future destinies of Christendom; that angels and archangels should undertake the same officious functions as the fighting machinery of the Iliad, direct the blow of a Christian chief, or parry the thrust of his Mussulman adversary; or that the souls of departed saints should appear fighting in the air, with mortal weapons, against legions of hostile dæmons?

Had, however, the marvellous agency of the Greek poet been confined to the normal standards of Pagan worship, the result might have been an undue restraint on that play of inventive genius which constitutes the charm of all epic fiction. But of this there was here no danger. The principle of physical personification, on which the whole Hellenic system was based, afforded ample freedom for expatiating in the most visionary realms of mythological fancy. Every newly explored region of earth or water suggested a fresh stock of representatives for the new objects or ideas which were brought to light. The Cyclopes, for example, Proteus, and other marvels or monsters of the Odyssey, had no place, probably, in the primitive Hellenic pantheon. The fables concerning them obtained currency in the progress of navigation along the shores of the Mediterranean; and, when once familiar in popular legend, they were easily engrafted on the genealogical stem of Olympus. The Cyclopes, types perhaps originally of some newly discovered race of ferocious maritime barbarians, were first admitted as sons of Neptune, gigantic shepherds of the verdant shores of the western deep: afterwards, when the more subtle interpreters of fabulous geography selected Ætna as their place of abode, they became Vulcan's journeymen, forgers of Jupiter's thunderbolts. Circe, who, in her simple capacity of marine enchantress of the remote West, stands in as little connexion with the Greek pantheon as any similar creation of medieval romance, became daughter of the Sun, guarding the gates of his palace and the neighbouring frontier of Erebus; and, in the exercise of her functions, was, like Calypso, Proteus, or Polyphemus, subjected to the presiding powers of Olympus.

In selecting his supernatural mechanism for subjects of higher national interest, it was natural that the poet should prefer those members of the pantheon whose authority was universally received and acknowledged. In the Iliad, accordingly, this rule has been observed. In the Odyssey, he was equally led by the spirit of his subject to give prominence to a more fantastic class of fable. But even there such license is admitted solely in the extra-Hellenic portion of the adventures. Those confined to a Hellenic scene of action are conducted in the Odyssey, as in the Iliad, under the guidance of the same strictly Hellenic class of divine agents.

11. By some modern commentators Homer has been supposed ignorant of the doctrine of human apotheosis, or of the practice of hero-worship, as it prevailed in later Greek superstition. It is true that neither poem contains any specific notice of divine honours paid to deceased heroes. There can, however, be no doubt that this dogma of his national creed, although he may not have allowed it prominence in his fable, was quite familiar to him. Both poems in fact contain frequent allusion to deified mortals. Such are Tithonus and Ganymede in the Iliad; Ino, Hercules, and the Dioscuri in the Odyssey. The same honour conferred by Aurora on Tithonus was destined by Calypso for Ulysses.¹ Persons thus invested with immortal attributes were undoubtedly objects of worship to their admirers or descendants upon earth. There were however, in the general spirit and conduct of Homer's fable, obvious inducements for leaving this feature of the popular pantheon in the background. The contrast between the powers and duties of his heroes and those of his gods was a main spring of his dramatic action. In order to give effect to that contrast it was necessary, on the one hand to magnify the character of his heroes solely as men; on the other, amid the community of the two natures, to secure a clear ascendancy of authority and power to the divine agency. Even admitting therefore, that Achilles and Agamemnon may have been worshipped as gods in the poet's time, as they were in historical ages, they could hardly, without a complete sacrifice of the spirit and propriety of his fable, have been represented as so worshipped in the Iliad. The same rule has been observed by the more distinguished of Homer's successors. The homage paid by the surviving heroes of the Trojan war to Achilles, or by Orestes and Electra to Agamemnon, in the mythology of the tragic poets, differs in no way from that offered by Achilles to Patroclus in the Iliad. The honours conferred are in each case those due merely to departed heroes, not to deified mortals.

12. It would scarcely be doing full justice to this head of subject, were we to take leave of it without devoting a few special remarks to the symbolic or figurative element of Homer's mythological mechanism; or in other words to the question, how far the operations of the gods, in the poet's descriptions, are to be understood in a literal or personal sense; how far they are to be interpreted as shadowing forth some more recondite or mysterious class of physical influence. This question, while in every age a fertile source of error and extravagance, never has formed, nor can form, even when rationally treated, a very agreeable or instructive subject of enlargement, and will here occupy a proportionally limited share of attention.

Setting aside such purely metaphysical abstractions as Eris, Atë, Ossa, the Litæ, and so forth, concerning whose allegorical functions but little difference of opinion can exist, it will not probably be disputed, that all, or most, even of the leading Olympic deities are typical, in their origin at least, of some power of nature, moral or material; that Jupiter and Juno, for example, represent generally the celestial elements; Neptune, the liquid part of the creation; Vulcan, fire; Minerva, the wiser more sagacious, Mercury, the more astute and subtle exercise of human intellect. It were however absurd, on this account, to insist that every performance recorded of any one of these deities is a mere symbol of some actual effect or development of the physical influence over which he is supposed to preside; that the quarrels of Jupiter and Juno, for example, do but typify the conflicts of the atmospheric elements, the alternations of heat and cold, drought and moisture, or other vicissitudes of the weather and the seasons. It would, on the other hand, be unduly straining the principle of literal interpretation, to doubt that, where an easy and natural opening occurred for giving greater prominence to the symbolic ingredient in the character or agency of his gods, the poet would at times avail himself of what might often prove an elegant variety of figurative embellishment. As to the occasions in which any such more extended method of symbolic interpretation may be admissible, the reader's own taste or judgement must supply his best or only rule of distinction. The cases in which that method has been resorted to in the foregoing pages are few, and not, it is presumed, chargeable with undue latitude. Such was the explanation given of the seizure of the hair of the infuriated Achilles by Minerva, at the moment when he is drawing his sword against his commander, as a figure of his own better judgement prompting a less violent, but more effective mode of exacting vengeance for the insult and injury to which he had been subjected. Nor, consistently with a due respect for the taste or correctness of the poet's genius, can the assault of Apollo on Patroclus be taken in any other than a figurative sense. That there is also a more or less symbolic import in the prominence given to Neptune as representative in the Odyssey of the agency hostile to Ulysses, is implied by the pointed terms in which the vindictive influence of the god is restricted to the purely maritime portion of the hero's adventures.¹

ON A PECULIARITY IN THE TREATMENT OF HOMER'S TEXT BY WRITERS OF THE WOLFIAN SCHOOL.

THE authors chiefly distinguished by the perversion of the critical art alluded to in the text are, Hermann (De Interpolat. Homeri, Opusc. vol. v. p. 52.), Lachmann (Betrachtungen über die Ilias), and B. Thiersch (Urgestalt der Odyssee). The method of Heyne and some others, while little less destructive, admits of this apology, that they acknowledge the excellence of the work while questioning the source from which that excellence proceeds. They perceive the beauty of the creation amid the materialism of their views as to its origin. Hermann and Lachmann, on the other hand, with some less eminent fellow-labourers in the same field, glory in their blindness to all higher poetical unity in the Iliad, pronouncing the whole poem a cento or patchwork, for which nothing but a delusion on the part of the old critical public could have obtained credit as a standard of imitation. Hermann, in following out this view, denies accordingly the title of the Iliad to have been the primary model of the Hellenic epopee, in the early purer ages of art. This honour he asserts by preference to some one of the Cyclic poems, to the Æthiopis, for example, or the Cypria, discarding the Iliad as but an abortive attempt of some later clumsy compiler to emulate or surpass those more classical prototypes.¹ After dissipating this phantasmagoria of poetical perfection, which during thirty centuries had deluded successive generations of admirers and critics, he and his coadjutor Lachmann have tantalised us by showing how, had Pisistratus been better qualified for the task he undertook, he might by a more skilful arrangement of the same materials, have produced a poem, or even several, really deserving the reputation which the existing patchwork Iliad has so unworthily usurped. To attempt to confute in detail, by any serious line of argument, the subtleties by which these doctrines have been supported, would be an abuse little short of that of propounding them. The reader is referred to the general remarks in Chapter x. p. 438. sqq. and in Appendix F. p. 512. infra, on the principles against which those subtleties so grievously militate.

APPENDIX B. (p. 218.)

ON THE SUPPOSED VULGATE, OR EDITIO PRINCEPS, OF HOMER, BY PISISTRATUS.

RITSCHL (Die Alexand. Bibl. p. 60. sqq.) would meet the obstacle which the absence of all notice of an Attic or Pisistratid edition of Homer interposes to the claims of the Athenian usurper as original compiler of the poems, by the hypothesis that the editions cited by the Scholiasts under the title of "common," or "vulgar," αἱ κοιναί, or αἱ δημώδεις, represented the text of Pisistratus, considered as the Editio princeps, or Vulgate, which formed the groundwork of all the others. He illustrates this view by the analogy of the Aristarchean text, as the similarly standard authority in later times. The illustration, however, is little apt. In the references to the Aristarchean text, Aristarchus is at least habitually quoted as its editor, while neither Pisistratus nor Athens are ever hinted at in connexion with this supposed Athenian vulgate. Nor upon this view would the citations have been worded in the plural "common editions," αἱ κοιναί. The frequent variation of this phrase into αἱ κοινώτεραι, "the more common," seems in itself conclusive proof that neither expression indicates more than its literal meaning implies; the mass of ordinary, probably nameless, texts current in later ages, as distinct from the few of more recognised authority. Add to this that the Greek technical term for vulgate text or reading is παράδοσις. It is habitually applied in that sense to the text by Aristarchus, and would without doubt have been similarly applied to that of Pisistratus had any such existed, or had any similar authority attached to it. See the passages cited by Bekker in Append. ad Scholl. p. 826.

APPENDIX C. (p. 254.)

SUPPLEMENTARY REMARKS ON THE UNITY OF THE MECHANICAL STRUCTURE OF THE ILIAD.

IN order to save an accumulation of details, two principal heads of mutual reference have been omitted in the above Concordance. The one would have comprised the passages illustrative of the unvarying partisanship of the same cause by the same deities: Juno, Minerva, Neptune, being ranged from first to last on the side of the Greeks; Apollo, Mars, Venus, on that of the Trojans; while Jove is impartial. This consistency might, with better reason perhaps than in some other parallel cases, be explained as a result of the "common genius" of the heroic tradition. Yet it is somewhat remarkable, that Euripides (Troad. init.), after some older epic authority it may safely be presumed, describes Neptune as throughout the siege the warm friend of the Trojans, whose bitterest enemy he appears in the Iliad.

The other case of harmonious concordance in such recurring details, to which no special prominence has been given in our Epitome, is the disappearance from the field, throughout the remainder of the action, of the heroes successively slain in the earlier engagements. It seems inconceivable that any universal or unanimous tradition as to the vicissitudes of the ten years' war should have agreed in representing the following six heroes of principal note, Elephenor chief of the Eubœans¹, Tlepolemus of the Rhodians², Pandarus of the Lycians³, Odus of the Halizonians⁴, Pirous and Acamas of the Thracians⁵, besides many of secondary distinction, as all killed in the first battle after the secession of Achilles; or consequently, that any number of "independent poets" should have so harmoniously dispensed with the services of all six in the sequel. The well-known single exception therefore to this rule of consistency, in the case of Pylæmenes⁶, can admit of but two reasonable solutions. It is either an oversight of the poet; or verses 658—9 of the XIIIth book are, as their own internal evidence seems also strongly to imply, an early interpolation by some popular rhapsodist, better versed in the "Battle of the Ships" as his habitual part in the recital than in the "Prowess of Diomed."

The mind of the same poet is also curiously exhibited by Homer's partiality for certain names in the adjustment of his fictitious characters, or "men of buckram," as they may be called; the accumulation of which names, unconsciously perhaps on his part, creates some trouble to hypercritical readers. Thus in xi. 578, we have one Apisaon among the crowd of slain warriors, and another in xvii. 348., both Trojans; in xv. 515. we have a Schedius, and again in xvii. 306., both Phocians; the common names being distinguished in each case by different patronymics. The author has not himself had leisure to carry this analysis of heroic synonymes through the action of the Iliad. The following curious list, however, is subjoined from the text of the Venetian scholiast¹: "There are two charioteers named Eury-medon, both Greeks; one in the service of Agamemnon, the other in that of Nestor. There are two heralds named Eurybates, both Greeks; one in the service of Agamemnon, the other in that of Ulysses. There are three Adrasti, all Trojans; one killed by Diomed, another by Menelaus, a third by Patroclus. There are two Acamantes, both Trojans, distinguished by their different patronymics; two Astynoi, both Trojans; two Pylastæ, both Trojans; two Pisandri, both Trojans; two Ennomi, both Trojans." Such coincidences might, in their sameness and their distinction, occur naturally to the same poet, but were not likely to have suggested themselves to a number of different poets.

SUPPLEMENTARY REMARKS ON THE RELATION OF THE CATALOGUE TO THE REST OF THE POEM.

It is certainly very remarkable, considering the wide opening afforded by the peculiar character of the "Catalogue" to interpolation or corruption, how slender an amount of such imputation, if any, apart from the few verses stigmatised on more or less valid grounds by the antients themselves, the ingenuity of the subtlest modern commentators has been able to substantiate. The discrepancies, for example, pointed out by K. O. Müller² (who has dwelt in special detail on this head of sceptical argument), between the Catalogue and the body of the poem, however undeniable according to the letter, seem not only to vanish when judged in the spirit of the joint text, but even to afford fresh evidence of unity. Thus "Meges, son of Phyleus," it is urged, "is described in the Catalogue as a chieftain of Dulichium in Acarnania; but, in the Battle of the Ships, he is found leading on the troops of Elis, a state situated on the opposite coast of Peloponnesus." The anomaly however is explained by the fact that Phyleus, the father of Meges, was a prince of Elis who had settled on the Acarnanian territory. What more natural than that, in the vicissitudes of an eventful conflict with an alien enemy, the colonist should be found assisting in marshalling the troops¹ of the parent state? Equally groundless is another similar imputation of discrepancy, in the case of Medon, a Locrian chief settled as a colonist in Thessaly. "This hero," it has been objected, "is invested in the Catalogue with the command of the troops of Philoctetes, a Thessalian prince disabled by disease from appearing on the field. But, during the Battle of the Ships, the same Medon is found helping to rally and lead on the troops of another neighbouring Thessalian state." We can imagine nothing more natural or probable. Such self-adjusting anomalies, if anomalies they can be called, are even better evidence of genuine origin than any rigid observance of historical or geographical precision. With regard to the anachronism which the same Müller would discover in the poet's description of the Cadmean territory as already in the hands of the Bœotians at the epoch of the Trojan war, it seems, under any circumstances, very questionable whether the authority of Thucydides is to be held as better than that of Homer in so purely legendary a matter.² But that the anachronism, admitting it to exist, should be chargeable on an interpolator, rather than on the author of the original poem, is, in the face more especially of Il. v. 710., xiii. 685., xiv. 476., xv. 330., xvii. 597., an altogether gratuitous assumption. Little less arbitrary and far-fetched is the hypothesis of the same critic, that the Arcadians, as a "Pelasgian" people, could not have taken part in a war waged by the Hellenic confederacy.

The admission also objected to by Müller, of the petty islands of

¹ He does nothing more. Müller's statement that Meges is represented in this passage (xiii. 692.) as "king of the Epeans dwelling in Elis" rests on no other authority but that of Müller himself.

² The appeal to Thucydides (i. xii.) seems indeed at the best, somewhat out of place, admitting, as he does, on Homer's authority that there were Bœotians in the Theban territory at the time of the Trojan war, although the greater body of that people were then resident in Thessaly.

Cos, Syme, Nisyros, and others to a place in the list, on either the Greek or the Trojan side, may seem strange, no doubt, in itself. But the anomaly certainly supplies a better argument of eccentricity in a single original poet, or of some peculiarity in the legend which he followed, than of later rhapsodical interpolation. For what more improbable than that Ionian or Attic compilers should have been at pains to confer the high privilege of a place in the Catalogue on these insignificant islets; while Chios, Samos, and other illustrious seats of Ionian power and splendour in the immediate neighbourhood, are passed over with contempt. Among other more trivial arguments of Müller, that founded on the case of the augur Ennomus (Il. II. 860., conf. XXI.), if good for anything, must at least be extended, not only to the case of Antiphus in the Odyssey (II. 19., IX. 288. sqq.), but to that of Leucaspis in the Æneid (VI. 334., conf. I. 113. sqq.). The passages of the Iliad and Odyssey, it may be added, here mutually illustrate each other and the usage of the poet in such cases.

ON THE PHÆACIANS OF THE ODYSSEY: THEIR RACE AND COUNTRY.

THE probability that Homer had some particular people in view in his Phæacian episode has already been suggested by Welcker¹, in an ingenious essay on the subject in the Rheinische Museum. He supposes the poet's Ionian fellow-countrymen to be the race whose habits are here portrayed. The author of this work has been led to a different opinion by certain coincidences between the characters and descriptive epithets of the Phæacian heroes and those of the Phœnician navigators, who figure so largely in parts of the Odyssey; also by similar coincidences between the names of Phæacian localities and parallel phrases occurring in the early geographical vocabulary of the Phœnician colonies. These analogies are of so very striking and peculiar a nature, as to have impressed on his mind, not otherwise much disposed to indulge in such speculations, a strong conviction that it is a colony of these Oriental adventurers in some part of the Western Mediterranean which here forms the butt of Homer's playful satire. Both Phæacians and Phœnicians are represented by him as enthusiastically devoted to navigation; both are characterised by an epithet denoting "magnificence" or "ostentation," the special characteristics of the Phæacians. The parallel passages are here subjoined:—

Od. vii. 39. τὸν δ' ἄρα Φαίηκες ναυσίκλυτοι οὐκ ἐνόησαν.

xv. 41. ἔνθα δὲ Φοίνικες ναυσίκλυτοι ἤλυθον ἄνδρες.

viii. 191. Φαίηκες δολιχέρητμοι ναυσίκλυτοι ἄνδρες.

xiii. 272. αὐτὰρ ἐγὼν ἐπὶ νῆα κίων Φοίνικας ἀγαυοὺς ἑλλισάμην. . . .

xiii. 120. ἐκ δὲ κτήματ' ἔειραν ἃ οἱ Φαίηκες ἀγαυοὶ

The point of the parallel would here obviously be sharpened by the punning connexion, in the true spirit of Homeric humour, between the names Φαίηκες and Φοίνικες. Add to this that the name of the poet's seafaring islanders finds its appropriate etymology in the Oriental word Phaik, "magnificent," of which their favourite epithet ἀγαυοί is a Greek translation. The name of their city and port, Scheria, deducting the Greek ending, finds an equally apt interpretation in the Phœnician word Scher, "emporium," "busy port."² The Phæacians are further described by the poet as formerly settled at Hyperea, in the neighbourhood of the "Cyclopes,"³ and as having been expelled from that region by their overbearing neighbours. Admitting, with Fazelli and Stolberg, that the Lilybæan promontory of Sicily is the locality figured by the poet as the land of the Cyclopes, a view to which the author's own study of the poet's text in those regions led him readily to subscribe, the Phæacians might thus be supposed to figure one of the numerous Phœnician colonies originally settled on that line of coast, which had been driven by the barbarous indigenes to seek a new country in some distant part of the Mediterranean. Whether that country was Corcyra, or some other region, may be a question. Here, again, we have a remarkable coincidence between the name Hyperea of the Odyssey, and Hipparis, the title of a district and river of the same Sicilian coast originally possessed by Phœnicians, afterwards called Camarina when occupied by the Greeks. Hyperea is obviously a mere Greek poetical variation of Hipparis.⁴ That Homer was sufficiently conversant with the language of the Phœnician navigators to admit of his turning his knowledge to account in the humorous element of the Odyssey may safely be assumed, as well from his apparent familiarity with their habits, as from their almost entire occupation of the Mediterranean commerce at this period, and the consequent probability, or even necessity, of his having acquired his stock of more distant geographical knowledge, mythical or real, in voyages performed in their company. Various other evidences of Homer's knowledge of the Phœnician tongue might be derived from his own text; but the train of inquiry which their full consideration would involve would be out of place on the present occasion.¹

An objection to the above view of the spirit of the Phæacian episode might perhaps be discovered in the lively fantastic genius of the imaginary race of Scheria, so different from the gravity, or even gloom, which we are in the habit of associating with the character of the natives of Palestine. There are, however, exceptions to every rule; and, in the case of a Phœnician community which happened to be really distinguished by frivolous or flighty habits, the contrast between those habits and the usual characteristics of the race might even add zest to the satire.

ON THE "SELF-CONTRADICTIONS" OF VIRGIL, MILTON, CERVANTES, WALTER SCOTT, AND OTHER POPULAR AUTHORS, AS COMPARED WITH THOSE OF HOMER.

THE self-contradictions of the Æneid have been collected and illustrated by the author of this work in an article of the British and Foreign Review for October, 1839 (No. ix.); which essay he has been gratified to find has not been without influence on the judgement of the British public.² The list here subjoined has been limited to a selection of certain cases of a more concise and palpable nature. For others still more important, but involving a more extended line of textual analysis, the reader is referred to the essay itself.

I. At v. 567. sq. of book II., Helen is represented, during the sack of Troy, as hiding herself in the Temple of Vesta; as shunning alike the presence of victor and vanquished, from each of whom she equally feared the retributive vengeance due to the author of their common disasters; and as apprehensive, above all, of the wrath of her husband Menelaus. In book vi. 511. sqq., the same Helen is described as having been the accomplice of the Greeks in their stratagem, as having herself given the signal for their issue from their ambush, and as having with her own hand opened the gates of the Trojan palace to Menelaus.

II. At v. 16. of book II. the Wooden horse is said to have been made of fir; at v. 112. it is made of maple wood; and at v. 186. it is made of oak.

III. In book II. 781., the shade of Creusa solemnly announces to Æneas that he is to seek his future destination and seat of empire "in Hesperia and on the banks of the Tiber." But at the opening of book III. we find the hero altogether unconscious of any such prediction, and wandering

Incertus quo fata ferant, ubi sistere detur.

Soon after, as practical evidence of his ignorance, he lands, and quietly commences the foundation of his new city on the opposite coast of Thrace, a few miles from the Troad; and when, in the sequel, Apollo himself (154. sqq., conf. 172.) again announces his appointed restingplace to be "Hesperia and the banks of the Tiber," he is quite bewildered and astonished at the news.

IV. The winds employed by Æolus to scatter the Trojan fleet in book I. 85. sqq. are Eurus, Notus, Africus, and Aquilo; yet Orontes, the noblest victim of that disaster (I. 113.), is introduced (vi. 334.) in the infernal regions as having fallen a sacrifice to the fury of Auster, a wind which, by reference to the previous text, was altogether guiltless of his death; while the other hero, Leucaspis, here described as drowned on the same occasion, is never mentioned at all in the description of the storm.

V. By reference to 52. sq. 193. 309. sqq. of book IV., Æneas left Dido in midwinter. On his disembarcation, however, in Sicily a few days afterwards, the description of the green grass and serene sky, of the crowns of leafy poplars, and of the gar-lands of rosy flowers (book v. passim), plainly indicate that in that island it was already summer or advanced spring.

VI. In book iv. 310., Æneas is described as sailing from Africa with the wind Aquilo; somewhat strangely, as the south, not the north, wind was required for his voyage to Europe. The blunder is corrected by the poet (or compiler of the poem) at the expense of another broad self-contradiction in iv. 562., where we are told it was Zephyrus. This statement is again contradicted in book v. 2., and it is now reasserted to have been Aquilo.

VII. In book v. 659., the Trojan women, wearied by their long voyage, attempt to burn the fleet, in order to secure a permanent settlement in Sicily. Æneas, in consequence, decides to leave them behind in that island (715.). They now implore to be allowed to accompany their male relatives, but Æneas is obdurate and sails without them (765. sqq.). Yet in the opening of the seventh book, we find the hero's nurse Cajeta dying on the voyage to Latium. Soon after (ix. 216. 284.) the mother of Euryalus also reappears on the scene; and the poet (217.) informs us that "this matron alone, of all the Trojan females, had preferred sharing the fortunes of the fleet to abiding by the flesh-pots of Acestes in Sicily;" a flat contradiction both of his previous notice of Cajeta, and of the statement in book v. 765., that the whole of the Trojan women were anxious to proceed, but had been refused a passage by Æneas.

VIII. In book x. 496. sqq., Turnus, after killing Pallas, appropriates the young hero's belt as the sole trophy of his victory, generously delivering up the body, otherwise unspoiled, to the comrades of the slain chief, who bear it off on his shield. In book xi. 91. this account is falsified, and the funeral pile of Pallas is said to be decorated with his spear and helmet alone, "as the rest of his arms," consequently shield, cuirass, and greaves, "had remained in the possession of Turnus."

IX. The close of the tenth book leaves the reader in the middle of a great battle, and the concluding lines describe the death of a distinguished Latin warrior by the hand of Æneas:

Undantique animam diffundit in arma cruore.

The eleventh book resumes the interrupted tale in the following manner:

Oceanum interea surgens Aurora reliquit.

The consistency of the poet (or compiler) can here only be saved by assuming this battle to have been fought during the night, and to have been interrupted by the rising sun.

It is to be regretted that Professors Hermann and Lachmann should not have extended to Virgil also their ingenious researches into the theory of "Homeric" self-contradiction. Had they done so, they would have infallibly proved the Æneid, by the same conclusive arguments employed in the case of the Iliad, to be a mere cento of popular Roman ballads clumsily strung together by the book-maker of the Augustan age who vulgarly passes as the poet of the entire Æneid.

The few examples here subjoined from other works are merely such as have incidentally presented themselves in the course of the author's reading; a closer analysis of the text of some of these compositions might perhaps supply as heavy a catalogue as that derived from the text of Virgil.

Milton informs us, that, when the Messiah came down from heaven to judge our guilty first parents after the Fall, Satan, shunning His presence, returned to hell by night (x. 341.). On his way he meets Sin and Death on their road to Paradise in the morning (x. 329.). After Sin and Death had arrived in Paradise, Adam is represented as lamenting aloud to himself "through the still night" (x. 846.). The ensuing day (assuming day to have now at length really dawned) is afterwards described by the same Adam in one place as the day of the Fall (x. 962.); in another place it is described as a day several days subsequent to that of the Fall (x. 1050.).

"The creation of man is represented by Milton as a consequence of the vacuity left in heaven by the expulsion of the rebel angels; yet Satan himself mentions it as a report rife in heaven before his own rebellion." Elsewhere "the angel speaks of 'timorous deer' before deer were yet timorous, or at least before Adam could understand the comparison."¹

In Lucian's *Timon*², Jupiter declares that for a long time past he had paid no attention whatever to the affairs of Athens; that he had not so much as turned his eyes in that direction; and the reason he assigns is, that the orators and sophists had filled the city with such an incessant clamour that he could no longer hear the prayers of his worshippers. In the immediate sequel, however³, he describes how, a day or two before, he had broken two of his best thunderbolts in a bad shot at Anaxagoras, teaching impiety in his school in that city.

The same Lucian in his "True History"¹ of Hades, gives an account of a lawsuit between Theseus and Menelaus before the tribunal of Rhadamanthus, each litigant claiming Helen as his lawful wife. Soon after, however, the historian² tells us that women were common property in Hades, and that nobody troubled himself with jealousies about such matters. This again is contradicted in the sequel³, where Menelaus is described as prosecuting Helen before the same tribunal for her adulteries with Narcissus; and summary punishment is inflicted on both her and her paramour.

Walter Scott, in *Rob Roy*⁴, first describes the adventure in the Collegè church of Glasgow as on the week day devoted, according to Presbyterian custom, to the sacramental fast; but in the sequel the same transaction is made to take place on a Sunday.

In the Antiquary of the same author the scene is laid on the east coast of Scotland; yet, in the adventure of the storm on the beach, the sun is seen setting in the sea. Either, therefore (upon Wolfian principles), the sun, in Sir Walter's astronomy, must have set in the East, or this chapter is by a different hand.

The self-contradictions of Cervantes in his Don Quixote equal, or probably exceed in number, the whole collective mass of those in the Iliad, Odyssey, and Æneid united. Of the seventy chapters comprised in the second part of the work, there are few but contain statements totally irreconcilable with others occurring in previous or subsequent portions of the narrative. To analyse these discordances in detail would require a dissertation apart. A summary of them will be found in the "Chronological Plan" of the work prefixed to vol. i. of Jarvis's translation, ed. 1801.

The reader may judge for himself from these examples, the number of which might probably be augmented ad nauseam, of the value of Hermann's dogma, so formally and authoritatively laid down as the fundamental principle of his own school of Homeric criticism, "that no two passages of the same work contradictory to, or irreconcilable with, each other can be by one and the same author."⁵

OF the casuistry by which any argument in favour of the poet's own unity, which may be derived from the unity of his chronology, has been set aside, or rather perverted, there is a curious example in Heyne's elaborate analysis of the chronology of the Iliad.¹ He admits that no such discordance can be detected as to afford clear evidence of a previous independence of parts. The inference then, it may be presumed, is favourable to a single genuine Homer. Far from it: "Such subtlety is inconsistent with the free genius of the primitive bard, and betrays the artifice of the grammarian." In the sequel² however he observes, that although the general reckoning is correct, yet more events are here and there accumulated within a given time than could well have been accomplished. Here then surely is a redeeming point on the side of primitive artlessness. Not a whit: "The grammarian has but hampered himself by over-sedulity in the redaction of his stock of materials!" This is a species of two-edged logic which nothing can resist, and places the original genius of the poet as much at the mercy of those who wield it with such dexterity, as the lamb at the fountain was at the mercy of the wolf in the fable. Do what he will he must be in the wrong. If the waters are muddled, it is his fault that they are not pure; if they are pure, it is no merit of his that they are not muddled. The disingenuous partiality of this commentary appears the more glaring, if it be contrasted with the facility with which the same Heyne, in his parallel commentary on the Æneid of Virgil³, overlooks or excuses the really flagrant chronological discrepancies of that poem. The fact that, while scarcely any two commentators have been able to agree as to the duration of the action of the Iliad, their speculations fluctuating between forty and fifty-three days⁴, no palpable discrepancy has ever been detected in the poet's reckoning, is in itself, on Heyne's own principle, a powerful argument in favour of spontaneous simplicity against studied artifice of arrangement.

CHAPTER XII.

HOMER. STYLE OF THE POEMS. EPIC COMMONPLACE AND PARALLEL PASSAGE.

1. OF REITERATION, OR COMMONPLACE, IN POPULAR EPIC COMPOSITION. —
2. ITS VALUE IN POETICAL STYLE. — 3. EXAMPLES FROM THE HIGHER WALKS OF POETRY. — 4. PARALLEL PASSAGE, AS DISTINCT FROM EPIC COMMONPLACE, IN HOMER. — 5. CRITERIA FOR DRAWING THE DISTINCTION.
— 6. EXAMPLES FROM EACH POEM.

1. THE term Style, like various others in the vocabulary of modern criticism, is one of somewhat indefinite import. It will here be taken in its widest admissible sense, as denoting all those distinguishing features of the poems, in language, sentiment, or imagery, which do not properly rank under any one of the three previous heads, of Action, Characters, or Divine mechanism.

Of reiteration, or commonplace, in popular epic composition.

As in the preceding chapter, the Iliad and Odyssey will here form the subject of joint consideration. This arrangement becomes the more important, or even indispensable, in the present case, owing to the number of parallel passages in each poem, and the momentous bearing of those passages on the question of common authorship. Of the materials properly belonging to this head of inquiry a portion has already been anticipated, especially in the chapters devoted to portraiture of character. Some of those texts will again require to be taken into account, by whoever would do full justice to the argument of unity which they supply.

A preliminary question here offers itself, of vital importance to the ensuing analysis: How far those features of the poems which form its subject are to be considered as peculiar to Homer, how far as common to his age or school of poetry. This question resolves itself very much into another, relative to the nature and value of a peculiarity of Homeric style, above frequently alluded to under the name of "epic repetition," or "commonplace," and which will here demand a somewhat closer examination.

This peculiarity, it must be observed, is not confined to Homer or to the poetry of the Greeks, but is common to the narrative composition, both in prose and verse, of other nations in a primitive state of society. It reflects in fact the simplicity of the age which relished it, as contrasted with the more studied art of refined periods of literature. It is exemplified accordingly in similar, perhaps still more striking forms, in the Hebrew Scriptures and in the ballad poetry of the modern middle ages.

When in the course of a prolonged narrative the same facts or descriptions require to be recapitulated, the usage of a more advanced stage of literature requires a certain variety in the terms employed, and the neglect of this rule exposes an author to the charge of dryness or tautology. The early Greek public was not so punctilious, but was contented in many cases with a repetition of the same words; and although a later, more fastidious taste may disdain to conform to this method, yet the critical reader, far from being offended by it in the primitive Muse, appreciates it as an element of that nervous vigour of expression which forms a peculiar charm of her style. That this judgement is correct, it will not, in so far as such matters admit of tangible demonstration, be difficult to show.

The duty of diversifying the connecting commonplaces of a narrative, the modes for example of specifying, in the course of a long dialogue, the deposition and resumption of the discourse by the speakers, is often one of the most irksome to which the modern author is subjected. From these obstructions to the easy flow of his ideas the old poet was comparatively free. On the first few occasions where statements requiring repetition occurred, he instinctively selected such forms of expression as appeared most appropriate and euphonous. But the facility of varying these forms would hardly be in proportion to the frequency of their recurrence; nor would he be inclined severely to task his invention for the sake of such variety. So constant an effort to impart novelty to statements in themselves devoid of intrinsic poetical value, would seem to him but imposing fetters on his genius, by forcing it to dwell on the mere mechanical element of his art, when bent on matters of higher poetical interest. He would therefore be content to reproduce the same idea in the same terms; not indeed with a slavish adherence to the same words, but under such partial modifications as his own taste, or incidental circumstances might suggest.

But the old poet was not satisfied merely with such repetitions, the τὸν δ' ἀπαμειβόμενος for example, or τὸν δ' αὖτε προσέειπε, as naturally offered themselves; he evidently takes pleasure in accumulating them. This tendency in Homer is chiefly observable in his dramatic management. One person, for instance, is intrusted by another with a commission, and receives instructions as to what he is to say or do. In the sequel the fulfilment of his orders, whether by word or action, is recapitulated in the precise terms used by his employer. A modern poet would have been contented, in the second stage of the transaction, with simply informing his reader that the message had been delivered or the commission executed. Of the many such passages occurring in each poem, the mission of Minerva by Jupiter, in the second book of the Iliad, with directions to quell the tumult among the Greek troops, may be selected as an example. The Goddess, having determined to employ Ulysses as the human agent for effecting this object, delivers her own injunctions to him in the very same words, with the same introductory reflections, previously addressed by her father to herself.

Its value
style.

2. It is always difficult to trace the more subtle mechanism by which the taste is regulated in nice questions of art or literature. There seems however, to be no principle better founded in reason or experience, than that a just blending of uniformity and variety is a principal source of excellence in every branch of elegant art. The art of versification itself is based on this principle. Rhythm, still more rhyme in the modern sense, is a sacrifice of variety to uniformity, for the sake of harmony in the arrangement of words and sounds. The early epic poet extended this principle to the arrangement of phrases and ideas; and as the modern public takes pleasure in the recurrence of the same numbers and terminations, the primitive audience delighted in the recurrence, on appropriate occasions, of the same verses or passages. The effect is similar to that of the burden or chorus in lyric poetry, an expedient so popular in the national songs of every country and age. As Homer's preference for the dramatic mode of conducting his action, imparts to many portions of the Iliad and Odyssey the spirit of a scene in a tragedy, so the repetition of harmonious verses or texts often contributes much to that choric effect, which he has plainly been desirous of infusing into other portions of each work. The primitive epopee and the choric ode being both destined for public recital, the recurrence in either of spirited passages already familiar to the poet's hearers also tended, apart from its musical effect, to secure their more immediate personal interest in the performance. Another obvious advantage of the practice was the aid it afforded to the memory, by supplying the reciter with a sort of pause or restingplace for meditating on the less trite and easy portions of his task. The recapitulation of messages by the parties concerned, also conduced to his favourite object of transferring the conduct of the action from himself to his heroes.

It is remarkable that many of the passages in which this peculiarity is most broadly exemplified, are descriptive of objects of that homely character which may appear least adapted for poetical embellishment; such as the toilet of the heroes, the preparation of their meals, and other matters of everyday life. Yet it is evident, as well from the frequency of their recurrence, as their length and precision of detail, that such descriptions were agreeable to the poet's audience. This forms another peculiarity of the primitive epic muse, which, however repugnant to modern practice, gratifies rather than offends even modern taste in the page of Homer. The apparent anomaly has been explained, and to a certain extent with reason, by the charm of classical or antiquarian association attached to the manners represented. There can indeed be no doubt, that the interest which a graphic description of any popular custom by a contemporary author, excites in the public of a remote posterity, is often in the ratio of the homeliness rather than the dignity of the objects described; just as the shelves, counters, and domestic utensils of the shops and houses of Pompeii, or the scribbling of the populace on the walls of the streets, awaken even a livelier emotion in the classical traveller, than the porticos, temples, or theatres of that wonderful city. But this explanation, however applicable to the modern public, cannot obviously hold good of the audience for whom the passages were originally composed. To them the description of one of their own meals or suits of wearing apparel, was no matter either of novelty or curiosity. The peculiarity therefore, in their case, requires to be otherwise accounted for.

It seems but to reflect a feeling more or less common in every simple state of society. The mere embellishment, by means of imitative art, of objects of domestic or familiar interest, is at all times a source of gratification to popular taste. Hence it is that in the present day, the inferior order of dilettanti prefer a picture of a greengrocer's shop or a Dutch alehouse, by Mieris or Teniers, to the Last Supper or the School of Athens. But in an age when simplicity of manners and tastes was common to all classes, and before the different orders of composition had been defined and distinguished, the same rule would extend to the art of the poet, in portraying and adorning the inferior as well as the nobler occupations or pursuits of his hearers. Apart indeed from all influence of classical association, even the modern reader experiences a certain charm in the spirit and harmony of many of these descriptions, which may enable him to appreciate their still livelier effect on those to whom they were originally addressed; the delight, for instance, of the old mariner, on hearing the minute details of his former occupation adorned by all the imitative graces of poetical diction, with which Homer has so frequently dressed them up. Accordingly, there is scarcely an object of familiar interest to a primitive public, which the poet has not occasionally ennobled by such descriptive amplification. This is in fact a characteristic of popular story-telling in every age, and numerous examples, closely parallel to that above referred to in Homer's treatment of the art of navigation, might be added, not merely from the text of Scripture, but from popular modern romances, whose authors take pleasure in circumstantial descriptions of the working or rigging of ships, such as can be intelligible but to a limited portion of their readers.¹

Examples

3. But the value of this primitive epic usage is also displayed in a higher class of poetical mechanism. It has been remarked by writers on the Sublime, that objects not individually distinguished for grandeur or beauty, may awaken admiration or awe by the uniformity of their repetition. "A single sound of some strength," says Burke, "if repeated at certain intervals has a grand effect;" and he extends the remark to a continuous series of visible objects. This doctrine he illustrates, as to sound, by a succession of cannon shots, the beat of a drum, or the tolling of a bell; in space, by prolonged rows of columns or arches. The rule may be transferred to the recurrence of similar forms of expression in poetical narrative. Where a series of kindred facts or objects is carried steadily to a climax or catastrophe, the effect may be greatly enhanced by uniformity in the terms of their description. These however are questions, which a single pointed example will always better illustrate than volumes of disquisition. The passage here subjoined, while familiar probably to every reader, is perhaps the earliest as well as noblest of its class. In the opening chapter of the Book of Job, the sudden fall of the patriarch from the height of worldly prosperity to abject misery is thus described :

And there was a day when his sons and daughters were eating and drinking wine in their eldest brother's house.

And there came a messenger unto Job and said: the oxen were ploughing and the asses feeding beside them, and the Sabæans fell upon them and took them away; yea they have slain the servants with the edge of the sword, and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

While he was yet speaking, there came also another and said: the fire of God is fallen from heaven, and hath burnt up

x. 30.; ix. 2. sqq., conf. xxii. 5. sqq.), and many other prose compositions, both ancient and modern, in primitive style.

the sheep and the servants, and consumed them, and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

While he was yet speaking, there came also another and said: the Chaldeans made out three bands, and fell upon the camels, and have carried them away, yea, and have slain the servants with the edge of the sword, and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

While he was yet speaking, there came also another and said: thy sons and thy daughters were eating and drinking wine in their eldest brother's house; and behold there came a great wind from the wilderness and smote the four corners of the house, and it fell upon the young men, and they are dead, and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

Then Job arose, and rent his mantle, and shaved his head¹, and fell down upon the ground. . . .

There can be no doubt that the recurrence of the same forms of expression in the connecting clauses of the narrative, contributes greatly to the unparalleled splendour of this passage. It is the reiterated uniformity of the announcements, which chiefly brings home to the mind the overwhelming effect of the series of calamities on the sufferer, and renders so electrifying the transition at the close, from the stupefaction at first created, to his paroxysm of desperate but submissive woe. The effect may be compared to that of successive blows of increasing strength, inflicted by some stunning weapon on the head, spreading at first over the frame a torpor, which on their being repeated to a certain excess gives place to violent convulsion. Were the studied varieties of phraseology, with which the Muse of a politer age would have diversified the fatal messages, to be substituted for this simple reiteration, the whole charm would be dissolved. It is evident, on the other hand, that no modern poet could venture to resort to the same means, or succeed consequently in producing the same result. There cannot be a more striking proof, both of the mode in which the refinements of poetical art deprive its professors of its best materials, and of that anomaly in the faculty of taste which admits of our admiring, through the force of sympathy, in one case, what we condemn or ridicule in another.¹

While neither Iliad nor Odyssey supplies any passage closely parallel to the above, nor perhaps does their subject afford opening for any similar description, each poem contains numbers, equally illustrative of the value of recurring phrases in securing precision and emphasis to the details of a narrative. Such is the succession of introductory forms in the Shield of Achilles, and the Descent to Hades; such, to quote a more tangible example, are the spirited lines describing the embarkation of Ulysses and his crew at the various stages of their maritime wanderings, repeated from time to time in the course of the hero's narrative, and imparting, by their periodical recurrence, both distinctness to the vicissitudes of the voyage, and life and rapidity to its course: IX. 103.

ἔξῃς δ' ἐζόμενοι πολλὴν ἄλλα τύπτον ἑρετμοῖς.²

² Conf. 179. 471. 563., iv. 579., xi. 637., xii. 146. 180., xv. 221. 548. See also, in the same series of narrative, ix. 161—168. 556., x. 183. 476., xii. 29., xix. 424.; ix. 62. 105. 565., x. 77. 133.; ix. 82., x. 28. 80., xii. 447.

Peculiar, on the other hand, to Homer is the skill with which he has availed himself of this courtesy of primitive art, in giving force and precision to his pictures of human character. Sometimes, as has been seen, the distinctive temper or disposition of the individual is stereotyped, as it were, by certain congenial forms of expression or sentiment, which he is made to utter, from time to time, in an easy and natural manner on fitting occasions. Sometimes modes of action equally natural and appropriate, are similarly embodied in uniform or closely parallel phraseology. The same agency has been no less effectively employed in both poems to characterise the more delicate affections or passions, not as peculiar to individuals but common to the species at large.

4. Attention must now be directed somewhat more narrowly to the question: How far such repetition in the two poems, whether as a general feature of their style or in special passages, is to be considered as representing the genius of their author, how far the manner of his age or school of poetry. The want of some such critical distinction has been one of the most serious obstacles to accurate views in the entire controversial element of Homeric criticism. While on the one hand the sceptical commentators, by comprehending under one sweeping denomination of epic mannerism the whole mass of cases in which this feature displays itself, have summarily disembarassed themselves of one of the chief obstacles to their doctrine, their opponents, by either conceding or acquiescing in the propriety of this decision, have committed the double error, of not only throwing aside one of their own best weapons of defence, but allowing their adversaries to wield it to their discomfiture.

Parallel passage, as distinct from epic commonplace, in Homer.

It will be admitted that the most effectual means of estimating unity of origin in any work, are the parallel passages of its text. The productions of poetical genius, especially genius of the highest order, cannot fail to be distinguished by marked eccentricities or peculiarities from the efforts of the inferior brothers of the art. But in a poet of Homer's age, such peculiarities would necessarily be embodied, in a great proportion of cases, in the same or similar forms of expression; or in other words, the parallel passages which exhibit the proper features of Homer's art, must range themselves in great part under this same general head of "Homeric commonplace." It is evident therefore, how indispensable some rule of distinction must here be to a right estimate of his style. To confound these parallel passages, so characteristic of its exclusive power and spirit, with the mere conventional routine of epic mannerism, were to shut our eyes to the brightest mirror in which the higher excellence of his genius is reflected.

The texts in which the correspondence here in question can reasonably be ascribed to such conventional usage, or the mannerism of a school, must be limited solely or chiefly to objects or ideas equally within the apprehension of all the disciples of that school; to the wording of certain turns of the narrative or dialogue, or to familiar matters of descriptive and illustrative detail. That much of the habitual phraseology in the Iliad and Odyssey is of this nature there can be no doubt, being common to the works of other early epic poets. There exists indeed no evidence in any particular case, that it was already the manner of a school in Homer's own day; it being certain, not only that his poems are the most antient monuments of their class, but that they were adopted as models of obsequious imitation by his successors. Hence, as has also happened with some of the fathers of modern poetry, whose popularity caused their works to be received as standards of excellence, modes of expression originally proper to Homer himself would become in the sequel common to his disciples or plagiarists. It is therefore very probable, that many, even of those texts now habitually, and not unreasonably, classed as epic commonplace, may shadow forth, in the vigour and harmony of their expression, the same high order of inventive talent displayed in passages of a nobler range of poetical conception.

5. But when such repetitions are found extending to the higher philosophy of poetry, to that deep knowledge of human nature and character, to those lofty eccentricities, in a word, which distinguish the great original genius from the ordinary race of versifiers, the case is different. Here the reiteration forfeits altogether its character of vulgar commonplace, and assumes that of parallel passage. That touches of such force and feeling as are conveyed in many of these texts, embodying the noblest conceptions of Homer's genius, recurring always on suitable occasions, with so easy an unconsciousness of manner, and under the same features of genuine originality, should be but draughts from a common fund of poetical "shreds and patches," the bequest of an inferior race of epic formalists, is incredible. Take, for example, the ejaculation with which Achilles is wont to dismiss a painful or mortifying subject :

distinction.

This trait, so graphically shadowing forth one of the more delicate features of so extraordinary a character, renewed at widely different intervals, slightly varied to suit the occasion, and with so native a simplicity of effect that the severest scrutiny cannot detect a symptom of greater or less originality in one case than in another, is yet, after all, like the αὐτὰρ ἔπειτα or τὸν δ' ἀπαμειβόμενος, but a Homeric form. It has, consequently, never attracted the notice of a single commentator, as illustrative of its author's skill in portraying character, still less of unity in the composition of the poem. Yet the attention even of the mere technical grammarian might have been drawn to the following considerations: first, that the passage occurs in the Iliad alone, among the extant works of the Homeric school; secondly, that it is there confined to Achilles alone; and, thirdly, that the word προτετύχθαι, the most prominent of its phrases, occurs but these three times in the entire Greek vocabulary. Similar is the case with the twenty-four appeals of Agamemnon or his apologists to the influence of Atë. Their very frequency, and the almost exclusive connexion they establish between the destinies of Atrides and that goddess, instead of being appreciated by the critics as individualising the hero's character and the poet's art, have insured their being passed over among the general mass of epic mannerism. These remarks admit of more or less application to the portraits of Diomed, Telemachus, and other leading characters of each poem.¹

But besides the parallel passages of this more significant nature, there is still another homelier class, distinguished by equally sure criteria from the common routine of repetition, and representing the unity of Homer's genius, the more vividly perhaps, that they do not necessarily represent its excellence.

The establishment of any phrase as a conventional form implies, as already remarked, the matter it describes to be of more or less habitual recurrence. Let us however suppose that in a long series of narrative, some object or idea no way partaking of this familiar character, some incidental, perhaps indifferent fact, turn of thought, or moral sentiment, may yet happen to present itself on more occasions than one, perhaps at widely different intervals. Let us assume it to be embodied, on each occasion, in the same characteristic form of language, slightly modified perhaps as circumstances might suggest, yet so similar on the whole as to convey to the mind an immediate impression of general identity. In such a case the correspondence could not obviously be the result of conventional usage. There would remain the following alternatives: chance, plagiarism, or the natural disposition of the same mind to express a similar idea in a similar manner. The first of these alternatives the very nature of the texts about to be quoted will set aside. The second is excluded both by the internal evidence of originality in the style of those texts, and by the obvious improbability that, in respect to ideas or forms of expression distinguished in themselves by no very striking or peculiar features, any poet of ordinary spirit should have been at pains to filch from the stores of a neighbour, what he might so easily have produced from his own. The third alternative therefore, unity of author, would alone remain. This, however, is another case only to be clearly understood by aid of example. In selecting from the many which each poem supplies, a preference will be given to those where the parallel extends to the text of both, as bearing on the question of Homer's unity in its broadest shape.

6. In the funeral games of Patroclus, a difference having arisen as to the distribution of prizes in the chariot race, Antilochus, one of the competitors, proposes that Achilles should present his opponent Eumelus with some other object of value, in place of that which he himself claimed with better right. The acquiescence of the hero in this suggestion is expressed in the following lines: XXIII. 558.

Ἀντίλοχ', εἰ μὲν δὴ με κελεύεις οἴκοθεν ἄλλο
Εὐμήλω ἐπιδοῦναι, ἐγὼ δέ κε καὶ τὸ τελέσω· δώσω οἱ θώρηκα, τὸν Ἀστεροπαῖον ἀπηύρων, χάλκεον, ᾧ περὶ χεῦμα φαεινοῦ κασσιτέριοιο ἀμφιδεδίνηται· πολέος δέ οἱ ἄξιός ἐσται.

The simple presentation of a gift might perhaps form the subject of some conventional phrase; but that the presentation, under the above peculiar circumstances, of an object of a peculiar description, involving the mention of certain events and names, could ever have become so, is hardly conceivable. When therefore we find the same turn of expression renewed, in the precise number of lines, on the only other occasion where the circumstances are at all analogous, the conclusion is unavoidable: that the correspondence exhibits the spontaneous recurrence, to the same mind, of a similar form of words to express a similar idea. The case in point is where Euryalus, the young Phæacian chief who had insulted Ulysses, acquiesces in the order of Alcinoüs to make amends by a present to the hero: VIII. 401.

Ἀλκίνοε κρείον, πάντων ἀριδείκετε λαῶν,
τοιγὰρ ἐγὼ τὸν ξεῖνον ἀρέσσομαι, ὥς σὺ κελεύεις· δώσω οἱ τόδ' ἄορ παγχάλκεον, ᾧ ἔπι κώπη ἀργυρέη, κολεὸν δὲ νεοπρίστου ἐλέφαντος ἀμφιδεδίνηται, πολέος δέ οἱ ἄξιον ἔσται.

In the sixth book of the Iliad, Helen, addressing Hector in a moment of bitter mortification, wishes herself dead. This desire is expressed in five lines of a peculiar strain of imagery, to the effect, that it would have been better for her at her birth to have been swept from the earth by hurricanes, or engulfed in the waves of the sea, than to have been reserved for her present fate. The whole invocation is marked by a tone of mingled grief and self-reproach, in fine keeping with the temper and habits of the suppliant. In the Odyssey a similar prayer is uttered by Penelope, in terms which are but a recast of the same passage, adapted to the different character of the heroine, a tone of plaintive languor being substituted for the remorseful petulance of Helen. The address is here to Diana, as angel of death. The mourner awakes in the morning to a renewed sense of her desolate condition; and sitting up in her bed, invokes the goddess to finish her sufferings. The two passages are here collated:

 ἐν προχοῇς δὲ βάλοι ἀψορρόου Ὠκεανοῖο.

The poetical identity of these texts is obvious. The verbal identity, on the other hand, is so slight, as to preclude all suspicion of vulgar commonplace; even supposing that the etiquette of epic art could have prescribed a set form for invocations of death by distressed females. With the exception of the equal number of verses, and of a single line or half-line in each passage, the correspondence is not in the letter but the spirit; in the peculiar vein of imagery, and the plaintive flow of numbers, as modified to suit the genius of the speakers.

Attention has already been called to the two following verses of the speech addressed by Achilles to the ambassadors of Agamemnon : Il. ix. 312.

ἐχθρὸς γάρ μοι κείνος ὁμῶς Ἀἰῖδαο πύλησιν,
 ὅς χ' ἔτερον μὲν κεύθῃ ἐνὶ φρεσὶν, ἄλλο δὲ εἴπη.

This is one of the many pithy sentences of Homer, condensing in a few words maxims of fundamental morality which pages of didactic philosophy could never bring home with equal force to the apprehension. Such a denunciation, prominently put forth in the exordium of the noblest effort of the eloquence of Achilles, could hardly be a scrap of trite commonplace. It is however once reproduced in the Odyssey, in its full spirit, the letter being slightly varied to suit the case, where Ulysses, in his disguise of

ἐχθρὸς γάρ μοι κεῖνος ὁμῶς Ἀῖδαο πύλῃσι γίγνεται, ὃς πενίῃ εἰκὼν ἀπατήλια βάζει.

It were certainly a marvellous coincidence, that two independent authors, each on the single occasion where he uses the expression "hateful as the gates of hell," should apply it to the vice of lying.

Still more curious perhaps in its identity, as in its variety, is the parallel in the two following passages, one from each poem, concerning the destinies of their respective protagonists :

II. xx. 126.

ἵνα μή τι μετὰ Τρώεσσι πάθῃσι σήμερον· ὕστερον αὖτε τὰ πείσεται, ἄσσα οἱ Αἴσα γεινομένῳ ἐπένησε λίνῳ ὅτε μιν τέκε μήτηρ·

πείσεται ἄσσα οἱ Αἴσα Κατακλῶθές τε βαρεῖαι γεινομένῳ νήσαντο λίνῳ ὅτε μιν τέκε μήτηρ·
εἰ δέ τις ἀθανάτων

Another singularly delicate example of the same association of ideas suggesting like forms of expression, once in each poem, occurs in the third book of the Iliad and the first of the Odyssey. In the former place, after the Trojan elders had remarked concerning Helen : III. 156. sqq.

οὐ νέμεσις Τρῶας καὶ εὐκνήμιδας Ἀχαιοὺς τοιγᾷ ἀμφὶ γυναικὶ πολὺν χρόνον ἄλγεα πάσχειν, . . .

Priam rejoins, addressing himself to the heroine :

οὔτι μοι αἰτίη ἐσσί, θεοί νύ μοι αἴτιοι εἰσιν, οἳ μοι ἐφώρμησαν πόλεμον πολὺδακρυν Ἀχαιῶν.

In the Odyssey the substance of both texts is combined in the reply of Telemachus to his mother, who had chid the bard for singing the, to her, afflicting song of Troy: I. 347.

οὔ νύ τ' ἀειδοὶ
αἴτιοι· ἀλλὰ ποθὶ Ζεὺς αἴτιος, ὅσ τε δίδωσιν ἀνδράσιν ἀλφειστῆσιν ὅπως ἐθέλησιν ἐκάστω.
τούτῳ δ' οὐ νέμεσις Δαναῶν κακὸν οἶτον ἀεΐειν.

Pandarus, the Lycian archer, on the failure of several shots aimed at distinguished Greek warriors, vents his spleen in bitter maledictions of his weapon: V. 212.

εἰ δέ κε νοστήσω, καὶ ἐσόψομαι ὀφθαλμοῖσι πατρὶδ' ἐμὴν ἄλοχόν τε καὶ ὑπερεφές μέγα δῶμα,
αὐτίκ' ἔπειτ' ἀπ' ἐμεῖο κάρη τάμοι ἀλλότριος φῶς,
εἰ μὴ ἐγὼ τάδε τόξα φαεινῶ ἐν πυρὶ θείην.

In the Odyssey the same emphatic denunciation, under such modification as the case required, is directed by the disguised Ulysses against his son's want of spirit, in a speech already noticed in treating of the young prince's character, and which is itself but one continued series of illustrations of the present subject: XVI. 92. sqq.

ὦ μάλα μευ καταδάπτει ἀκούοντος φίλον ἦτορ, οἷά φατε μνηστῆρας ἀτάσθαλα μηχανάσθαι

ῥυστάζοντας ἀεικελίως κατὰ δώματα καλά!

This passage deserves attention on its own individual merits, as one of the finest specimens of Homer's poetical rhetoric, combining the martial fire of the Iliad with the ethic terseness of the Odyssey. As no address could be more appropriate to the occasion, so none can bear on its own face more genuine evidence of originality; and yet, as will appear by reference to the marginal citations, there is scarcely a line of it which has not its parallel, either to the letter or in the spirit, in some portion of one or other poem.

It is impossible to suppose this noble address a mere cento of scraps of epic mannerism. It clearly displays the operation of the same genius working up a new creation, by a new disposition of the same well-selected stock of materials.¹

With the latter part of the passage may be further

HOMER. STYLE. ITS ETHIC ELEMENT.

 8. HOMERIC TEST, OR TRIAL.

1. THE importance of the distinction drawn in the foregoing chapter will be apparent throughout the following analysis. Almost every attempt to illustrate the more delicate characteristics of Homer's language, sentiment, or imagery, will involve a collation of parallel passages, and in so far of epic commonplaces. So that, in fact, were the poems to be judged by the prevailing doctrine relative to this feature of poetical usage, much of what constitutes their acknowledged superiority to all other works of their class, would reflect little more credit on their author, than the mere putting together of second-hand materials, prepared and numbered for his use. Attention will first be directed to certain modes of expression which, as embodying some of the higher intellectual attributes of Homer, will here be comprised under the head of the Philosophy of his Style.

Philosophy of Homer's
style.

Exclusively proper to Homer is his art of dramatising, not merely action, but thought; not merely the intercourse between man and man, but between man and himself, between his passions and his judgment. The mechanism of which the poet here chiefly

Art of dra-
thought.

avails himself is, to exhibit the person under the influence of excited feelings as communing with, or as Homer defines it, addressing his own mind ; discussing the subject of his solicitude under its various aspects, as a question at issue between his judgement and himself. The conflicting feelings are thus, as it were, personified ; while the current of the language, often the very sound of the words, is so nicely adapted to the turns of the self-dialogue, that the breast of the man seems laid open before us, and, in the literal sense of the term, we read his thoughts as they flit through his bosom. The pleasure which Homer takes in this figure of epic rhetoric is as remarkable as his skill in its management. It recurs in numberless instances throughout both poems, under such happy adaptation to characters or circumstances, as to obviate all risk of satiety in the reader. Yet it is one of the cases in which the poet most freely resorts to his familiar expedient of conventional phraseology. The structure of these texts hinges chiefly on three expressive forms. The first is the introduction to the soliloquy :

ὀχθήσας δ' ἄρα εἶπε πρὸς ὃν μεγαλήτορα θυμόν.

The second is the transition from hesitation to resolution :

ἀλλὰ τίη μοι ταῦτα φίλος διελέξατο θυμός ;

The third, under two varieties, resumes the general course of the narrative :

ἔως ὃ ταῦθ' ὥρμαινε κατὰ φρένα καὶ κατὰ θυμόν, τόφρα

ὥδε δέ οἱ φρονέοντι δοάσσατο κέρδιον εἶναι. . . .

The first is rarely, if ever, omitted or varied. The second is confined to cases where the rapid approach of the crisis required an equally rapid decision, or where some ignoble expedient which had at first suggested itself is discarded. The third admits of several elegant variations of the above more standard forms. Among the many parallel cases, the two following, one from each poem, are well adapted by their conciseness and simplicity for immediate illustration.

In the third great battle of the Iliad, the Greek army is routed and flies. Ulysses vainly endeavours to rally the fugitives; and on looking round finds himself alone, on the point of being encircled by the Trojan phalanx: XI. 403.

ὀχθήσας δ' ἄρα εἶπε πρὸς δὴν μεγαλήτορα θυμόν·
 ὦ μοι ἐγὼ, τί πάθω! μέγα μὲν κακὸν αἶ κε φέβωμαι, πληθὺν ταρβήσας· τὸ δὲ ῥίγιον αἶ κεν ἀλώω μοῦνος· τοὺς δ' ἄλλους Δαναοὺς ἐφόβησε Κρονίων·
 ἀλλὰ τίη μοι ταῦτα φίλος διελέξατο θυμός;
 οἶδα γὰρ ὅττι κακοὶ μὲν ἀποίχονται πολέμοιο, ὅς δέ κ' ἀριστεύησι μάχῃ ἔνι, τὸν δὲ μάλα χρεὼν ἐστάμεναι κρατερῶς, ἥτ' ἔβλητ' ἥτ' ἔβαλ' ἄλλον.
 ἔως ὃ ταῦθ' ἄρμαινε κατὰ φρένα καὶ κατὰ θυμόν, τόφρα δ' ἐπὶ Τρώων στίχες ἤλυθον ἀσπιστάων, ἔλσαν δ' ἐν μέσσοισι. . . .

The scene is here painted rather than described. How precisely are the thoughts those by which the breast of a valiant warrior would be agitated at such a moment; how well does the hurried abruptness of the sentences in the first half of the passage, represent the rapidity with which the dangers of the crisis would be passed in review: how fine the transition at the close, from hesitation to martial resolve!

With this passage may be collated the following from the Odyssey, where the same hero, cast by the waves naked and exhausted on an unknown shore, revolves in his mind, while reposing on the sea-weed, the dangers he may have to encounter in this new scene of adventure: v. 464.

ὀχθήσας δ' ἄρα εἶπε πρὸς ὃν μεγαλήτορα θυμόν·
 ὦ μοι ἐγὼ, τί πάθω! τί νύ μοι μήκιστα γένηται· εἰ μὲν κ' ἐν ποταμῷ δυσκηδέα νύκτα φυλάξω, μή μ' ἄμυδις στίβη τε κακὴ καὶ θῆλυς ἔερση, ἐξ ὀλιγηπελὴς δαμάσῃ κεκαφήτοτα θυμόν· . .
 εἰ δέ κεν ἐς κλιτὺν ἀναβὰς καὶ δάσκιον ὕλην, θάμνοισι ἐν πυκινοῖσι καταδραβῶ, εἴ με μεθείη ῥῖγος καὶ κάματος, γλυκερὸς δέ μοι ὕπνος ἐπέλθῃ, δεῖδω μὴ θήρεσσιν ἔλωρ καὶ κύρμα γένωμαι.
 ὥς ἄρα οἱ φρονέοντι δοάσσατο κέρδιον εἶναι, βῆ ῥ' ἴμεν εἰς ὕλην.

The same series of adventures¹ contains other similar texts, offering in some points a still closer parallel to that cited from the Iliad.

But the finest examples of this kind of dramatic mechanism are in the successive encounters of Agenor and Hector with Achilles.² The passages are too long for citation; but the reader who would rightly appreciate the evidence of parallel usage, as bearing on the authorship of the poems, would do well to collate them, in themselves, and with others similar of either poem. Each of the Trojan heroes is represented in face of his terrible adversary, revolving in his mind, or as the poet has it, "consulting his own great-hearted soul," what was to be done in so fearful an emergency; and the various courses suggested, with their respective feasibilities, difficulties, dangers, are reviewed in a succession of abrupt and hurried questions, with the usual contrast between the vacillation of the commencement and the bold determination at the close. The train of thought in the mind of Hector also reflects some of the more prominent traits of his character. His first idea is flight. Here his pride interferes. He reverts with bitter repentance to his late vaunts to Polydamas, and the reproaches to be endured from his countrymen, were he now meanly to shrink from a danger which he then affected to despise. Death were better than such indignity! But on the advance of Pelides his courage again breaks down. He now thinks of supplicating quarter under pledge of redress to the Greeks. The wandering hurry of the ensuing verses realises with astonishing effect the rapid precision with which the mind, even in the most desperate straight, will survey the minutest details of expedients to be adopted or results anticipated. The act of submission, the words, the very gestures, by which he might propitiate the wrath or tempt the avarice of the fierce Myrmidon; the terms of the treaty, the penalties, the sacrifices, the oaths, all flit across his mind in crowded succession. This vision of recreant self-preservation is dispelled by a brilliant transition to better thoughts, in the line which on such occasions gives the decisive turn to the mental drama:

In the parallel self-dialogue of Agenor, the flitting of the mind over all the vicissitudes, localities, scenery, of the meditated flight, concealment, and return to quarters, is shadowed forth with even still more magic effect.

The value of these forms consists greatly in the emphatic power of certain peculiarly Homeric phrases for the emotions called into activity. 'Οχθέω signifies any deep mental affection. Διελέξατο, a word never occurring in Homer but in the verse above cited, is the verb reflexive of the noun "self-dialogue," which term better expresses the spirit of these passages than the more familiar one of soliloquy. 'Ορμαίνα denotes the rushing of thought to and fro in a mind violently agitated. The importance of these and other cognate expressions in their bearing on the unity of the poet's genius, will further appear in the sequel.

Art of describing
thought.

2. The skill with which Homer, in his narrative capacity, describes the workings of the human breast, is no less peculiar to himself than his method of portraying them through his dramatic agency. Here too, as a general rule, an introductory line announces the agitated state of the mind. Then follows a description of the expedients which present themselves. A third clause announces the resolution adopted. Here also, the value of the forms depends greatly on certain words of pointedly significant sound and sense. The first is μερμηρίζω, untranslatable, like ὀχθέω, by any single English term, but denoting anxious meditation or fluctuation of mind. The second δοάζομαι, equally unprovided with an English synonyme, expresses the decision arrived at, after much hesitation, and with still lurking doubt of its propriety. The word occurs (with a single exception) exclusively in the combination δοάσσατο κέρδιον εἶναι, which may be rendered: "it seemed on the whole for the best;" dubie visum est. Examples are subjoined of the more familiar varieties of parallel texts:

II. XIII. 455.

Δηΐφοβος δὲ δῖανδιχα μερμήριξεν,
ἥ τινά που Τρώων ἐταρίσσαιτο μεγαθύμων,

¹ Conf. II. i. 189., ii. 3., viii. 167., xiv. 159.; Od. x. 50., xvi. 74., xviii. 90.

Considering the striking character and frequent recurrence of these kindred forms, their occasional employment might naturally have been expected in other works, ranked by modern critics as jointly representing the "common epic genius." Yet in the five or six thousand lines to which that common privilege is held to attach, there is not only no approach to any such modes of expression, but the very phrases ὀχθέω, μερμηρίζω, δοάζομαι, to which may be added πορφύρω, and some others of cognate power still to be noticed, constituting the pith and marrow of the passages, are confined (with a single exception in the case of *ὀχθέω*¹) to the Iliad and Odyssey alone among the productions of the early epic Muse.² In regard to a portion, and perhaps not the least expressive of their number, Homer's exclusive property extends from the epic vocabulary to the language at large.³ It would almost appear as if they had been created, had flourished, and become extinct, with the genius which alone possessed the faculty of so vividly apprehending the images they help to animate.

Sometimes the play of inward emotion, instead of a dialogue between the man and his mind, is described with like dramatic effect as a conflict between himself and his heart. The finest example of this kind is in the Odyssey. Ulysses, in his disguise of beggar, reposing in the vestibule of the palace, hears the maidens of his household sallying forth with joyous levity to their rendezvous with their suitor-paramours. His blood boils up at this pollution of his domestic honour with so fervid an indignation, that he can scarce refrain from inflicting punishment with his own hand on the wanton crew. This mental struggle is dramatised under the figure of his heart, jealous of his honour, barking or growling within his bosom at his forbearance. Striking his breast, he chides the rebellious organ of his pride and passion, telling it to bear, for it has borne more bitter insults, and to trust, as formerly, to his wisdom for delivery from disaster or disgrace: Od. xx. 13.

 ὥς δὲ κύων ἀμαλῆσι περὶ σκυλάκεσσι βεβῶσα, ἄνδρ' ἀγνοήσας' ὑλάει, μέμονέν τε μάχεσθαι, ὥς ῥα τοῦ ἔνδον ὑλάκτει ἀγαιομένου κακὰ ἔργα· στῆθος δὲ πλήξας κραδίην ἠνίπαπε μύθῳ· τέτλαθι δὴ κραδίη, καὶ κύντερον ἄλλο ποτ' ἔτλης. . .
 ὥς ἔφατ', ἐν στήθεσσι καθαπτόμενος φίλον ἦτορ· τῷ δὲ μάλ' ἐν πείσῃ κραδίη μένε τετληυῖα, νωλεμέως. . . .

This brilliant passage illustrates also the advantage of ancient over modern art, in the range of imagery which the former allows. The comparison of the hero's heart growling at the pollution of his household, to a bitch in her lair snarling at the stranger approaching her whelps, appropriate and spirited as it is in the artless mood of the primitive bard, would, in the page of a modern poet, be taxed, no doubt, as coarse or inelegant.¹

In the Iliad the heart of Achilles is made the subject of a similar, but less detailed, personification :
I. 188.

Πηλείωνι δ' ἄχος γένετ', ἐν δέ οἱ ἦτορ
στήθεσσιν λασίοισι διάνδιχα μερμήριξεν,

Among the more expressive terms above noticed as peculiar to the ethic vocabulary of Homer, is πορφύρω. It denotes in its primary sense a lurid darkening or louring, more especially the dark heaving of the sea on the approach of a storm ; and, by an appropriate metaphor, the fluctuations of the human breast when filled with gloomy forebodings. The finest example, both of its direct and figurative use, is where Nestor, while nursing a wounded comrade in his tent, alarmed by the tumult of battle thickening around the camp, goes forth to reconnoitre. The effect produced on the old hero by the scene of national disaster that presents itself is thus described : XIV. 16.

ὡς δ' ὅτε πορφύρῃ πέλαγος μέγα κύματι κωφῷ, ὀσσόμενον λιγέων ἀνέμων λαιψήρᾳ κέλευθα . . .
ὡς ὁ γέρων ᾠρμαινε, δαϊζόμενος κατὰ θυμόν.

The natural phenomenon here described is familiar to voyagers in the narrow broken seas of Greece. The wind freshening after a calm, behind some projecting headland, or at such a distance as to be unobserved by the navigator, will frequently send across the otherwise smooth surface of the sea a heavy rolling swell, as the precursor of an approaching squall. This phenomenon is dramatised by the poet under the admirable figure of the sea itself darkly presaging the coming disturbance of its waters, as Nestor forebodes the adverse tide of war.¹ The phrase πορφύρω also occurs thrice in the Odyssey, to express the anxious meditation by the way, of a person embarked in some hazardous enterprise: iv. 427. 572., x. 309.

and once in the strikingly parallel verse of the Iliad: xxi. 551.

ἔσθη· πολλὰ δέ οἱ κραδίη πόρφυρε μένοντι.

Observe too with what propriety the imagery is varied in the case of Penelope. Unlike the turbulent excitement of the stern warrior, the flittings of anxious thought which agitate her gentle bosom in the stillness of the night, are compared, in a simile of singular richness and delicacy, to the varied note of the nightingale, pouring forth her plaintive song at the same hour of darkness and solitude.²

Homer's power of embodying in words the freedom and rapidity, apart from the subject, of thought, is finely exemplified in his comparison of the swift

ὡς δ' ἄνεμοι δύο πόντον ὀρίνετον ἰχθυόεντα, . . .

ὡς ἐδαίξετο θυμὸς ἐνὶ στήθεσσιν Ἀχαιῶν.

execution of the will of heaven by its ministers, to the imagination of a far-travelled man passing in review the scenes he has visited: II. xv. 80.

ὥς δ' ὅτ' ἂν ἀΐξῃ νόος ἀνέρος, ὅστ' ἐπὶ πολλὴν γαῖαν ἐληλουθὼς, φρεσὶ πευκαλίμησι νοήσῃ· ἐνθ' εἶην, ἧ ἐνθα· μενοινήσῃ τε πολλὰ·
ὥς κραιπνῶς μεμαυῖα διέπτατο πότνια Ἥρη.

The freedom of thought is indeed a natural, and long since hackneyed figure for swiftness of motion. But Homer alone has found means of dramatising the simile; and the faculty, itself endued with personality, asserts and rejoices in its boundless liberty.

Affection of

3. The poet's knowledge of human nature is no less effectively displayed, in his treatment of the more prominent passions or affections as common to mankind in the aggregate, than as peculiar to individual characters. Attention will first be directed to his singularly delicate sense of the affection of sympathy. Whoever has known grief must have experienced, how readily our own distresses find vent in the tears we shed for those of others; how often, in what appears at the moment but the effect of commiseration, we are influenced as much or more by a selfish as a purely compassionate impulse. Let any one cast his eyes over an audience intent on an eloquent funeral oration, and observe down whose cheeks the tears flow most copiously, or from what bosom the most convulsive sobs proceed. Will it be found in every case that the persons so affected are those most remarkable for the tenderness of their hearts? Will it not rather appear that they are such as have themselves smarted most recently and severely under affliction? It is therefore their own sorrow, rather than that of the bereaved widow or orphan, which so deeply affects them. But although this excess of sympathy may be selfish, it is not without its moral value. Every impulse which softens the heart towards distress is in itself amiable. As a general rule, those who have suffered most themselves most readily feel for the misfortunes of their neighbours; and, were it possible, in any such case as that above supposed, to analyse the component elements of grief, it would probably be found that, even deducting those of a purely selfish nature, such as remained would be greater on the part of the afflicted than of the light-hearted portion of the audience.

Nowhere does the moral ingredient of Homer's poetry assume more marked features of individuality, than in his deep sense and beautiful treatment of this delicate affection. A striking example is in the scene in the quarters of Achilles, after the death of Patroclus, where the chorus of captive females respond to the lament of Briseïs: XIX. 301.

Πάτροκλον πρόφασιν¹, σφῶν δ' αὐτῶν κήδε' ἐκάστη.

The simple conciseness of the expression, as compared with the fulness of the idea conveyed, renders this one of the most exquisite touches of its kind in either poem.

¹ It may be proper to caution the less experienced scholar against taking this phrase in the sense of "pretext," which it familiarly bears in later Greek prose. It must here be understood in its simpler primary import of "apparent cause" or "motive," which elsewhere attaches to it with Homer. Heyne's notion that the females, selfishly absorbed in their own sorrows, were indifferent to the death of their benefactor, is a proof, among many, of the deficiency of the faculty of taste, which disqualified that learned commentator, like so many others of his nation, for a competent critic of any such work as the Iliad.

In the supplication of Priam to Achilles, every thing depended on a first impression. The suddenness and boldness of the intrusion, the vindictive bitterness of the Myrmidon chief against every thing Trojan, and his fierce impetuosity of temper, imperatively required that the commencement of the old man's address should be so conceived as to work at once on his generous sympathies. One less deeply read in the book of nature, might have made Priam open his suit with a touching picture of his domestic woe, or a flattering appeal to the generosity of the Greek champion, and the fulness of the vengeance already exacted. Homer's Priam directs the attack on a far more vulnerable quarter. He tells Achilles, simply and abruptly, to "remember his own father, standing, like the wretched parent who knelt before him, on the brink of the grave; oppressed perhaps, like him, by some foreign invader; and lamenting, if not the death, the absence at least in a distant land, of his darling son, the hope and support of his declining years." This argument is kept in view from first to last. The heart of Achilles melts before it like wax beneath a burning sun, and a burst of sympathetic emotion at the close completes the triumph of the royal suppliant's eloquence: II. XXIV. 486.

τῆλίκου ὥσπερ ἐγὼν, ὅλοῦ ἐπὶ γήραος οὐδῶ.

ὥς φάτο· τῷ δ' ἄρα πατρὸς ὑφ' ἡμέρον ὥρσε γόοιο·
τῷ δὲ μνησαμένῳ, ὃ μὲν Ἑκτορὸς ἀνδροφόνιοι, κλαῖ' ἀδινὰ, προπάραιθε ποδῶν Ἀχιλλῆος ἐλυσθείς, αὐτὰρ Ἀχιλλεὺς κλαῖεν ἐὼν πατέρ', ἄλλοτε δ' αὖτε Πάτροκλον· τῶν δὲ στοναχὴ κατὰ δώματ' ὀρώρει.

Nothing can be more admirable of its kind, either in point of conception or execution, than this whole scene.

In the previous picture of family mourning in the Trojan palace, it is not for Hector alone that Priam's daughters weep so bitterly, but: xxiv. 167.

τῶν μιμνησκόμεναι, οἱ δὲ πολέες τε καὶ ἐσθλοὶ, χερσὶν ὑπ' Ἀργείων κέατο ψυχὰς ὀλέσαντες.

In the Lament of Patroclus, the allusion of Achilles to his absent father is responded to by his fellow-mourners with an outbreak of the same mixed emotion: xix. 338.

ὥς ἔφατο κλαίων, ἐπὶ δὲ στενάχοντο γέροντες, μνησάμενοι τὰ ἕκαστος ἐνὶ μεγάροισιν ἔλειπον.

In the Odyssey, where Menelaus mourns over the disasters and supposed death of Ulysses, the emotion of Pisistratus is similarly described: iv. 186.

οὐδ' ἄρα Νέστορος υἱὸς ἀδακρύτω ἔχεν ὅσσε, μνήσατο γὰρ κατὰ θυμὸν ἀμύμονος Ἀντιλόχοιο, τόν ῥ' Ἡοῦς ἔκτεινε φαεινῆς ἀγλαὸς υἱός.

4. The same penetrating insight into the finer sensibilities of our nature is displayed in the poet's treatment of the simple affection of grief, of which that above illustrated is a modification. One favourite mode is, to describe the indulgence of sorrow as an enjoyment. That there is a pleasure in the overflowings of an afflicted heart is as certain¹ as that the cruellest of all sufferings are those which cannot or dare not find vent. The delight which the poet takes in this image is as exclusively peculiar to himself as his method of adorning it. The parallel texts here, as elsewhere, frequently assume a conventional form. Sometimes the affection is described simply as an enjoyment. Among the most effective passages of this kind are those allusive to the woes of Penelope, as in the subjoined example of her own plaintive eloquence: XIX. 512.

αὐτὰρ ἐμοὶ καὶ πένθος ἀμέτρητον πόρε δαίμον, ἤματα μὲν γὰρ τέρπομ' ὄδυρομένη γόωσα . . .

and in the account of her weeping over the bow of Ulysses: XXI. 57.

ἡ δ' ἐπεὶ οὖν τάρφθη πολυδακρύτοιο γόοιο . . .

This line occurs in the Odyssey on two other similar occasions; and, slightly varied, in the address of Pelides to his men before the funeral of Patroclus: II. xxiii. 10.

αὐτὰρ ἐπεὶ κ' ὀλοοῖο τεταρπώμεσθα γόοιο . . .

also in his interview with Priam: xxiv. 513.

αὐτὰρ ἐπεὶ ῥα γόοιο τετάρπετο δῖος Ἀχιλλεύς . .

The following passages of each poem, the one from the interview of Achilles with the ghost of Patroclus, the other from that between Ulysses and the shade of his mother, supply a curious example of the poet's happy tact of varying the letter of substantially the same expression, to suit the variety of the case:

II. xxiii. 97.

ἀλλὰ μοι ἄσσον στῆθι, μίνυνθά περ ἀμφιβαλόντε
ἀλλήλους, ὀλοοῖο τεταρπώμεσθα γόοιο.

Od. xi. 211.

ᾧφρα καὶ εἰν Ἀῖδαο, φίλας περὶ χεῖρε βαλόντε, ἀμφοτέρω κρυεροῖο τεταρπώμεσθα γόοιο.

The parallel extends to the whole neighbouring texts.

At other times, afflicted persons are described as inspiring each other with a desire or lust of grief. Here also the parallel passages often assume a conventional form, as in the scene between Priam and Achilles: Il. xxiv. 507.

ὦς φάτο· τῷ δ' ἄρα πατὴρς ὑφ' ἱμερον ὄρσε γόοιο, repeated in the interview between Menelaus and Telemachus in the Odyssey, and, with slight variation, in other passages of both poems.¹

Sometimes, the full indulgence of sorrow, like that of any other pleasurable sensation, is described as producing satiety; as in the account by Menelaus of his habitual state of feeling towards his departed companions in arms: Od. iv. 102.

ἄλλοτε μὲν τε γόῳ φρένα τέρπομαι, ἄλλοτε δ' αὖτε
παύομαι· αἰψήρως δὲ κόρος κρυεροῖο γόοιο.²

With this may be compared the two following texts similarly illustrative, in their variety of form, of unity of conception:

Il. xxiv. 522.

ἄλγεα δ' ἔμπησ
ἐν θυμῷ κατακεῖσθαι ἐάσομεν, ἀχνύμενοί περ.
οὐ γάρ τις πρῆξις πέλεται κρυεροῖο γόοιο.

Od. x. 201.

κλαῖον δὲ λιγέως, θαλερὸν κατὰ δάκρυ χέοντες·
ἀλλ' οὐ γάρ τις πρῆξις ἐγένετο μυρομένοισι.³

The same association of ideas is embodied by Priam in a still more touching form in Il. xxiv. 226.

¹ Conf. Il. xxiii. 108.; Odyss. iv. 183., xvi. 215., xix. 249., xxiii. 231.

ἀγκὰς ἐλόντ' ἱμὸν υἷδν, ἐπὴν γόου ἐξ ἔρον εἴη ν.¹

The spirit of these forms is modified in an interesting manner by the varied power of their principal term γόος. Sometimes this word expresses the simple affection of grief, sometimes its indulgence, sometimes any species of tender emotion producing the same outward effect. The phrase may, in such cases, be well rendered by the French term "attendrissement," to which the English tongue has no equivalent. Among other examples may be cited the description of the scene where the Ithacan mariners, delivered from the degrading effects of Circe's enchantment, are restored to the society of their comrades: Od. x. 398.

παῖσιν δ' ἡμερόεις ὑπέδν γόος, ἀμφὶ δὲ δῶμα σμερδαλέον κανάχιζε, θεὰ δ' ἐλέαιρε καὶ αὐτή.

What they really felt was joy, though tempered by the remembrance of their late calamity.²

Another delicate shade of this class of emotion is the pleasure derived even from bygone sorrows, as viewed through the refining medium of the memory. This sentiment is finely embodied in the rustic eloquence of Eumæus, when referring to the disasters of his own early life: Od. xv. 400.

² How little of commonplace there is in the spirit at least of these passages, whatever may be the case with their wording, cannot be better evinced than by the fact, that throughout the whole volume of Shakespeare, who is generally held to have probed every nook and cranny of human passion or feeling, no allusion can be found, in so far at least as the author's researches extend, to the pleasurable ingredient of sorrow, or to satiety in its indulgence, offering the remotest parallel to any one of the above copious series of examples.

μετὰ γάρ τε καὶ ἄλγεσι τέρπεται ἀνὴρ, ὅστις δὴ μάλα πολλὰ πάθῃ, καὶ πόλλ' ἐπαληθῇ. . . .

The grief of Achilles for the death of his friend finds vent in a similar train of association: II. xxiv. 6.

Πατρόκλου ποθέων ἀδροτῆτά τε καὶ μένος ἦϋ, ἦδ' ὅποσα τολύπευσε σὺν αὐτῷ, καὶ πάθεν ἄλγεα.

The very miseries suffered in his friend's company are now objects, not of memory alone, but of longing desire.¹

5. Of the more ordinary effects of grief, as displayed in different characters, both poems also abound in descriptions marked by the same fine perception of its sources and influence. A favourite mode of illustrating the sorrow of Penelope is, to describe her as giving vent to it when awaking in the night from her disturbed and dreamy slumbers.² That this image was equally familiar to the author of each poem, although opportunity for its direct introduction occurred in the Odyssey alone, appears from the passage of the Iliad where Venus, when wounded by Diomed, is consoled with the prospect of a speedy revenge by her mother Dione, who assures her that, "ere long Ægialea, the fond wife of her impious assailant, will start in her sleep, and rouse her maidens with lamentations for the husband of her youth."³

in different
characters.

The copious but silent flow of tears, under calm but desperate anguish, is twice expressed in the Iliad, in slightly varied terms, by the simile of a fountain dripping from a rock.¹ Parallel is also the beautiful figure in the Odyssey, of Penelope's mute placid sorrow, where the tears trickling down her pale cheek are likened to snow melting beneath the balmy zephyrs.²

³ II. v. 412.

The distracting effects of a first announcement of disastrous intelligence supply two powerful passages of the Iliad, as interesting in their parallel as in their contrast. The one is where Achilles is apprised of the death of Patroclus; the other where Andromache descries on the plain the corpse of Hector.³ The common features of each description are finely varied to suit the variety of characters. In both cases the faculties of the sufferer are enveloped in a "cloud or night of grief;" in both they sink prostrate on the ground. The afflicted queen strips her head of its ornaments, and strews them wildly around her. Achilles tears his hair, and scatters the dust in which he rolls over his head and person. The attendant females raise and support the heroine, lest the violence of her convulsions prove fatal to her. Antilochus grasps the hands of the hero, lest he should attempt self-destruction. How familiar this representation of his heroes rolling on the earth, under an overwhelming pressure of affliction, was to the poet, appears also from various examples in the Odyssey.⁴

Terror.

The influence of grief and terror combined, is finely expressed in the account of Penelope's first reception of the news of her son's departure: Od. iv. 703.

τῆς δ' αὐτοῦ λύτο γούνατα καὶ φίλον ἦτορ.
δὴν δέ μιν ἀμφασίῃ ἐπέων λάβε, τῷ δέ οἱ ὄσσε

⁴ iv. 541., x. 499., xvii. 525., conf. ii. xxii. 221. 414.

The passage occurs, slightly varied, in the Iliad, where Antilochus hears of the death of Patroclus: XVII. 694—696.

κατίστυγε μῦθον ἀκούσας,
δὴν δέ μιν ἀμφασίῃ ἐπέων λάβε, κ.τ.λ.¹ . .

The effects of furious indignation on the frame are Anger. twice described in the respective cases of Agamemnon and Antinoüs, in a graphic formula, which, if employed by different authors, would imply a servility of imitation no way reconcilable with the genuine originality of each description: II. I. 103., Od. IV. 661.

μένεος δὲ μέγα φρένες ἀμφιμέλαιναι
πίμπλαντ', ὅσσε δέ οἱ πυρὶ λαμπετόωντι εἴκτην.

Suppressed rage, brooding future vengeance, is indicated by the silent tremor of the head: Od. XVII. 465.

and Od. V. 284.

ὁ δ' ἐχώσατο κηρόθι μᾶλλον·
κινήσας δὲ κάρη προτὶ ὄν μυθήσατο θυμόν· . . .

Compare also the two strikingly parallel passages, describing the ordinary effects of anger:

II. IX. 553.

II. XVIII.

¹ Similar in spirit is the description of the speechless terror of Eurylochus on escaping from the cave of Circe: Od. X. 246.

οὐδέ τι ἐκφάσθαι δύνατο ἔπος, ἰεμένος περ, κῆρ ἄχει μεγάλῳ βεβωλημένος. . . Conf. XXIII. 106.

human life.

6. One so familiar with the passions and foibles of human nature¹ could not fail to be deeply sensible of its vanity. The vanity of human life and its pursuits is indeed, in all ages, a trite axiom of elementary philosophy. The primitive moralist has at least the advantage of inculcating it in its native freshness, while in the page of his successors it is apt to appear but hackneyed and second-hand. Homer's lively sense of this standard truth, with the importance he attached to it, is evinced by the prominence given to it throughout both poems, and the variety of imagery by which it is adorned. The unity of conception, amid much diversity of form, in these passages, as spread in nearly equal proportions over both works, suffices almost in itself to guarantee their unity of origin.

The general rule, as it may be called, is concisely laid down in the following pair of strikingly parallel texts :

Il. xvii. 446.

οὐ μὲν γάρ τί πού ἐστιν οἰζυρώτερον ἀνδρός,
πάντων, ὅσσα τε γαῖαν ἔπι πνεῖει τε καὶ ἔρπει.

Od. xviii. 130.

οὐδὲν ἀκιδνότερον γαῖα τρέφει ἀνθρώποιο,
πάντων, ὅσσα τε γαῖαν ἔπι πνεῖει τε καὶ ἔρπει.

"Of things that breathe and creep upon the ground,
No vainer thing than mortal man is found."

The latter passage is followed up by a moral commentary, distinguished by a terseness of expression and a depth of sentiment which would do honour to Aristotle or Bacon. It closes with two other equally remarkable lines, describing the absolute dependance on the Deity of every thought of his ephemeral creatures :

τοῖος γὰρ νόος ἐστὶν ἐπιχθονίων ἀνθρώπων, οἷον ἐπ' ἡμαρ ἄγῃσι πατὴρ ἀνδρῶν τε θεῶν τε. . .

The rule is beautifully illustrated by the comparison of successive generations of men to the annual changes of the leaf: Il. vi. 146.

οἷη περ φύλλων γενεή, τοίηδε καὶ ἀνδρῶν· φύλλα τὰ μὲν τ' ἄνεμος χαμάδις χέει, ἅλλα δέ θ' ὕλη τῆλεθόωσα φύει, ἕαρος δ' ἐπιγίγνεται ὥρη, ὡς ἀνδρῶν γενεή, ἣ μὲν φύει ἣ δ' ἀπολήγει.

elegantly varied in the contemptuous language of Apollo: Il. xxi. 464.

δειλῶν, οἱ φύλλοισιν ἐοικότες, ἅλλοτε μὲν τε ζαφλεγέες τελέθουσιν, ἀρούρης καρπὸν ἔδοντες, ἅλλοτε δὲ φθινύθουσιν ἀκήριοι.

The poet especially delights in this figure of ephemeral humanity. Hence the leaves of the forest, and the flowers of the field, are among his favourite similes for armies going forth to battle, where the fragile tenure of existence in the mighty multitude is so prominently brought into view:

Il. ii. 800.

λίην γὰρ φύλλοισιν ἐοικότες ἢ ψαμάθοισιν, ἔρχονται πεδίοιο.

Il. ii. 468.

μυρίοι, ὅσα τε φύλλα καὶ ἄνθεα γίγνεται ὥρη.

Od. ix. 51.

ἤλθον ἔπειθ', ὅσα φύλλα καὶ ἄνθεα γίγνεται ὥρη.

The groups of maidens sitting at the loom in the palace of Alcinoüs, are compared to aspen leaves; a figure singularly expressive, in the spirit of the episode, both of the levity of the company and the briskness of their movements : ¹ Od. vii. 105.

αἱ δ' ἱστοὺς ὑφώσσι καὶ ἡλάκατα στρωφῶσιν, ἤμεναι, οἷά τε φύλλα μακεδνῆς αἰγείροιο. . . .

The falling or drooping of trees or flowers is also a favourite image for the fate of slain or wounded heroes. The most beautiful of this class, often imitated by Homer's successors ², is the comparison of the young and tender Euphorbus to a fair olive plant suddenly rooted up by the fury of the storm. ³ In the same plaintive spirit the dying Gorgythion is likened to a withering flower. ⁴ The comparison of the growing youth of either sex to fair young plants is also a favourite image of Homer. As parallel passages may be compared two lines of the lament of Thetis over the premature fate of her son : Il. xviii. 56.

¹ This image, like many others in Homer, can be rightly appreciated by those alone who are familiar with the existing manners of Southern Europe. In modern Italy, as in antient Greece, weaving is performed by young women, frequently collected in large halls fitted up for the purpose. Whoever may happen to visit one of these establishments will recognise, in the busy sitting of the shuttles, and the appearance and gestures of the lively and often wanton crew who handle them, a counterpart of the scene here described by the poet.

³ Il. xvii. 53. The somewhat similar comparison of the fall of Simoïs to that of a poplar tree, shows the antiquity of the practice, still common in Southern Europe, of trimming up the stem of that tree to within a few feet of the top, which, left untouched, presents the appearance of a bushy tuft. The resemblance between this tuft and the plummy helmet of the warrior here forms the main point of the figure : Il. iv. 482.

VI. 162.

Δήλω δὴ ποτε τοῖον Ἀπόλλωνος παρὰ βωμῶ
φοίνικος νέον ἔρνος ἀνερχόμενον ἐνόησα.¹

Similar illustrations of large bodies of men are derived from the more ephemeral class of animals. The Greeks mustering for battle are likened to summer flies swarming round the milk-pails : Il. II. 469.

ἡὔτε μυιάων ἀδινάων ἔθνεα πολλά, αἵ τε κατὰ σταθμὸν ποιμνήϊον ἡλάσκουσιν
ᾠρη ἐν εἰαρινῇ, ὅτε τε γλάγος ἄγγεα δεύει·

as are also, with still more pointed effect, the combatants around the corpse of Sarpedon : XVI. 641.

οἷδ' αἰεὶ περὶ νεκρὸν ὁμίλειον, ὥς ὅτε μυῖαι, σταθμῶ ἔνι βρομέωσι περιγλαγέας κατὰ πέλλας,
ᾠρη ἐν εἰαρινῇ, ὅτε τε γλάγος ἄγγεα δεύει.

The troops flocking from quarters to the council are compared to clusters of bees buzzing from flower to flower.² This passage, with the ensuing figure of Ossa, commonly dignified with the title of Fame, but who may rather be considered as the personification of popular garrulity flitting from group to group, and generally the whole first portion of this book, is a spirited picture of the genius and habits of the giddy populace. In the same spirit, the battalions taking up their position on the field are compared to flocks of cackling water-fowl feeding on a meadow³; the noisy advance of the Trojan phalanx to the clamour of a flight of cranes.¹ The twelve wanton damsels, suspended in the palace court of Ithaca, are likened to a flight of thrushes caught by the neck in the snare of the fowler²; the Trojan elders seated on the city wall, to a group of crickets, proverbially the most ephemeral and garrulous of animals, chirping their brief summer song upon the trees.

Force of
ethic contrast.

7. Homer's skilful employment of contrast to heighten the effect of his images has already been incidentally noticed. Among the most tangible examples is the line descriptive of the gesture with which Achilles accompanies his lament over the corpse of Patroclus: Il. XVIII. 317., XXIII. 18.

χεῖρας ἐπ' ἀνδροφόνους θέμενος στήθεσσιν ἑταίρου.

How finely the terror of the arm is contrasted with the tenderness of the act! A still more striking while closely parallel text, is that descriptive of the mode in which the suppliant Priam propitiates the mercy of the fierce Myrmidon: xxiv. 478.

*χερσὶν Ἀχιλλῆος λάβε γούνατα, καὶ κύσε χεῖρας
δεινὰς, ἀνδροφόνους, αἳ οἱ πολέας κτάνον υἱας·*

a combination of images conveying, in their very uncongeniality, the most powerful impression of the aged sufferer's heroic devotion. How highly the poet himself appreciated the value of this contrast appears from its reintroduction, with a new power of dramatic effect, in Priam's own words at the close of his address to the Greek hero: xxiv. 505.

*ἔτλην δ', οἷ' οὐπω τις ἐπιχθόνιος βροτὸς ἄλλος,

² Od. XXII. 468.

This figure of poetical rhetoric also enters largely into the humorous descriptions of both poems, especially the tragi-comic scenes of the Odyssey. Among the examples formerly cited are, the combination of giant ferocity and cannibalism with primitive simplicity of pastoral manners in the character of the Cyclops; the blending of the same horrible attributes with the refinements of social life in the Læstrygonians; and the happy set-off which the martially significant names of the Phæacian princes offer to the frivolity of their own genius. It is the contrast between the divine majesty of Jove and his Olympic court, and the human vices and weaknesses fastened on them by the popular superstition, which, in the Iliad, constitutes the whole point of the satire in the description of their domestic squabbles. The burlesque turn given, in the concluding lines of the episode of Diomed and Glaucus, to the act of chivalrous courtesy which otherwise so gracefully terminates their encounter, though conceived in the spirit of Homer, is not so favourable a specimen of his art.

Comic element of Homer's style.

Among the other modes in which Homer's facetious vein displays itself, is his fondness for a play of words, or, in familiar language, a pun. From the gravity of the subjects selected, and the subtlety of their treatment, his object would seem, in some of these cases, as much a display of etymological ingenuity as a mere jest. This kind of wit is not very commendable in itself, nor perhaps has Homer shown any marvellous skill in its exercise. It has however, like some other less dignified features of his style, the advantage of illustrating the unity of his genius even in its defects.

Play of words, or "pun."

The broadest and liveliest of these sallies is the assumption by Ulysses of the name of Utis, or Nobody, in his adventure with Polyphemus. Here however the most delicate point of the joke, which few readers probably take into account, is the series of mutual references, running through the sequel of the poem, between the term Utis and its ambiguous cognate Metis, as the latter occurs, sometimes in the synonymous sense of Nobody, sometimes in that, which also belongs to it, of Wisdom or Sagacity.¹ The hero is thus made, in the same punning mood, to describe himself as outwitting the giant as much in his real capacity of Sage as in his assumed character of Nobody.

As a specimen of the etymological pun may be cited the description, in the *Iliad*², of the spear of Achilles, the gift of his father Peleus. Here the play of words is threefold, between Pelai, to brandish; Peliada, "received from Peleus;" and Mount Pelion, in the forests of which the shaft of the weapon was cut. Another very similar case occurs in the *Odyssey*³, in the account of the two gates through which Dreams pass from heaven to earth. The one is of ivory, Elephas, from which issue visions of a delusive character, elephai-rontai; the other is of horn, Keras, through which are sent such as make good or fulfil, krai-nousi, their warnings. Equally palpable, in the same poem⁴, is the play of words between the name of the monster Scylla, and that of the Scylax, or whelp, to the cries of which animal her own are likened. Another occurs in the same context, between the latter element of the name Cha-rybdis and rhoibdeo, to suck up or engulf, the phrase employed in the immediate sequel to describe the fierceness of the whirlpool.¹ In the Iliad² we have what may be called a mythological pun, in the application of the term Laos, in its twofold sense of stone and people³, to the petrification of the astounded multitude on witnessing the fate of Niobe's children. A still more subtle series of quibbles is in the passage descriptive of the Aloïdæ, between the words Orion, Enne-oroi⁴, Enne-orgyioi, and Ennea-pechees.

Another form in which the poet's burlesque vein finds issue, and which, in modern vernacular usage, might be defined as "conversational slang," is the sort of quaint parabolic commonplace, occasionally

⁴ Od. xi. 310. This epithet ἐννέωπος is, there can be little doubt, an archaic word, obsolete but in Homeric usage. The first element is formed from ἔννος, or έννος, the primitive Pelasgo-Greek term for year, annus; the second, of cognate import, connects itself with ἔσρα, season, figuratively, youth or beauty. The whole epithet thus indicates, "of mature years," either as regards intellect or stature. But the poet has brought the former element of the word, as of the succeeding epithets, into punning connexion with the number nine, ἐννέα; and has thus magnified the prowess of the heroes, by characterising them as giants at nine years of age. He throws in, at the same time, another play of words between ωπος, the latter half of this enigmatical epithet, and the name of Orion, a hero celebrated for youthful strength and beauty. Ἐννέωπος has been generally rendered "nine years old," by the commentators; not merely in its punning etymology, but its ordinary literal signification; an interpretation as inapplicable to the various texts where it occurs, as that here preferred is natural and appropriate. The notion of a nine years old cow or hog (Od. x. 19. 390.), of nine years old oil (Il. xviii. 351.), or of Minos as a nine years old king (Od. xix. 179.), is as extravagant as that of a nine years old giant. Substitute "of mature age" in each case, and the epithet becomes both intelligible and expressive.

preferred to the direct mode of shaping a question or answer regarding some ordinary matter. Telemachus, for example, when asked by Mentès whether he is the son of Ulysses, replies¹: "that his mother tells him so; but that for his part he cannot be sure; as no man can vouch from personal knowledge to his own paternity." Similar is the question familiarly put to strangers² on their arrival in Ithaca, "What ship had brought them? for it is to be presumed they had not arrived in the isle by land." In the same half-jocular sense must be understood another query, also habitually addressed³ to strangers arriving by sea: "Whether they are pirates or honest men?" Amid the general blindness of commentators to the facetious element of the poem, this inquiry has usually and very uncritically been assumed to be made in sober earnest. It has been often cited accordingly, in illustration of the barbarous state of society in Homer's time, when piracy was considered so honourable an occupation that no discredit attached to the suspicion of being engaged in it. The passage may indeed prove, as quoted by Thucydides, that piracy was then common. It must however be evident, that even in times when the practice prevailed ever so extensively, those exposed to its ravages would not be likely on that account to look with such indulgence on its professors, as that it should be a matter of indifference whether a guest approach their habitation in a spirit of peace, or for the purpose of robbery and plunder. Even in the most piratical age therefore, no such question could have come into vogue, but as a quaint mode of asking a strange guest who and what he was.

These specimens of conversational drollery, with others that might be added, if of no great merit in themselves, nor perhaps always introduced on the most appropriate occasions, are valuable, as manifesting the unity of the poet's genius even in its weaker points. They also exemplify the fondness of the Greeks, at this early period, for sly repartee, and their irresistible tendency to convert even the gravest matters into subjects of ridicule.

8. There remains to be considered one more characteristic feature of Homer's ethic mechanism, which, if it cannot strictly be classed under the head of humorous, is at least of analogous tendency. It is one of so subtle a nature, and so exclusively peculiar to himself, as to be not easily apprehended but by aid of examples; and hence, as equally common to both poems, it supplies the more pointed evidence of their unity of origin. The poet himself defines it by the general term of a Trial, or Test, of his heroes by each other: πειρᾶν, πειρᾶσθαι, πειρητίζειν. Sometimes this trial amounts to little more than what we call bantering; an experiment, as it were, on the temper or patience, by sarcastic or tantalising allusions to tender subjects. Elsewhere the phrase in its various forms denotes, to sound or fathom a man, by some subtle or insidious proposal relative to matters of interest to the inquirer. At other times it may be interpreted, to deceive or beguile by false promises or pretences; and occasionally expresses the preparation for, or breaking of, some delicate piece of intelligence. In ranking this among the eccentricities, rather than the merits, of Homer's style, it is not meant to characterise it as altogether devoid of poetical value. It contributes at times to the spirit of the dialogue, especially where of a satirical turn, and occasionally also heightens the effect of pathetic scenes. Its relative advantages or defects will be best appreciated by means of the subjoined examples.

The first and most remarkable, in the Iliad, is the experiment practised by Agamemnon on the temper of his troops. Before executing Jove's order to lead them out to battle, he determines to put their zeal for the service to the test (πειρήσεσθαι), by an oration expressing his despair of the success of the expedition, and proposing their immediate reembarkation for Greece. His fellow-chiefs are at the same time instructed, should their men respond to this suggestion, to restrain them from carrying it into effect. Upon any recognised principle, either of political or poetical tactics, this seems one of the most defective portions of the Iliad. It is difficult to see what possible advantage could ever have accrued from such an "experiment¹," while, if successful, it was certain, as the event showed, to be attended with serious inconvenience.

The reply of Hector to the defiance of Ajax, previous to their single combat, provokes the following retort from the Greek hero : VII. 235.

μήτι μιν, ἥντε παῖδός ἀφ' αὐροῦ, πειρήτιζε,
ἥν γυναικός, ἥ οὐκ οἶδεν πολεμήϊα ἔργα.

Here, as in some other parallel passages of the poem, the term signifies to taunt, or trifle with, rather than prove or tempt.¹

The examples of this indirect mode of conducting the action are, as might be expected, still more frequent in the Odyssey than in the Iliad. In the recognition scene between Ulysses and Laertes, the "trial" of the old king by his son is another instance of the poet's partiality for this kind of figure, little more favourable or intelligible than the test of the troops by Agamemnon in the Iliad.² The scene contains no doubt some fine passages; but it was surely neither natural nor probable that an affectionate son, on first meeting, after twenty years of separation, with a beloved parent bowed down to the brink of the grave by grief for his loss, should take pleasure, before disclosing himself, in practising on the feelings of the old man by the subtle process here resorted to.

When Telemachus, in his first interview with Menelaus, and as yet unknown to him, appears affected by some allusion to the fate of Ulysses, the courteous king, it is said, hesitated: IV. 118.

ἦέ μιν αὐτὸν πατὴρ ἐάσειε μνηστῆραι,
ἢ πρῶτ' ἐξερέοιτο, ἕκαστά τε πειρήσαιοιτο.³

"Whether he should allow him undisturbed to indulge his feelings, or should test him by cross-questioning."

The mode in which Polyphemus⁴ attempts to

"pump out" of Ulysses where he had left his ship, is similarly described; as is also the sly parabolic harangue¹ by which the hero in his mendicant disguise, solicits the loan of a cloak from the swineherd. The same phraseology, in its several varieties, is used both by Ulysses and Telemachus², with reference to their plan of "sounding," or "fathoming" the fidelity of the members of their household; and Minerva, in describing the wily cautious genius of Ulysses, characterises him as one "who would not trust even his own wife, without first submitting her fidelity to some species of test."³

This figure of poetical rhetoric, under its various phases, is of so marked a character, as naturally to have suggested itself to the poet's imitators as a good expedient for imparting Homeric spirit to their text. There is, however, no trace of its employment by any other representative of the primitive epic genius.

1. HOMER'S faculty of dramatising his narrative, of transferring from himself to his heroes the duty of developing both the action of the poem and their own characters, is one of the most prominent peculiarities, as well as beauties, of his style. As such it has been pointedly noticed by most of the great critics of antiquity, from Plato¹ and Aristotle² downwards; and his superiority in this respect to all other epic poets, antient or modern, still remains undisputed. The faculty itself cannot be more clearly defined than in the words of Aristotle: "Homer, commendable as he is on so many other accounts, is especially so in that he alone among poets has rightly understood what belongs to his own office.

faculty,

For the poet himself ought to say as little as possible, otherwise he would not be, as he ought to be, an imitator of nature. Other poets are accustomed to appear in their own person, as managers of the whole action, leaving little or nothing to imitative art. But he, after a short proœmium, at once introduces a man, woman, or some other personification of nature, and always in the most natural and characteristic manner." There is scarcely a page of either work but what supplies illustration of this criticism. In the Iliad, the exordium itself, though necessarily delivered in the poet's own person, is in so far dramatised that it is couched in the form of an address, first to his Muse and then to his reader. Even here his personal announcement is limited to a general idea of the great subject on which he is about to embark; and immediately a purely dramatic turn is given to the action, by the introduction of Chryses addressing his petition to Agamemnon. The remainder of the book is an almost continued succession of dialogue or debate; often with little more of explanatory matter than some editors of tragedies are wont to append to their scenes, in order to render them intelligible.

In the Odyssey this characteristic is exemplified still more extensively, owing partly to the greater opening afforded by the subject to the portraiture of familiar life; partly to the preponderance in the Iliad of adventures, the battles for instance, which could hardly be described but in a narrative form. A more complete dramatic illusion in epic poetry can scarcely be imagined than the twentieth canto of the Odyssey, comprising, according to its antient title, "the events prior to the death of the suitors."

The scene opens with the striking self-dialogue already cited, between Ulysses and his own heart, as he lay tossing on his anxious couch. His subsequent interview with Minerva, and the soliloquy of the equally sleepless Penelope in the thalamus above, are also pure drama. The sound of Penelope's voice, reaching his ear, calls forth his prayer to Jupiter for some token of sympathy with their woes. The answer is a peal of thunder, followed up by the touching episode, where the hapless maiden, condemned to toil through the night at the mill, is heard complaining, in another part of the palace, of the hardships entailed on the household by the profligacy of the suitors, and hailing the prodigy as an omen of speedy relief. The morning now dawns, and the gradual increase of bustle in a large patriarchal establishment is not described, but acted. Telemachus rises, and after conversing with the housekeeper on the hospitalities of the day, proceeds to the forum. Euryclea enjoins on her maids especial diligence in setting in order the palace halls, as the religious festival in preparation would attract the guests early. The dependants of the family now drop in one by one, and resume their daily functions. The men heap wood on the hearth; the women draw water from the fountain. Eumæus and Melanthius arrive with their customary supply of live stock. The former enters into friendly converse with his disguised master, who is made the butt of the goatherd's insolence. Another faithful rustic enters, and joins in the dialogue. At length come the suitors, who exhibit their own characteristic levity and scurrility in the usual lively colours; and the picture of life and manners concludes with the scene between Theoclymenus and the reckless crew, the powerful effect of which episode has already been noticed. This whole book is, in fact, little else than a continued drama, or act of a tragedy. The illusion is perhaps still more complete than in a theatrical composition, from the variety of events brought on the scene, without either a sacrifice of the "unities," or a conventional assumption of their existence.

in the portraiture of
character.

One great advantage certainly of this method of treatment is the aid it affords to portraiture of character. Elaborate commentaries on the vices, virtues, or eccentricities, of any remarkable personage, are always comparatively ineffective. Let him however be made to exhibit himself in a few well-managed scenes, and we obtain a better acquaintance with him than through volumes of studied description. Homer accordingly, seldom vouchsafes any more special definition of his leading characters than their familiar epithets. Even in respect to those qualities of his heroes, a knowledge of which could less easily be communicated by themselves, such as their stature or personal appearance, he shifts the burthen from himself by making them describe each other. Of this expedient, the dialogue between Priam and Helen on the Trojan wall is a prominent example. Much is also managed by means of illustrative imagery; as where Ajax, retreating before the crowd of Trojans, is likened to an ass driven out of a corn field by the cudgels of a troop of boys. Perhaps the most remarkable specimen of this indirect portraiture is the picture of Polyphemus in the Odyssey. All that the poet, "in his own person," tells us concerning the monster is, that "he was more like a woody mountain top than a man." Every further impression of him is derived from the particulars of the action. Such are the immensity of the burthen he bears, and the stone he rolls; the noise of his entry into the cave; the flight of Ulysses and his comrades, on beholding him, terror-struck, "like bats," into its recesses; the sinking of their hearts within them at the sound of his voice; and the facility with which he seizes, kills, cooks, and swallows his victims. Hence, while in the whole cycle of marvellous adventure there is probably no giant who is so little described, there is none of whose person and character we have so full and clear an apprehension.

How little pleasure Homer took in appearing, as Aristotle defines it, in his own person, is evinced by sundry other elegant expedients, to which he resorts in order to give a dramatic turn to the text, where it could not conveniently be embodied in the form of an ordinary dialogue. A favourite one is to share his functions with his heroes¹, his Muse², his reader³, or even altogether indefinite persons, by addressing himself to the one or the other, as it may happen, instead of pursuing the usual train of discourse to a general audience. Public opinion, or the sentiments of classes or groups of men upon interesting topics, is similarly dramatised, by the introduction of nameless speakers mutually expressing their views to each other.¹ Another fertile resource is that peculiarly Homeric self-dialogue above examined, where, on occasion of any great emergency overtaking one of his actors, the poet, instead of himself explaining the difficulties of the crisis, exhibits the hero debating the matter with "his own soul" personified within his breast for the occasion.

It is remarkable that this particular form of personal allocution, of which there occur in all eighteen examples, three in the Iliad, fifteen in the Odyssey, is limited, in the former poem exclusively to Patroclus, in the latter to Eumæus. Conf. Il. xvi. 693.

Menelaus is similarly addressed in numerous passages of the Iliad: iv. 127., vii. 104., xvii. 679. 702.; Apollo, in Il. xv. 365., xx. 152.; Melanippus, in xv. 582.; Achilles, in xx. 2.

His descriptive faculty.

2. Any detailed analysis of those broader features of Homer's descriptive style which have in all ages formed trite subject of eulogy, such as the splendour of his battles or his storms, could involve little more than a repetition of much that has been often and better illustrated in popular treatises on the subject. The following few observations have been framed therefore, more with the object of throwing light on the personal unity of the poet than the character of his compositions.

As a general rule the heroic enterprise of the Iliad may be described as martial, that of the Odyssey as maritime. Each poem, however, supplies occasional instances of the kind of adventure more immediately proper to its rival.

Battles.

There is perhaps no feature of the Iliad which more broadly distinguishes it from other works of its class, than the large portion of the text allotted to

¹ Of this the most remarkable form is that commencing with the verse :

ὦδε δέ τις εἶπεσκεν ἰδὼν ἐς πλησίον ἄλλον, repeated, under sundry varieties, ten times in the Iliad, eighteen in the Odyssey.

actual fighting; to the simple operation of killing and wounding; the anatomy, as it were, of warfare. That Homer's battles are accumulated to an excessive degree, and that they often present a sameness and minuteness calculated to move the spleen of even a not over-fastidious reader, cannot be denied. Yet it is remarkable, that while there are few properties of the Iliad more frequently dwelt on by critics of all ages than the fire and spirit of its battles, the imputation of tediousness is seldom seriously pressed. The severity of criticism would seem to have been disarmed by the poet's skill in enlivening his subject; by the tact with which he successively brings forward the different heroes as principal objects of attention, and by the novelty which their different modes of acting impart to the reproduction of the same performance; by the interesting notices interspersed of their families or fortunes; and by the rich variety of supernatural agency or figurative imagery in which he dresses up the particulars of each adventure. Much also of his circumstantial minuteness of description, such as the surgical accuracy with which wounds are inflicted, may be considered as an indulgence to that peculiarity of taste above examined, which leads a primitive audience to delight in detailed descriptions even of petty matters possessing an immediate hold on their personal sympathy or curiosity.

The martial element of the Iliad therefore supplies, in its defects as in its merits, an obvious argument in favour of substantial integrity in the composition of the poem. The greater the power of imparting spirit to such a redundancy of monotonous occurrences, the more improbable that so eccentric a combination of taste and talent should have been common, under such pervading features of resemblance, to any number of authors. As regards again the supposed subordinate integrity of the parts or cantos of the poem, it were certainly nothing unlikely in itself, that different poets should select, each as the subject of a separate song, the exploits before Troy, of Diomed, Ajax, or Menelaus. But that an artificial compiler, qualified to construct an Iliad out of such materials, in endeavouring to impart the highest degree of epic finish to his work, should have studiously accumulated so overwhelming a mass of military details, is infinitely less probable, than that such a combination should have spontaneously emanated from a single fervid and eccentric genius, inspired by a single great and exciting subject.

While the military element of the Iliad is thus profusely varied, comprising the collision of armies, the siege and defence of cities and camps, the flight, the pursuit, the rally, the single combat, that of the Odyssey offers no such variety. The only battle described at any length in the latter poem, that between Ulysses and the suitors, is marked indeed by the same general style, and by many of the same traits of merit and defect, as those of the Trojan plain. It is, however, on the whole, a far less favourable specimen of the poet's art, owing chiefly to the defective materials which both the adventure and the locality supplied for such descriptions. A better parallel will be found in passages of a more incidental character. Among these the most remarkable is the account given by Ulysses of his adventure with the Ciconians, which, in order to be rightly appreciated, must be quoted entire: Od. ix. 39.

This narrative, in native simplicity and originality, in condensed power, spirit, and vivacity, in the number and variety of the events as compared with the concise perspicuity of the language, stands unsurpassed, perhaps unrivalled, by any other passage of either poem. It is in fact a miniature of a martial epopee, as complete in its beginning, middle, and end as Aristotle himself could have desired. Yet it will be found, by reference to the marginal citations, to be made up in a great measure of verses common to the Iliad. Although one or two of these parallel texts are of a nature to entitle them, possibly, to a place in the public stock of epic phraseology, in regard to the rest this cannot, among other reasons, be supposed, from their occurrence being confined to the two occasions here referred to, in the page of either work. The passage of Iliad II. has already been quoted among the images employed to enforce one of the poet's standard moral maxims; and the two noble lines of II. XVIII. will be hereafter cited in equally pointed illustration of another prominent characteristic of his style. That a genius qualified to produce this description might avail himself, at times, of the current commonplace of his profession may be granted; but it is incredible that he should have condescended to botch up his own finest passages, by plagiarising verses and ideas remarkable for spirit and beauty from the stores of a neighbour.

The Odyssey offers numerous other texts evincing, wherever the subject involved the introduction of military affairs, a mode of treating them essentially the same as in the Iliad. The greater part of the hero's narrative to Eumæus is but an abridgement of one of the military rhapsodies of the latter poem, delivered with much of the gossiping quaintness of Nestor.¹

Storms. 3. In its own proper sphere of hazardous adventure, the storm or the shipwreck, the Odyssey in its turn maintains its superiority to the Iliad. That this too was owing to difference of subject, not of genius in the author, is proved by many passages in the illustrative portion of the Iliad, where the phenomena of the ocean, or the habits of seafaring life, are described in language not only marked by the very same spirit, but embodying, often to the letter, the most delicate images and expressions of the more finished pictures of the Odyssey. This will abundantly appear from the following series of parallels:

It were difficult to imagine stronger internal evidence of unity and originality than is afforded by this series of descriptions, whether in the identity of their spirit, or the happy choice and delicate interconnexion of so rich a variety of expressive terms, scattered, under a corresponding variety of combination, over widely separate portions of each poem.

 picturesque.

A question has been raised by speculative critics², concerning Homer's faculty of apprehending or appreciating the picturesque in landscape scenery, apart from the animal creation by which it is enlivened. On the negative side has been urged the absence of finished landscape description from his poems, unless in so far as incidental to his general course of figurative embellishment. A want of taste for such description, even if observable in Homer, could hardly be considered as a peculiarity of his individual genius, still less as proof of his indifference to sublime or beautiful scenery. It is a feature common to the primitive art of every country. The Muse of poetry, like the Muse of painting, in her early more genial age, selects exclusively, or by preference, animate subjects, mind not matter, as food for her inspirations. There were no landscape painters in the earlier purer stages of the Italian school. Inanimate nature is there too altogether secondary: yet it is neither neglected nor ill-understood. The landscapes which form the framework of Raphael's living groups are models of excellence in their kind. The analogy holds closely in respect to the more genial days of epic poetry. It occurred as little to Homer as to Raphael to embody his conceptions of mere locality in elaborate pictures. Yet his incidental sketches convey as clear an impression of the scenery of the Troad, or of Ithaca, as if the Iliad and Odyssey had each been prefaced by a chapter on its own geography. The allusions also to the more striking phenomena of nature, interspersed, chiefly in illustrative forms, over the text of both poems, are unsurpassed in graphic spirit by the descriptive poetry of any period. In their very conciseness, and the scope they leave to the imagination, they represent objects perhaps more effectually than if extended into closer detail. Such, for example, are the description just quoted, of the breakers dashing on the sea beach between two rocky headlands¹; that of the distant storm seen darkly rolling over the sea, by the shepherd from the hill side on the shore¹; of the snow fanned by the vernal zephyr, silently melting on the mountain top, and trickling down its sides to swell the torrent in the vale below²; of the thunder cloud clearing off some lofty mountain range, and unfolding to the view, in the bright sunbeams as they struggle through the still lurid atmosphere, the grand outline of peaks, and chasms, and projecting ridges.³ But in fact, various portions of the geographical narrative of the Odyssey offer a near approach to more regular, if not very elaborate, landscape composition. Such are, among others, the descriptions of the island of Lachea, the port of Læstrygonia, and the bower of Calypso.

² Coleridge, Introduction to the Study of Greek Classics, 2d ed. p. 239.; Copplestone, ibid.; Humboldt, Cosmos, vol. ii. init.

Faculty of condensation and amplifica-
tion.

4. The individuality and excellence of Homer's descriptive art, are further displayed in his joint faculty of condensation and amplification, according as the spirit of the subject might require the one or the other mode of treatment.

It may be held as a general rule, in poetry as in other elegant arts, that the nobler the object to be described, the less detailed should be the description. It is certain that every hair on the head or brow, every grain in the skin, of a beautiful woman, combines in producing the full effect of her charms. But the Dutch painter, who scrupulously copies each minute trait, furnishes neither so agreeable nor so true a portrait, as the bolder artist of the Venetian school. The reason is that those details, although they help to fill the eye, do not come home to the imagination. The eye itself, in dwelling on the whole image, takes as little account of them as a person reading a book of each letter, point, or accent, of its text. This rule applies even more forcibly to the descriptive than the graphic branches of imitative art. The destruction of a city by earthquake or fire, or any other dire catastrophe involving the fate of heroes or multitudes, if analytically set forth in every petty detail of action or suffering, would less forcibly strike the apprehension, than were the narrative confined to the few broader features of the disaster, such as would alone or chiefly engross the attention of an actual observer. The converse of the rule holds equally good. As the full effect of a painting of fruits or flowers depends greatly on its imitative preciseness, so, in the parallel class of poetical composition, a want of grandeur in the general subject requires to be compensated by graphic delineation of detail. Here, as elsewhere, Homer's practice does but exemplify the fundamental principles of his art.

In the first book of the Iliad, Apollo, enraged at the insult offered by a haughty monarch to his favourite priest, descends from heaven, armed with his bow and arrows, emblems of his destructive powers, and spreads death and dismay through a mighty army. The whole formation and execution of his fatal purpose occupies barely ten lines. For the interval between the prayer of the priest and the arrival of the god in the camp, two suffice. "The suppliant spoke, the god heard, and wrathful in heart descended from Olympus, his bow and quiver rattling on his shoulders."¹ No elaborate description could convey such an impression of the terror and suddenness of divine anger as these few abrupt sentences. Still more striking is the notice of the final catastrophe, contained in a single verse: "He smote; and the funeral piles burnt incessantly." The havoc of the pestilence is here far more vividly expressed, than by the most pathetically minute particulars of the forms in which it raged, or the sufferings of the victims.

With the above may be contrasted another feat of archery in the same poem. Pandarus, the Lycian bowman, is selected by Minerva as her agent for bringing about a renewal of hostilities, by a treacherous attempt on the life of Menelaus. This adventure, however momentous in its consequences, offers in itself nothing grand or terrible. The chief actor is comparatively insignificant. The same goddess who instigates the outrage provides for its harmlessness. The poet therefore avails himself of this opportunity to enliven his narrative, by dressing up with the graces of descriptive detail the exercise of a popular branch of the military art. The account of the shot alone, here occupies more than double the space devoted to the whole visitation of Apollo and funeral obsequies of his victims. These twenty-two lines¹ form, in fact, a little epic poem on a feat of archery. The preparation of the bow is first described. The material of which it is made, a chamois' horn, suggests an episode descriptive of the hunting party in which the chamois was killed. Another excursion describes the manufacture of the horn into a weapon of war. The stringing of the bow, and other preliminaries to the shot, are next detailed, with the particulars of place and circumstance; the bowman crouching behind the shield of his comrades, accomplices of his treachery. The lifting up of the lid of the quiver; the extraction of the arrow; the description of it; the fitting of the groove to the bowstring; the solemnity with which the Lycian archer, like the Calabrian brigand, invokes the divine aid for the success of his crime; the grasping of the string and the arrow nick with the fingers; the stretching of the bow; the approach of the string to the breast, of the barb to the horn of the bow, are all distinctly particularised. After being gradually led by these successive stages to the decisive moment, a sort of pause ensues, in a verse indicating that "now all was ready;" and then follows the catastrophe of the piece in two brilliant lines, bringing home the very twang of the bowstring to the ears, and exhibiting the shaft flying to its destination with the ardour and eagerness of an animated being.

The description, in the tenth book of the Odyssey, of the destruction of the Ithacan fleet by the Læstrygonians, with masses of rock from the cliffs that overhung their port, offers the closest parallel to Apollo's pestilence in the Iliad. Volumes of pathetic detail could never shadow forth the terrible size and ferocious acts of the monsters, the crash of the wrecks or the screams of the mariners, with half the effect of these five lines of simple statement. The analogy both of sound and spirit, in the verses descriptive of the actual catastrophe in the two passages, is very remarkable:

Il. i. 52.

He smote; and the funeral piles burnt continually.

Od. x. 122.

They smote; and the sound arose of dying men and shattered vessels.

Again, in the account of the cannibalism of Polyphemus : Od. ix. 290.

He smote; and the men's brains were scattered on the ground.

In the Odyssey, the fabric of the raft of Ulysses¹, the clothes-washing of Nausicaa², and the hero's own first and bloodless display of archery prior to the assault on the suitors³, supply apt parallels to the above description of the shot of Pandarus.

Among the specimens of Homer's descriptive faculty, familiarly cited by both antient and modern critics, is the comment passed by the Trojan elders on the beauty of Helen, as she is seen approaching their seat on the ramparts: "that it was neither matter of surprise nor blame, that nations should wage long and bloody wars for the possession of so divine a woman." This is the only description ever vouchsafed in the Iliad of this type of female loveliness. But the simple fact that these hoary sages should be so spell-bound by her beauty, as to consider her presence within their city an equivalent for all the crime and misery she had caused, conveys a deeper impression of her charms than pages of glowing enlargement. In the Necromancy of the Odyssey, the same means are employed to impart to the portrait of Ajax a supplementary trait, for the introduction of which the Iliad offered no opportunity. The morbid sensibility of his character, and his sullen resentment against Ulysses, are there jointly shadowed forth by a single graphic touch. When the other spirits flock eagerly around the royal sorcerer, Ajax alone stands aloof. To the affectionate address of his generous rival he replies not a word, but stalks sternly and silently away into the deepest recesses of Erebus. With the description of Helen may be compared, in the way both of parallel and contrast, that of the Læstrygonian ogress: "They found a woman of mountain stature, and were horror-struck."¹

5. Homer's nice perception of the qualities of Epitheta. objects, in their correspondence or their difference, their beauty or deformity, could not fail to insure his selection of appropriate Epithets to define or adorn his principal images; while his innate good taste proved a sufficient safeguard against abuse or excess in the employment of such aids. His text, accordingly, has ever been a standard model in regard to this as to other departments of poetical style. In one respect however these expletives form, with the primitive Muse, a more characteristic feature of epic mechanism than in later times, as constituting an important ingredient of her poetical commonplace. In this capacity they forfeit, in a great measure, their primary functions of defining the properties of individual objects, as distinct from others of the same class; and become a conventional adjunct of the class itself, extending or completing, as it may be, the general idea expressed by the substantive to which they are subservient. Such are, among other examples, μῶνυχες ἵπποι, "the hoofed horses;" εἰλίποδας ἑλικας βοῦς, φίλον ἦτορ, κύνες ἀργοί. This conventional use of epithets² is another of those idiomatic

² It is sometimes productive of curious but not inelegant anomalies; as for example where an epithet, conventionally common to the whole of a class, comes to be specially applied to particular individuals of that class, whose conduct may be the very reverse of the quality which the properties of early epic art, which please in the spontaneous usage of the primitive bard, but would be offensive in a modern poet, if exemplified at least in the same manner and to the same extent; for, under certain limitations, the peculiarity has been inherited by subsequent schools of poetry.

The most important of Homer's epithets, whether in their specific or their conventional application, are those illustrative of the characters of his heroes; and through them of the unity of his own genius, as displayed in the highest attribute of his art, his portraiture of human nature. To these therefore the present commentary will be solely or chiefly confined; both on account of their own intrinsic value, and as furnishing the requisite criteria for judging of his practice in regard to the remainder. They may be subdivided under the three following heads:—
I. Those more or less common to the race of heroes at large; II. Those common to but a portion of them, whether collectively or individually; III. Those proper to a single hero.

as common to the race
of heroes.

The greater or less frequency with which the more familiar epithets of the first or common class, such as κρατερός, βοὴν ἀγαθός, μεγάρθυμος, δῖος, and so forth, are connected with particular names, seems often to depend on causes of a very subtle nature, shedding, by their own obscurity, an interesting light on the unity of the poet's usage. The term δῖος, for ex-phrase denotes. The term ἑταῖρος (comrade), for instance, has the conventional epithet εὔρηπος, denoting in a high degree the more valuable qualities which persons standing in that relation to each other can possess, attachment, fidelity, discipline. The phrase however having been once so appropriated, is frequently extended also to comrades whose conduct is of quite an opposite description; selfish, treacherous, or mutinous. Vide Od. xii. 397.; conf. Il. xxiii. 304. 310.

ample, literally "divine," is a customary epithet of individual heroes of various countries and characters. In a collective sense however it is restricted chiefly to the Greek army or nation. It is also occasionally given to the Pelasgians, in the comparatively rare cases where their name is mentioned; but never, in any case, is it awarded in the same national sense to the Trojans or Dardanians. This distinction might, on first view, appear a special compliment to the divine origin of the Helleno-Pelasgic race. It may however be further observed, that while the phrase is habitually applied to the Greeks under their collective title of Achæans, in no case is it conjoined with the titles of Danaan or Argive, equally common to the whole nation. This limitation again might seem to imply some superior antiquity or dignity of the former, as representing the old Hellenic stock, while the other two were held to date from the comparatively recent epoch of the Danaïd or Pelopidan ascendancy. That much however is due here, as in other similar cases, to metrical causes, or the mere caprice of vernacular usage, may be inferred from certain other subtle distinctions in the application of the term. It can hardly be the result of mere chance, that of the twenty varieties of form of which the word is susceptible, several should be constantly employed: δῖοι, for example, ten times, δίω twenty times; while others, such as δίων, δίοισι, δίους, never once occur. Yet there is nothing in the excluded forms essentially less poetical than in the others, nor were the opportunities for their introduction less frequent.

Some epithets signifying qualities more or less common to every chief, and hence habitually used in that general sense, will yet be found so much more frequently and pointedly connected with certain names, as to prove them in these cases to be pregnant with a more specific power. Ποιμήν λαῶν, for instance, "shepherd of the people," ἄναξ ἀνδρῶν, "king of men," and κρείων, "royal," denote the office of any king or chieftain, but more particularly that of a supreme ruler or commander. Hence, while several other heroes occasionally receive them in the more universal sense, with Agamemnon they assume the form of proper characteristic epithets. The last phrase of the three offers another curious example of the subtle law of euphony by which the poet was occasionally guided. Κρείων, on the forty occasions of its occurrence in either poem, invariably precedes a word of the same metrical value as Ἀγαμέμνων, and commencing like that name with a vowel; nor, with one single exception¹, does it occur but as the penultimate word of a verse.

6. In other cases, the frequent connexion of certain epithets with particular names, apart from any apparent claim to such distinction, seems to originate in some local or family courtesy, or in that popular caprice which loves, especially in primitive times, to fasten on individuals surnames or sobriquets, often little warranted by any extraordinary amount of the qualifications implied. The term ἀντίθεος, "god-like," furnishes an example, shedding a curious light on the consistency of the poet in such minor points of descriptive detail. This title, in its general application to ordinary persons, is perhaps still more of a commonplace than ḡios "divine." The much greater frequency however of its bestowal on the Lycian chief Sarpedon, than on any other hero, suggests its having been pregnant in his case with more than ordinary import. This view receives confirmation from two other circumstances: first, that the warrior who, next to Sarpedon, is most frequently honoured with it, is Pandarus, chief of a kindred tribe of Lycians on the Hellespont, but far from deserving it in a literal sense; secondly, that its only application throughout the Iliad, as a national epithet, is to the Lycians, subjects respectively of these two princes.

A like importance, as illustrating the court phraseology of the heroic age, attaches to the epithet διοτρεφής. This was evidently a title of homage, familiarly, perhaps exclusively¹ applied to royalty or rank, corresponding to the modern phrases, "your highness," "your excellency." Hence, of the fifty-five times that it occurs, it is used thirty-five in the vocative case, in addresses by one hero to another, or by persons of inferior rank to their betters; and in this form frequently stands alone, without any substantive. But although in so far common to royalty or rank in general, it is, throughout both poems, so much more frequently coupled with the name of Menelaus than of any other individual hero, as to imply that in his case it was not a mere incidental, but a proper title. Similar is the case with διογενής and δαιμόνιος, terms of cognate signification, also used, the former chiefly, the latter exclusively, in the vocative case, in a like independant capacity. Διογενής is also as habitual an epithet of Ulysses, as διοτρεφής of Menelaus.

Another similar phrase is ἡθεῖος.¹ This word, untranslatable by any single English term, expresses the mixed feeling of veneration and affection, entertained by one person towards another standing to him in the joint relation of parent, friend, and benefactor. It occurs altogether but six times. Four times it is used as an independant vocative; addressed, once by Menelaus to Agamemnon, and once by Paris, twice by Deiphobus, respectively, to their elder brother Hector. On a fifth occasion it is applied, still in a vocative form (combined, according to the familiar epic periphrasis, with κεφαλῇ), by Achilles to the shade of Patroclus. That it was usually if not exclusively vocative, there is further curious proof in the only exception to the rule, where Eumæus, in describing the constancy of his affection for Ulysses, and how unceasingly present his absent lord was to his memory, sums up with the following line: Od. xiv. 147.

The last clause of this verse plainly intimates that the word was applied, in familiar custom, only to persons present, and that the old man's actual use of it was a species of solœcism.

The unity of the poet's usage also appears in the epithets θεῖος and πολίπορρος, enjoyed in common, to the exclusion of their fellow-warriors, by Achilles and Ulysses, the respective protagonists of each poem; by the latter hero with equal frequency in both. These are the only examples of a similar joint appropriation. The former phrase in its literal sense is little more than a synonyme of δῖος. That it is however the more honourable epithet, appears, both from its limitation to the poet's two leading heroes, and by reference to the other objects, animate or inanimate, who receive it in a conventional sense, all of which, in their various kinds or degrees, are more or less remarkable for dignity or sanctity.¹ Here may also be noticed another curious peculiarity of Homer's usage. Various epithets of this honourable class, while set apart as exclusively proper to one or more distinguished living persons, are also found connected with the names of deceased heroes, often of such as possess little apparent title to such a mark of respect. Θεῖος for example, though enjoyed by no other living chief but the two of highest celebrity, is allowed, not only to Hercules, but to Thoas king of Lemnos, to Oileus, and to Mynes king of Lyrnessus. Similar is the case with the proud martial epithet of πολίπορρος, which occurs, slightly varied on two occasions into πολιπόρριος, in all eighteen times; ten in the Iliad, Epithets jointly common to the protagonist of each poem.

eight in the Odyssey. Of these it is assigned four times to Achilles, and ten times to Ulysses: to the former, as the destroyer of upwards of twenty cities on the coast and islands of the Ægean; to the latter, as the special instrument, under Jupiter, of the fall of Troy itself.¹ In the remaining four cases, it is given once to Mars, once to Bellona, and once each to two deceased heroes, Oïleus and Otryntes, distinguished, it may be presumed, in the tradition of the poet, by some special claim to the mural crown of military honour.

Epithets proper to
heroes.

7. The epithets exclusively proper to single heroes of either poem must, to be rightly appreciated, be considered in connexion with the previous analysis of their characters. Those set apart for Achilles are, πόδας αἰὺς, ποδάρκης, ῥηξήνωρ, θυμολέων, and μέγα φέρτατος Ἀχαιῶν.² The first four embody the chief attributes of military prowess, activity, strength, and courage; the last asserts the hero's general superiority to all rivals. The third in the list, ῥηξήνωρ, "crusher of men," is, among all those in the poet's vocabulary, the most powerfully expressive of destructive irresistible prowess. The fourth, θυμολέων, "Lion-heart," which Achilles enjoys in common with the deceased hero Hercules, is remarkable for its identity with that of Cœur-de-lion, borne by the warrior of modern chivalry whose character most nearly resembles that of Achilles. This term, it is true, is also twice connected with the name of Ulysses, but under circumstances which no way warrant its being classed among his legitimate titles. Here another distinction presents itself, indispensable to a right estimate of the spirit of Homer's epithets: whether they are applied by himself to his heroes, or by his heroes to each other. A near relative, friend, or favourite vassal, may without impropriety be made, in the enthusiasm of his love or gratitude, to speak of a patron in terms no way corresponding to his character as conceived by the poet himself. For such expressions Homer can as little be made responsible, as for all the other sentiments placed in the mouths of his actors. Of this distinction numerous examples might be cited, among which the one here in point will suffice. It is Penelope who, on both the occasions here adverted to, in the warmth of her affection and admiration, styles her husband the "Lion-hearted." Although therefore the hero may not be undeserving of the title, it can no more be considered as authorised by Homer, than the phrase "detested Ilium," κακοῖλιον οὐκ ὀνομαστήν, by which the same devoted spouse is wont to stigmatise the main source of her domestic sorrows, can be considered as the poet's chosen epithet for the city of Priam.

The exclusive epithets of Ulysses, while of a totally different description, exceed those proper to Achilles, both in number and variety, in the ratio of the former hero's greater variety of talents.¹

Those appropriated to Agamemnon, κύνιστος and εὐρυκρείων, are significant simply of his high functions as chief of the confederacy. The value of the former is enhanced by its being applied with nearly equal frequency to Jupiter, the supreme regulator of the divine, as Agamemnon was of the human affairs of the Hellenic world.

¹ They are nine in all: πολέμης, occurring eighteen times in the Iliad, sixty-six in the Odyssey, also common to Vulcan; ποικιλομήτης, once in the Il., six times in the Od.; πολυμήχανος, seven times in the Il., fifteen in the Od.; ταλασίφρων, once in the Il., eleven times in the Od.; πολύτλας, five times in the Il., thirty-five in the Od.; πολέαινος, once in the Il., thrice in the Od.; τλήμων, twice in the Il.; πολύφρων, thrice in the Od., also common to Vulcan; πολύτροπος, twice in the Od.

The only exclusive epithet of Ajax is ἔρκος Ἀχαιῶν, the "bulwark of the Greeks," finely expressive of his solid ponderous attributes, moral and physical. Those of βουγᾶϊός, "blusterer," and ἀμαρτοπής, "blunderer," also enjoyed by him alone, are to be taken, however appropriate, in a satirical rather than a proper sense, as occurring solely in the taunting addresses of Hector.

Nestor's proper titles are ἵππότης, "horseman¹," and οὔρος Ἀχαιῶν, the "guardian" or "watchman of the Greeks." The former phrase will demand a few remarks in the sequel. The propriety with which the other is allotted to the zealous and provident old chief requires no comment.

Diomed and Menelaus were formerly described as distinguished, among the Greek heroes of rank, rather by general merit and martial accomplishment than by any salient peculiarities. Hence may be explained, that while honoured, perhaps more frequently than their peers, with titles expressive of military excellence in the aggregate, they are the only two who cannot claim a single one as their exclusive property. The occasions, for example, where the epithet βοὴν ἀγαθός, "good at need,"² perhaps the most complimentary of its class, is connected with their two names, greatly exceed the whole collective number of those on which it is assigned to the rest of their fellow-warriors. That of κρατερός, a little less pithy title of prowess, is also allotted far more frequently to Diomed than to his comrades. The only personal epithet of Menelaus is ξανθός, the "yellow-haired."¹

¹ Exclusively proper to himself among the heroes of the siege, but common also to Peleus and four warriors of the past generation.

The titles proper, among living warriors, to Hector, are κορυθαίολος and ἀνδροφόνος.² That the latter, the only martial distinction of the Trojan champion, should be one of such very equivocal honour, is in keeping with the poet's design of exalting the character of his own countrymen at the expense of their rivals. The members of the Trojan royal family are the heroes chiefly, though not exclusively, honoured in the Iliad with the title θεοσιδής, significant of the personal graces for which they were so highly distinguished.

8. The evidence of a substantial unity of author afforded by so much harmony and consistency in this delicate head of illustrative detail, as carried through each poem, is almost too apparent to require to be formally summed up. One or two points however, of more marked coincidence, deserve a few special observations.

The most broadly significant of the titles above cited as restricted to Achilles alone, is ρηξήνωρ, "crusher of men." Of the five occasions on which it is applied to him, four belong to the Iliad one to the Odyssey. The term however, as we have already seen, also occurs in the Odyssey as the proper name of a Phæacian prince, brother of king Alcinoüs. This variety of its application furnishes even more pointed evidence of unity of conception, than the sameness of the other five examples. Attention must here be recalled to the broadly satirical import of the high-flown appellatives of these Phæacian patriarchs, as contrasted with the giddy effeminate character of the race they represent. Judged therefore in the spirit of that lively episode¹, this transformation of a term, elsewhere the exclusive title of a hero really preeminent for the ferocious attributes it denotes, into the proper name of one of the poet's popular types of levity and effeminacy, is a stroke of genuine Homeric irony, which it is hardly credible could proceed from any but the author of the Iliad.

Homer's employment of the epithet ἵππόδαμος, "horse-tamer," also exemplifies in a curious manner the consistency of his usage in the subordinate details, both illustrative and historical, of the two poems. On a superficial view this title may seem to be, and has accordingly been classed by critics of high authority as, a mere military commonplace, similar in value to the modern term "chivalrous," and equally applicable to all heroes distinguished by courage or activity in battle.² This however is a complete misapprehension. There is perhaps no epithet of more precise literal import, or partaking less of a conventional character. It is, throughout both poems, appropriated exclusively to individuals, families, or tribes, celebrated, not so much perhaps for equestrian skill, as for the pleasure they took in rearing horses, or the excellence of the breed they possessed. This will appear at once by reference to the passages in which it occurs. They are, in all, forty-five in the Iliad, three in the Odyssey. In no less than twenty-four cases in the former poem, the phrase is the national distinction of the Trojans, whose claims to it are specially enforced in numerous passages.¹ It is also given once to their neighbours the Phrygians. The Greeks collectively never receive it. The number of living heroes to whom it is assigned is but six; of these, as was to be expected, the larger portion are Trojans: Hector, Antenor, Hyperenor, and Hippiasus. Among Greek warriors it is confined to Diomed, and Thrasymedes son of Nestor. Diomed receives it seven times. His claims rest on his constant use of the chariot in battle, on his victory in the hippodrome in the twenty-third book, and on his often expressed fondness for the animal. As it is also given to his father Tydeus, it may be presumed to have been a family distinction. The same inference is justified in the case of Thrasymedes, by his father's habitual title of ἰππότης, and by various other incidental notices of the equestrian zeal of the Neleïd family.² The only other personages styled horse-tamer in the Iliad are, Atreus lord of the "horse-breeding" Argos, and Castor the tutelar hero of the equestrian art. In the Odyssey, amid a total difference of subject and locality, the epithet occurs but three times, and observe with what singular consistency: once as a title of the same Castor, once of Diomed, once of the "Gerenian horseman Nestor."

And here another delicate proof of unity presents itself, in the minor links of historical connexion between the poems. In the Odyssey, stress is laid on the fact that the dominions of Ulysses were unfavourable to the breeding or use of horses, and that the royal family had no taste for equestrian pursuits. On these grounds Telemachus¹ declines the present of a noble pair offered him by Menelaus; and, in the catalogue so proudly given by Eumæus of his royal master's wealth, no mention occurs of horses.² Most consistently therefore throughout each poem, is no title connected with horsemanship ever allotted to either an Ithacan or a Cephallenian hero. Ulysses, so greatly distinguished in the other athletic exercises at the funeral of Patroclus, takes no part in the chariot race; and from the details of his exploits in the field of battle, it appears that he invariably fought on foot. No allusion ever occurs to either chariot or charioteer of Ulysses.

From these passages it further results, that skill in the management of the horse was far from being so essential a military accomplishment in the heroic age of Greece as in that of modern Europe; and for obvious reasons. Homer's heroes fought, not on horseback, but from their chariots, the use of which was rather locomotive than combative, affording comparatively little scope for the display of chivalrous prowess. The most distinguished warriors dismount for single combat, or during any more desperate conflict between the two lines. The duties of a cavalier were not so much those of the chiefs as of their charioteers, the value of whose services, and of the vehicle they directed, is more largely exemplified in retreat or flight than in successful assault on the enemy. The epithet ἱπποδάμος consequently, in its more general sense, far from implying the same high distinction as our term "chivalrous," indicates rather a fugitive skirmishing mode of warfare, as contrasted with the σταδὴ ὑσμῖνη, or "steady assault" of the man-at-arms. Its limitation consequently, as a national title, to the Trojans, and denial to the Greeks, is a virtual homage by the poet to the martial genius of his own countrymen at the expense of their rivals. The distinction is also pointedly enforced by the recurring line, in which the "chivalrous" character of the Trojan race is most prominently put forward :

Τρώων θ' ἱπποδάμων, καὶ Ἀχαιῶν χαλκοχιτώνων, and by other passages where the contrast is drawn in perhaps still less complimentary terms.

9. Homer's favourite species of illustrative imagery, his partiality for which has led him at times to accumulate it even to an excessive degree, is the simile. In this excess however there is method, exhibiting his usual tact in adapting his means to his object. It has already been remarked that the number of similes in a given portion of his narrative is, as a general rule, in the inverse ratio of that of the facts or occurrences. Where these are copious and varied the illustrations are comparatively limited; where the events are meagre or uniform, the figurative matter often constitutes a principal ingredient of the text. Hence the similes of the Iliad, as a consequence of the greater simplicity of its action, are more numerous than those of the Odyssey. The same rule extends to the integral portions of each poem. The first book of the Iliad is remarkable above the rest for the number and diversity of its historical details: it contains accordingly not one simile, being the only book distinguished by this peculiarity. The same is the case, obviously from a similar cause, with the three opening cantos of the Odyssey. The battle pieces of the Iliad, on the other hand, where the action, however turbulent, is uniform even monotonous in its details, offer the greatest profusion of similes. This may also in part be owing to the exciting nature of the subject. In like manner, the portions of the Odyssey where they are most frequent are, the description of the battle in the twenty-second, and of the storm and shipwreck in the fifth book. In conformity with the same general law, the poet's similes are almost exclusively confined to the narrative or descriptive element of the two poems. The dialogue, as possessing its own peculiar sources of variety or embellishment, ought to be comparatively independent of such adventitious expedients. Set figures of speech are always of doubtful propriety in conversational intercourse, especially where it assumes a more impassioned tone. Those emotions, one is apt to reason, which admit of the mind wandering in search of tropes or metaphors can hardly be very deep or powerful. Homer accordingly, seldom indulges in these embellishments on such occasions; and the few exceptions are as remarkable for their simplicity as for the easy propriety of their introduction.

The occasional redundancy of these figures, especially in the Iliad, while scarcely justifiable on strictly critical grounds, has yet rarely given serious offence to commentators. This may be owing to the beauty of the images themselves, to the evidence of genial inspiration which their very exuberance brings along with it, and to the sympathy with which their author's own enthusiasm for his subject inspires his readers. The sight of some sublime or terrible object, of armies in battle array, or the war of hostile elements, seems to transport him, almost against his better judgement, into a profusion of equally vivid illustrations.¹ In such cases he does not hesitate to borrow several figures in succession from the same class of natural phenomena; as if his mind, once powerfully arrested by the aptness of the parallel, had fondly dwelt on it until the aid it supplied was exhausted. Nor does he disdain to avail himself of the same simile, on a recurrence of matter which it was equally calculated to elucidate. Besides the many which are reproduced in substance under slight varieties of detail, several are repeated nearly word for word on separate occasions, and become, in so far, an element of his "commonplace."²

10. Burke has remarked, in treating of the ascendancy of the fancy over the judgement in primitive ages, that "the most ignorant and barbarous nations, in proportion as they are backward in sorting their ideas, have excelled in similitudes, metaphors, and allegories." This rule he illustrates by the case of Homer, who, he observes, "while often striking out similitudes truly admirable, seldom takes care to have them exact; he is taken with the general resemblance and paints it strongly, but takes no notice of the difference."¹

Although the general principle here inculcated may be correct, its application to the poet's case is evidently founded in great part on misunderstanding. The ascendancy of the imaginative over the discriminating faculty may explain an excess of illustrative matter in the Iliad: but it may be questioned whether any such cause could have the effect of deadening Homer's power of appreciating that just amount of resemblance in objects, which is essential to the propriety of a poetical similitude. It is not so much in the aptitude of the parallel itself, as in the precision with which it is drawn, that the superior "exactness" of the more intellectual stage of art displays itself. Burke's doctrine therefore may be in so far just, that while the main scope of Homer, in his similes, is to delight the fancy by a variety of elegant images, that of the modern poet is often rather to gratify the understanding of his readers by studied and elaborate parallels. The real question however, in any such case, is not so much whether the simile be exact, as whether it be happy and effective. No such figure can, strictly speaking, be exact. A poetical simile may be defined, the illustration of one object with which the reader is assumed to be less familiar, by a comparison with some other of which he is supposed to have a better knowledge. This definition presupposes, together with the resemblance affording the illustration, a difference in other respects. But it is to the resemblance alone that the comparison applies: nor is it easy to see with what propriety a poet of any age, in painting that resemblance strongly, could, as Burke expresses it, "take notice of the difference." Where, to take a familiar example, the poet, wishing to magnify the extraordinary courage or strength of a hero, likens him, when rushing on the hostile ranks, to a lion rushing on a herd of oxen, the figure is both appropriate and exact in respect of the matter to be exemplified, the fury of the assault, and the superiority of the assailant to his adversaries. Still however there is, both in the mode of attack and in the nature of the assailant, a great preponderance of difference over resemblance. But Homer was certainly quite as much alive to that difference as any poet of the most refined period of art would be in a similar case.

11. It is therefore not so much in the essential character of the similitude, as in the mode of stating it, that the liveliness of an imaginative or the precision of an intellectual age is here to be sought; and that liveliness displays itself in Homer in a peculiarity of his mode of working up his images, which constitutes certainly one of their greatest excellences: "the extension namely, or enlargement of the ornamental element of the comparison, beyond the limits of the comparison itself." It is this elegant feature, there can be little doubt, which Burke himself had really in view, in his allusion to the poet's want of exactness. For its better understanding it will be proper, before subjoining examples, to advert to one or two general principles of some importance as bearing on this whole branch of poetical embellishment.

There are two main purposes for which similes may be introduced: first, that of illustrating the mode, secondly, that of marking the degree, in which an action or object is exhibited. In the latter case any close correspondence between the two members of the parallel is the less to be expected. The figure here in fact often becomes rather a poetical hyperbole than a comparison; and a very large difference is not only consistent with, but in some degree essential to, the propriety of the illustration. The danger lies not so much in a want of resemblance, as in exaggeration. When, for example, Achilles sweeping the flying enemy before him is compared to a fire ravaging a forest, the figure is purely hyperbolical. Still however it is appropriate, as enhancing the irresistible ardour of the hero, and the rapidity of his destructive power; nor surely was Homer less sensible of the difference than any modern reader. A large proportion of the poet's similes are of this description, especially in his battles. In such cases where the actual resemblance is so slight, the species of Homeric enlargement here under consideration is less observable than in similes of a more strictly apposite class, where the mode rather than the degree is to be illustrated. In regard to these a further distinction must be drawn, between such circumstantial details as are incidental and such as are essential to the comparison. When, for example, a hero struggling single-handed against a crowd of enemies is compared to a lion keeping at bay a pack of dogs, had the poet said, as the lion fights with paws and teeth, so the hero combats with sword and shield, the impropriety would be obvious; because the circumstances which extend beyond the similitude are so linked with those that contain it, as to seem to be put forward as essential parts of it. But if, in restricting the immediate point of the comparison to the valour of each combatant, the poet were to enlarge separately, or by parenthesis, on the mode or place in which the valour of the lion was displayed, with the object merely of enriching his description, the result would be different. The following examples from each poem will place the matter in a clearer light.

Here the comparison is complete in the two first and two last verses of the passage. The lonely spot, the bristling of the back, and whetting of the teeth, relate exclusively to the animal, and are foreign to the case of the hero.

II. II. 394.

ὡς ἔφατ'· Ἀργεῖοι δὲ μέγ' ἴαχον, ὡς ὅτε κύμα ἀκτῇ ἔφ' ὑψηλῇ, ὅτε κινήσῃ Νότος ἐλθών, προβλήτι σκοπέλῳ· [τὸν δ' οὔποτε κύματα λείπει, παντοίων ἀνέμων, ὅτ' ἂν ἐνθ' ἡ ἔνθα γέωνται].

Here the substance of the simile ends with the likening of the shout to the roaring of the sea. The parenthetic description of the rock, while it greatly augments the beauty of the figure, adds nothing to its precision; the dashing of the waves being described as perpetual, while the shout of the Greeks was but of short duration.

Od. xxiii. 233.

ὥς δ' ὅτ' ἂν ἀσπάσιος γῇ νηχομένοισι φανήη, ὣν τε Ποσειδάων εὐεργέα νῆ' ἐπὶ πόντῳ

 [παῦροι δ' ἐξέφυγον πολὺς ἀλὸς ἡπειρόνδε, ἀσπάσιοι δ' ἐπέβαν γαίης κακότητα φυγόντες·

 ὥς ἄρα τῇ ἀσπαστὸς ἔην πόσις εἰσορώσῃ.

The sad condition of the shipwrecked mariners, so graphically described, finds no analogy whatever in the case of Penelope.

Examples abound of this parenthetic extension of Homer's similes, in which the judicious critic will discover one of their most ornamental features. It imparts to them richness and variety, while it guards against the insipidity apt to result from a formal juxtaposition of closely parallel images. It also affords a field for the play of the poet's fancy, and for the introduction of many spirited traits of life and nature, exhibiting often in more concise and distinct forms than the ordinary descriptions of his text, the actual mode of his observation of men and things. In the simile of the shipwreck for example, the account of the few surviving mariners, emerging, drenched with sea water, from the breakers on the beach, seems wrung from him by his remembrance of a personal share in some such disaster.

Other characteristics of

12. Where the image selected offered more than one point of resemblance, this elegant license of extending and varying the simile displays itself in another mode. Sometimes the analogy to which prominence had been assigned at the commencement gives place, in the sequel, to another of a different but equally appropriate character : XIII. 796.

Homer's
similes.

οἱ δ' ἴσαν ἀργαλείων ἀνέμων ἀτάλαντοι ἀέλλη, ἧ ῥά θ' ὑπὸ βροντῆς πατρὸς Διὸς εἴσι πέδονδε, θεσπεσίῳ δ' ὁμάδῳ ἀλὶ μίσγεται· ἐν δέ τε πολλὰ κύματα παφλάζοντα πολυφλοίσβοιο θαλάσσης, κυρτὰ φαληριόωντα, πρὸ μὲν τ' ἄλλ', αὐτὰρ ἐπ' ἄλλα·
ὥς Τρῶες, πρὸ μὲν ἄλλοι ἀρηρότες, αὐτὰρ ἐπ' ἄλλοι. . .

The figure here commences by likening the rushing of the host along the field of battle to that of a tempest across the sea. It concludes, by a graceful transition, with the equally appropriate comparison of the successive charges of the battalions to the reiterated dashing of the surf on the beach. Here again the anomaly, if such it be, is in the statement not the conception of the image.

Among the few similes of Homer chargeable with real impropriety, perhaps the most defective is that illustrative of the death of Patroclus by the hand of Hector : II. XVI. 823.

ὡς δ' ὅτε σὺν ἀκάμαντα λέων ἐβίησατο χάρμη,
ὦ τ' ὄρεος κορυφῇσι μέγα φρονέοντε μάχεσθον, κ.τ.λ.

The parallel here fails completely. No combat whatever had taken place between the two heroes. Hector was not the conqueror, but merely the executioner, of Patroclus, who had already been wounded and disabled by Euphorbus. It must be matter of surprise, how a figure so palpably foreign to the subject could ever have suggested itself. Equally inappropriate and inconsequent is the comparison¹ of Hector marshalling his troops for the assault on the Greek rampart, to a wild beast encircled by a troop of dogs and huntsmen. In the Odyssey, the comparison of Penelope² circumvented by the wiles of the suitors, to a lion hemmed in by a host of pursuers, is also somewhat startling. A gentler victim of the hunter's snares were more appropriate. The otherwise strongly marked partiality of the poet for the lion as a source of figurative illustration, is nowhere certainly more broadly exemplified.

There is one class of similes of favourite employment in both poems, which still deserves a few words of special notice ; where the object is, not so much to enhance or adorn the subject of comparison, as to define more exactly its relative position or circumstances, in respect to distance, proximity, motion, dimension, or the like. Such definitions, in the page of other poets, rarely assume the form of a comparison ; with Homer they furnish matter for a number of a highly characteristic nature. In Iliad xvi. 589., for example, another poet would have been contented with saying that the Trojans retreated a spear-shot. Homer dramatises the comparison, as it were, by a parenthetical picture of the circumstances under which such a shot may take place :

 ἦν ῥά τ' ἀνὴρ ἀφείη, πειρώμενος, ἡ ἐν ἀέθλῳ,
 ἡ καὶ ἐν πολέμῳ δῆϊων ὕπο θυμοραϊστέων, τόσσον ἐχώρησαν Τρῶες. . . .

In the Odyssey, instead of simply describing Ulysses as constructing his raft of the same width as the deck of an ordinary ferry-boat, he says : Od. v. 249.

ὅσπον τίς τ' ἔδαφος νηὸς τορνῶσεται ἀνὴρ, φορτίδος εὐρείης, εὖ εἰδῶς τεκτοσυνάων, τόσπον ἔπ' εὐρεῖαν σχεδίην ποιήσας Ὀδυσσεύς.

Similar is his mode of treating the parallel ideas of a stone's throw, a plough-gate, a quoit-shot, and many others. The likeness is almost always embodied as a small descriptive picture, or poetical hieroglyphic. Some of these figures are of surprising elegance and ingenuity.¹

The intimate connexion of much of Homer's imagery with his native climate and manners renders it difficult, in some cases perhaps impossible, for the modern, the foreign, and still more the Northern student of his poems, thoroughly to apprehend its spirit. The classical traveller in Greece or Southern Italy must have experienced, in frequent instances, how greatly a familiarity with the topography or social habits of those countries, under every change of times and circumstances, has helped to convey to his mind the force of figurative allusions which he had never before understood or appreciated. This remark applies to many of the more spirited of Homer's comparisons cited in these pages. Such is that of the meteor which crowned the head of Achilles, to the beacon-fire of war on the distant island ; of the fluctuations in the breast of Nestor, to the swell of the sea in a calm ; of the damsels at the loom, to aspen leaves ; of the fall of a well-plumed hero, to that of a bushy-topped poplar ; of the Trojan elders on the city wall, to the wood crickets chirping their summer song on the trees. The habits of rustic and pastoral life still prevalent in Greece supply other curious commentaries on Homer's imagery; to enlarge upon which, however amusing or instructive, would be an undue encroachment on the just limits of the present subject.¹

and metrical ele-

style.

13. The properties of Homer's style which it yet remains to consider, belong rather to the form than the essence of his poetry, to that mechanism of language and expression in which the merit of all poetical composition, apart from its intrinsic ethic, or imaginative properties, must always greatly consist.

The first and simplest element of good writing is Perspicuity, comprising a just distribution of the entire subject, a lucid exposition of its parts, equally free from dryness or diffuseness, and a clear method of syntactical construction. In these respects the Iliad and Odyssey are unsurpassed, if not unrivalled, by any other work of their class. In no other narrative of the same length or variety of matter is the general thread of the adventures more easily followed; nor can there be a better evidence of harmony in the subordinate links of the chain of connexion, than the fact that Homer, amid all his maze of dialectical peculiarity, is to the young Hellenist the easiest of Greek poets.

Much here depends on the poet's skilful employment of the metrical resources of his art. Epic poetry, in the wider sense, is the art of amplifying and embellishing certain elementary materials of historical fact or popular fable, with the graces of diction and imagery. The term comprises consequently, in this sense, many works not classed in more familiar usage under the same head. Such are various portions of the Hebrew Scriptures, the erotic tales of lower Greek literature, and other similar prose fictions of modern times. With most nations however, it has been customary to embody such compositions in a metrical form, partly from a desire to combine elegance of conception with harmony of sound, partly as an aid to the memory. Metre has thus become an essential ingredient of poetical style, and to metrical works alone, in familiar language, has the title of poem been restricted.

The various kinds of measure employed by epic poets of different ages, may be classed under two general heads: first, those which consist of a uniform succession of single verses of similar form and numbers; secondly, those which offer a variety of verses, distributed into clauses or periods recurring in a like regular succession. The former class may be exemplified by the Greek hexameter, and the blank verse of modern poetry. To the other class belong the Greek elegiac or pentameter verse, which though originally proper to other branches of composition, was also, in later times, frequently used in narrative works. But the finer models of this kind are supplied by modern Italian literature, the terza rima of Dante, and the octave stanza of Ariosto and Tasso, which last has acquired an extensive popularity with English and German poets. The measures of the former class, while much the noblest, are also those in which it is most difficult to excel. An unbroken succession of single lines, of the same length and character, is essentially monotonous. It hence requires, in order to secure the degree of variety indispensable to the charm of all composition, a full command of other resources to be noticed in the sequel, which are only at the disposal of the great epic masters. In the hands of inferior artists the hexameter consequently becomes, like its counterpart the blank verse of the present day, languid and spiritless.

The metres of the second class, on the other hand, while affording to the second-rate poet a factitious mode of enlivening his productions, shackle in a proportional degree the higher efforts of genius. The spirit of every narrative depends greatly on its being distributed into appropriate clauses or paragraphs, involving, from time to time, a pause or rest between the conclusion of one head of the subject and the commencement of another. What such paragraphs are in prose, the stanza is, or rather ought to be, in metrical composition, a pause or rest in the delivery corresponding to one in the subject. It were an obvious absurdity in a prose writer, to subdivide his discourse by a pause before he had arrived at the close of the matter in hand, reserving the words or sentences required to complete it for the commencement of the next paragraph. The case, if not precisely the same, is closely analogous with the poetical paragraph or stanza. Hence, authors who adopt that measure study, as a general rule, that the sense should run on without serious interruption through each stanza, and be brought to a more or less decided rest at its close. But as it is impossible that the subordinate heads of an extensive subject should all spontaneously adapt themselves to any such artificial clauses, this coincidence can only be obtained by cramping the free course of the narrative. Where on the other hand the poet is obliged, by the necessities of his subject, to carry on the connexion of the text from the end of one stanza to the beginning of another, we cannot but be sensible of a serious incongruity between arrangement and sense; although one to which habit may, as to other defects, in some degree reconcile us.

It is plain therefore, without detracting from the real excellence of the great writers by whom this species of measure has been preferred, that it owes its origin to the efforts of an inferior order of genius to impart adventitious liveliness to a poetical text, and evade the monotony resulting from an unskilful use of the simpler mechanism of the antient masters. These remarks apply still more pointedly to that other expedient of modern poetry, rhyme, the habitual accompaniment of the modern epic stanza; in its origin the resource of a barbarous age, but similarly ennobled by the practice of many excellent poets. Rhyme in the modern sense was unknown to the Greeks, although, as will presently appear, they were not insensible to the effect of a recurrence of unison terminations in poetry.

14. The origin of the hexameter verse, the earliest and noblest monument of Greek metrical invention, is lost in the mists of antiquity. To Homer however may safely be awarded the honour of having carried it to perfection. Its limits are a just medium between the undue extension which produces languor, and the opposite extreme of brevity which tends to cramp the freedom of a continuous text. While its facility of combination into masses offers every scope for prolongation of the textual clauses, its varieties of cæsure supply equal facilities for subdivision and conciseness of expression. The free alternation of dactyl and spondee, while admitting in each verse every modification of which the dactylic metre is capable, imparts also to different verses, or parts of verses, as occasion may require, the varied character of the anapæstic, choraïc, and indeed almost every other variety of measure. Of these expedients Homer has availed himself with his usual tact. No conceivable arrangement of words could produce a more vivid expression of rapidity, ardour, impetuosity, than the succession of his dactylic feet; of tardiness and laborious effort, than the long-drawn continuity of his spondees; of alternate energy and languor, activity and repose, than the skilful combination of the two; or of suddenness, abruptness, hesitation, than the apt disposition of his cæsures. With Homer therefore, the hexameter verse not only does not interfere with the just amount of individuality in the separate heads of his narrative, but may even tend to give him an advantage in this respect over the prose writer, by the additional means it supplies of rounding off the subdivisions of the text, and allotting to each its own characteristic flow of numbers.

The value of these combined properties of the hexameter verse, in imparting emphasis and precision to the more strictly dramatic element of the poems, to the turns of the grave debate, the fierce altercation, or the familiar dialogue, is too obvious to require any specific illustration. In the purely narrative department of the text, the same effects may be exemplified, among other passages of the Iliad, by the description of the shield of Achilles. This brilliant episode subdivides itself, in the natural order of its materials, into separate sections or heads, each comprising a new picture of life and manners. But the spirit and individuality of those pictures are greatly due to the metrical arrangement, aided by the usual recurrence, under slight varieties, of expressive epic forms. The whole series thus partakes somewhat of the symmetry, free from the formality, of a choric ode. Its clauses offer, as it were, a succession of strophes, of which the introductory and closing paragraphs are the proœmium and epode. In the Odyssey, the Necromancy of Ulysses is, in its essential features, closely parallel. The descriptions of the successive objects of wonder or terror presented to the view of the Tartarian voyager, are subdivided and rounded off with the same distinctive propriety of expression and numbers, and the same recurrence of emphatic forms. The several stages and vicissitudes of the hero's terrestrial voyage, are similarly marked out and distinguished by this ingenious exercise of poetical rhetoric.

15. Homer's faculty of adapting, not only the measure, but the sound of his language, to the idea to be expressed, is a characteristic of his Muse to which attention has frequently been called in the course of this analysis. It is one, the closer consideration of which connects itself naturally with that of the mechanical aids on which it so mainly depends; among which, unquestionably, the most important are those above noticed as inherent in the genius of the hexameter verse.

Adaptation
of sound to sense in the choice of phrases,

The most familiar modes in which this faculty may be exercised, are those classed under the technical head of onomatopœia, where certain words convey, by the smoothness or harshness, languor or liveliness, of their sound, a corresponding impression of the object they denote. By a more extended application of the same means, whole sentences or paragraphs may be invested with a like power of reflecting the character, not merely of individual objects, but of events, scenery, or moods of mind. Among the examples of the latter more rare and delicate exercise of this species of poetical mechanism, may be cited the contrast between the exordium of the narrative of Ulysses in the banquetting-hall of Alcinoüs, and that with which the old peasant Eumæus introduces a similar tale, addressed to the disguised hero on the night of his arrival at the hut. In the former, how finely do the smooth flow and elegant amplitude of construction and measure, harmonise with the festive pomp of the royal board, and the character of the guests who sat around it: Od. ix. 2.

Ἀλκίνοε κρείον, πάντων ἀριδείκετε λαῶν,
 ἦτοι μὲν τόδε καλὸν ἀκουέμεν ἐστὶν αἰδοῦ, τοιοῦδ', οἷος ὅδ' ἐστὶ, θεοῖς ἐναλίγκιος αὐδῆν.
 οὐ γὰρ ἔγωγέ τί φημι τέλος χαριέστερον εἶναι,
 ἢ ὅτ' ἂν εὐφροσύνη μὲν ἔχῃ κάτα δῆμον ἅπαντα, δαιτυμόνες δ' ἀνὰ δώματ' ἀκουάζωνται αἰδοῦ. . .

In the other passage, every word and sentence breathes the homely placidity of the fireside dialogue, in the still seclusion of the landward cottage: Od. xv.

Ξεῖν', ἐπεὶ ἄρ' δὴ ταῦτά μ' ἀνείρεαι ἥδ' ἐ μεταλλάξ, σιγῇ νῦν ξυνίει καὶ τέρπεο· πῖνέ τε οἶνον ἤμενος· αἶδε δὲ νύκτες ἀθέσφατοι· ἔστι μὲν εὐδειν, ἔστι δὲ τερπομένοισιν ἀκούειν· οὐδέ τί σε χρή, πρὶν ὥρῃ καταλέχθαι· ἀνίη καὶ πολὺς ὕπνος. . .

A striking illustration of the effect of letters and syllables in enhancing the idea of scorn and contempt, has already been cited from the Iliad, where Achilles compares the dependance of Atrides on his services, to that of the unfledged nestling on the nurseful care of the parent bird: II. IX. 323.

αῖς δ' ὄρνις ἀπτῆσι νεοσσοῖσι προφέρῃσι μάστακ' ἐπεὶ κε λάβῃσι, κακῶς δ' ἄρα οἷ πέλει αὐτῇ.

The reiteration of low sibilant sounds here adapts itself with singular effect to the spirit of the figure.¹

It were difficult for any words more forcibly to express the fierce collision and determined conflict of hostile bands, than the following two noble lines from the "Shield of Achilles," στυγόμενοι δ' ἐμάχοντο μάχην ποταμοῖο παρ' ὄχθας, βάλλον δ' ἀλλήλους χαλκήρεσιν ἐγχεῖσιν.

repeated under appropriate modification in Od. IX. 64. Nor could the "rushing of the rapid river over its reedy bed," be better brought home to the ear than in the neighbouring verse: 676.

παρ ποταμὸν κελάδοντα, παρὰ ῥοδανὸν δονακῆα. . . .

The bustle of a galley getting under weigh and issuing from port, is painted rather than described in the familiar passage of the Odyssey:

οἱ δ' αἶψ' εἰσβαίνον, καὶ ἐπὶ κληῖσι κάθιζον, ἐξῆς δ' ἐζόμενοι πολὺν ἄλα τύπτον ἐρετμοῖς.

Some of the texts adduced by the antients in illustration of this peculiarity are almost too trite for citation. Such is the line,

contrasting the silent indignation of the old priest with the boisterous roaring of the surge. The whole series of passages quoted in a former page from the poet's maritime descriptions, is little else than a running commentary on our present text. In the account of the giants' attempt to scale heaven by heaping mountains one upon the other, Od. xi. 315.

Ὅσσαν ἐπ' Οὐλύμπῳ μέμασαν θέμεν, αὐτὰρ ἐπ' Ὅσση, Πήλιον εἰνοσίφυλλον ἴν' οὐρανὸς ἀμβατὸς εἴη.

the tardy swell of the first line, succeeded by the impetuous flow of the second, expresses, with equal effect, the laborious effort and the reckless audacity of the rebellious project. Similar is the contrast, in the account of the punishment of Sisyphus, between the painful exertion of the sufferer slowly toiling up the hill with his burthen, and the rapidity of its headlong career backwards from the summit to the bottom : Od. xi. 594.

ἦτοι ὁ μὲν, σκηριπτόμενος χερσὶν τε ποσίν τε, λαῶν ἄνω ὥθεσκε ποτὶ λόφον· ἀλλ' ὅτε μέλλοι, ἄκρον ὑπερβαλέειν, τοτ' ἀποστρέψασκε κραταίῃς·
αὐτίς ἔπειτα πέδονδε κυλίνδετο λαῶς ἀναιδής.¹

The initial phrase of the last line, slightly varied into αὐτίκ' ἔπειτα, as the opening of a pure dactylic verse, is in both poems a favourite mode of expressing sudden and energetic motion :

II. xx. 138.

εἰ δέ κ' Ἀρης ἄρχωσι μάχης, ἦ Φοῖβος Ἀπόλλων, . . .
αὐτίκ' ἔπειτα καὶ ἄμμι παρ' αὐτόφιν νεῖκος ὀρεῖται.

Conf. II. xiii. 139. :

ρήξας ἀσπέτῳ ὑμῖν ἀναιδέος ἔχματα πέτρης . . .

Od. xi. 636.

αὐτίκ' ἔπειτ' ἐπὶ νῆα κίων ἐκέλευσεν ἑταίρους. . . .

Il. xix. 242.

αὐτίκ' ἔπειθ' ἄμα μῦθος ἔην τετέλεστο δὲ ἔργον.

The idea of succession, repetition, vicissitude, is represented in the same lively manner, in a number of passages, by the adverb ἄλλοτε; as in the description of the alternate life and death of the twin heroes, Castor and Pollux : Od. xi. 302.

ἄλλοτε μὲν ζώουσ' ἑτερήμεροι, ἄλλοτε δ' αὖτε τεθνᾶσιν, τιμὴν δὲ λελόγχασ' ἴσα θεοῖσι.

and the busy motion of the self-acting bellows in the forge of Vulcan : Il. xviii. 473.

ἄλλοτε μὲν σπεύδοντι παρέμμεναι ἄλλοτε δ' αὖτε, ὅπως Ἥφαιστός τ' ἐθέλοι καὶ ἔργον ἄνοιτο.

or the rushing to and fro of Hector on the battle field : Il. xviii. 159.

ἄλλοτ' ἐπαΐξασκε κατὰ μόθον, ἄλλοτε δ' αὖτε, στάσκει μέγα ἰάχων

and the alternate ebb and flow of grief in the breast of Menelaus : Od. iv. 102.

ἄλλοτε μὲν τε γόῳ φρένα τέρπομαι, ἄλλοτε δ' αὖτε
παύομαι. . . .

These passages, the list of which might be infinitely extended¹, are those characterised by Aristotle² as "living phrases," or "phrases of motion."

16. The nice association between sound and sense in the mind of Homer, is further exemplified in his

in the position of phrases.

¹ Those here selected are chiefly such as illustrate the identity of usage in the two poems.

² ἐμφύχους λέξεις· κινούμενα ὀνόματα. Schol. Venet. ad Il. i. 303. 481.

mode of enhancing the power of certain expressive words by the place allotted them in the verse. The positions most favourable to this object are the beginning and end of a line. In the beginning, terms of a lively emphatic character, at the close those of a more languid or placid description, are adapted respectively to produce their full effect. Of the former class the term βάλλω may here be taken as an example. The sound of this word, in its simple bisyllabic form, is singularly adapted to its primary signification, "smite," or "strike." Accordingly, on the numerous occasions of its occurrence in this emphatic form and sense, it is placed, with scarcely an exception, if indeed one can be found, at the commencement of the line. The two following passages, one from each poem, are as remarkable for the illustration they afford of this rule, as for their parallel with each other. In the first act of the Iliad, the wrathful Apollo, βέλος ἔχευε κῆρ ἐφ' ἑστέρας,

βάλλ'· αἰεὶ δὲ πυρὰ νευύων καίοντο θαμειαί.

where the emphasis is greatly augmented by the pause which succeeds. Compare the account of the fleet of Ulysses destroyed by the Læstrygonians : Od. x. 121.

ἀνδραχθῆσι χερμαδίοισι
βάλλον· ἄφαρ δὲ κακὸς κόναβος κατὰ νῆας ὀρώρει.

The verb κόπτω, of cognate sense and power, is also habitually, if not invariably, assigned the same post of honour, and, in the description of the butchery of the Ithacan sailors by Polyphemus, is supported by the same emphatic pause : Od. ix. 289.

ὥστε σκύλακας ποτὶ γαίῃ
κόπτ'· ἐκ δ' ἐγκέφαλος χαμάδις ῥέει

Similar is the case with πλήγω, and the imperatives ἔρρε, ἔρρέτω, ἔρδ', ἔρξον. The reproachful epithet σχέτλιος, usually employed with vocative power, occurs thirty-three times at the beginning of the line, with scarcely an exception in favour of any other position.

On the other hand, it can hardly be the result of mere accident, that various words expressive of repose, unconcern, and the like, should with equal constancy be placed at the close of the verse. The adjective ἔκηλος, for example, out of nineteen times that it occurs in either poem, is found no less than seventeen in this position. In ten out of these seventeen it is also preceded, especially where it takes a contemptuous turn, by a particle of kindred tone, as in the scornful anathema of Achilles against Agamemnon : Il. ix. 376.

ἔρρέτω ! ἐκ γὰρ εὖ φρένας εἴλετο μητίετα Ζεὺς.

and in the injunction of the insolent Antinoüs to the disguised Ulysses : Od. xxi. 309.

πῖνέ τε· μὴδ' ἐρίδαινε μετ' ἀνδράσι κουροτέροισι.

The verb πειρητίζειν, above illustrated, invariably occurs at the close of the verse; the position most favourable to the idea of doubt or hesitation which it expresses.

In this, as in other features of genuine Homeric style, the harmony of spirit and method which pervades the two poems finds no correspondence in the other primitive representatives of the epic minstrelsy. Even where the phrases employed are not altogether peculiar to the Iliad and Odyssey, yet the mode of their employment is so exclusively so, as the more convincingly to prove both the sameness and the singleness of genius in the two poems.

Alliteration and Rhyme
in Homer.

17. It yet remains to consider a peculiarity of verbal mechanism in Homer's style, which may be classed in its several varieties under the technical term of Alliteration. It will here be necessary to enter at greater detail than were otherwise desirable, on a somewhat technical head of metrical analysis, owing to its having received less attention on the part of professional critics than its real curiosity and importance deserve.

The term Alliteration, in the wider sense, comprehends every correspondence in sound between the letters or syllables of words, either contiguous, or so little remote from each other, that the sameness strikes forcibly on the ear.¹ In the nicer definition of the schools however, the phrase is usually restricted to such coincidences between initial and medial letters or syllables. The same correspondence of sound in the endings of words, whether at the close of neighbouring verses or of rhythmical clauses of the same verse, falls under the more familiar denomination of Rhyme, or, in the technical language of Greek cri-

Il. xxiii. 641. οἱ δ' ἄρ' ἔσαν δίδυμοι· ὁ μὲν ἔμπεδον ἠνιόχευεν, ἔμπεδον ἠνιόχευ', ὁ δ' ἄρα μάστιγι κέλευεν.

Od. i. 22. ἀλλ' ὁ μὲν Αἰθίωπας μετεκίθε τεγλόθ' ἰόντας, Αἰθίωπας, τοὶ δὲ δίχθ' ἀδεδαίεσται, ἔσχατοι ἀνδρῶν.

This, however, is a rhetorical expedient common to writers in prose and verse of every age, and which here demands no separate share of attention, as being neither employed by Homer to such an extent, nor with any such peculiarity of method, as to constitute a distinctive feature of his style.

ticism, "homœoteleutic metre." Avoiding this latter scholastic definition, we shall here consider the two classes under the titles of Simple Alliteration, and Terminal Alliteration, or Rhyme.

The examples of Simple Alliteration in Homer and in Greek composition generally, are rare. With the poet, the greater part of the few that occur may be said to affect the sense as much as the sound, and hence rank more properly under the head of etymological pun, or play of words, already illustrated. Such are νηήσας εὖ νῆας, πῆλαι Πηλιάδα μελίην, and other similar cases formerly cited. It seems doubtful whether Homer has ever resorted to this expedient¹ for the purpose of adding, through the medium of sound alone, an emphatic quaintness to his text. The phrases: πόλεμον πολεμίζειν, βουλὰς βουλεύειν, ἐμάχοντο μάχην, and others similar, can hardly be taken into account, as suggested, in the few instances in which they occur, by the ordinary flow of epic language.

Far more prevalent in Homer is the Terminal class of Alliteration, or Rhyme. Although this mode of imparting harmony to metrical composition, was never countenanced in classical Greek poetry on the systematic principle of the present day, there is reason to believe that the Greek ear was not insensible to its effect. How far this may have been the case with Homer or his audience, is a question of great nicety. That rhyming verses or cæsures are numerous, almost innumerable in both poems, is a fact which

ὅς κ' αὖτον τελαμώνει ἐγ' ἐγκάτθετο τέχνη.*

must be familiar to every more careful student of their text. That such passages were, however, intended by Homer to produce the effect of rhyme in the modern sense, is by no means clear. The grammatical flexions of the Greek tongue, especially of its epic dialect, in their infinite variety of forms and metrical cadences, to which no modern language offers the remotest parallel, so inevitably involved coincidences of this nature¹, that it might have been detrimental to the native simplicity of the poet's style, had he attempted, in every case, studiously to file down or eject them. It is however no less certain, that they occur in such number and in such palpable forms, that had there been on his own part, or that of his audience, the same consciousness of sameness or tautology as the modern reader experiences in similar cases, it were hardly conceivable that they would have been allowed to remain; easy as it would have been, in many instances, to evade them by a slight modification of the text.² It may be presumed therefore, either that Homer took at times pleasure in such reiterations, and hence if he did not intentionally introduce them, was satisfied to leave them where they spontaneously occurred, as adding emphasis or harmony to his verse; or that he was altogether unconscious of, or indifferent to, their rhyming effect. In order properly to judge between these two modes of explanation, it will be necessary to adduce a few examples out of the numbers supplied by the text of each poem. The forms here subjoined

² In II. XVIII. 46., for example, where the transposition of ἰδνασσα and ἰδνασσα, in contiguous lines, would have sufficed.

II. II. 87.

ἥν τε ἔθνεα εἴσι μελισσάων ἀδινάων, πέτρης ἐκ γλαφυρῆς αἰεὶ νέον ἐρχομενάων.

Od. v. 113.

οὐ γάρ οἱ τῇδ' αἴσα φίλων ἀπονόσφιν ὀλέσθαι,
ἀλλ' ἔτι οἱ μοῖρ' ἐστὶ φίλους τ' ἰδέειν καὶ ἰκέσθαι.

Od. ix. 185.

II. ix. 236.

Od. ix. 481.

ἦκε δ' ἀπορρήξας κορυφὴν ὄρεος μεγάλιοι, καὶ δ' ἔβαλε προπάροιθε νεὸς κυανοπρώροιο.

In the following, the concurrence is in the metrical clauses of the same verse :

II. II. 800.

λίην γὰρ φύλλοισιν εἰκοῖτες ἢ ψαμάθοισιν.

Od. II. 340.

II. VI. 424.

βουσὶν ἐπ' εἰλιπόδεσσι, καὶ ἀργεννῆς ὄϊεσσι.

Od. XI. 357.

πομπὴν τ' ὀτρύνετε, καὶ ἀγλαὰ δῶρα διδοῖτε.

In all these cases, with a multitude that might be added, the coincidence of sounds falls upon the ear with the same effect as the rhyme of modern poetry.

Judging from them alone therefore, it might be reasonably conjectured that the poet had suffered them in his text from some similar sense of their harmonious cadence, rather than from accident or indifference. There are however two other kinds of reiteration of a less agreeable character: first, where the same rhymes are accumulated to an excessive degree; secondly, where they consist in a repetition of the same word. Both these cases involve, to modern ears, an offensive tautology. The examples of the former kind are comparatively rare; those of the latter are of frequent occurrence. Subjoined are specimens of each:

Od. vi. 63.

οἱ δὲ ὀψύοντες, τρεῖς δ' ἡῖθεοι θαλέθοντες,

δήμῳ πιφαύσκων · ὁ δ' ἀναίνετο, μῆδ' ἐλίσσθαι.
 ἄμφω δ' ἰέσθην ἐπὶ Ἰστορί πεῖραρ ἐλίσσθαι.

That such repetitions could possess any actual merit in the poet's estimation, can hardly be supposed. Still less likely is it that, had they been as repugnant to his own as to modern taste, he would have put up with them in so many cases where they might easily have been obviated. The more natural conclusion must be, that his ear was not so susceptible as our own of the monotonous rhyming effect. It may, perhaps, seem strange to impute to Homer a less delicate sense of poetical harmony than is enjoyed by the modern reader. In the present case however, such more scrupulous nicety in the latter may be a consequence of that habituation to rhyme, as the established rule in the more popular branches of his native poetry, which naturally renders him more alive to the recurrence of rhyming verses, as a solœcism in prose or in blank measure. To Homer, on the other hand, who knew nothing of rhyme as a system, the occasional recurrence of rhyming verses or clauses, might not be more offensive than other incidental cases of repetition in sound or words, unavoidable in the general structure of his language. That he would have placed, not only the same sound but the very same word, in the ending of contiguous verses, had he been conscious of any thing displeasing in the arrangement, is scarcely credible. If, however, he be assumed to have been comparatively unconscious or indifferent in these more glaring cases, the same conclusion becomes imperative in regard to the others. It is probable therefore, that these rhyming forms were in no case either intentionally introduced, or perhaps observed by him at all, unless in so far as they may have served, in occasional instances, to enhance the expressive power of his language. That such, apart from musical cadence, is their tendency in many cases, there can be no doubt; as, for example, in the simile of the bird and her nestlings, formerly quoted from the speech of Achilles, where it is not the rhyme, but the recurrence of certain sibilant sounds, which makes up the scornful expression of the passage: but in the great majority of cases, no such explanation is admissible.

This peculiarity, it may be observed, is common, under essentially the same features, and probably with as little consciousness of the rhythmical anomaly which strikes the modern ear, to the inferior productions of the primitive Epic Muse, to the Works and Days, Theogony, Shield of Hercules, and to the secondary poems of the Homeric school.

1. THE question, whether the Iliad and Odyssey are by the same or different authors, must proceed upon an understanding that each in its substantial integrity is by a single one. The result of the foregoing researches will, it is hoped, authorise that conclusion. A portion, however, of the evidence in its favour still remains involved in the present inquiry. It is obvious that the distinctive peculiarities of the two works, to which by Separatist critics so much weight has been attached, are, in themselves, a proof and a virtual admission of unity at least in each poem. On the other hand, it need scarcely be remarked that a large, perhaps the largest portion of the internal evidence affecting the Separatist theory itself, has already been anticipated, especially in the three previous chapters on Homer's style, and must here consequently be taken into account.

Historical data ; opinions of the antiien critics.

The evidence on either side subdivides itself here, as in the general question concerning the origin of the poems, under the two heads of Historical and Internal. The historical evidence in favour of the antient opinion consists in the uninterrupted course of early tradition, the deliberate verdict of the best native critics, and the all but unanimous acquiescence of the Greek literary public of every period. The opposite opinion, if it cannot be said to have originated, must be admitted to have first acquired importance, in our own age. A concise summary of the general bearings of this strictly historical element of the question was given in a previous chapter. It was there shown that from a remote epoch, a number of heroic poems marked by a certain similarity of character were vulgarly ascribed to Homer; but that in the progress of the critical art this privilege was restricted to the Iliad and Odyssey. Herodotus¹ questions or denies the claims of the Epigoni and Cypria, two of the most celebrated among the secondary aspirants to the honour. Passing over less weighty authorities, Aristotle² sets apart the Iliad and Odyssey, not only as the exclusive productions of Homer, but as exclusively and jointly marked by those proper features of Homeric style in illustration of which he appeals to their text. He also, for the purpose of more broadly distinguishing them, contrasts the deficiencies of those the pretensions of which he sets aside.³ No other opinion seems to have found place prior to the second or third generation of Alexandrian commentators. Of Xenon, the first recorded proposer of the new doctrine, nothing is known beyond the fact of this priority.¹ With his name, in one of the notices concerning him, is coupled in the capacity of disciple or follower that of Hellanicus², a second-rate grammarian of the age of Aristarchus. No other Separatist critic is mentioned by name. Aristarchus however, the chief of the Alexandrian school, appears to have thought the doctrine worthy of special confutation in a treatise "against the Paradox of Xenon."³ Whether from his condemnation of that paradox, or from its own little popularity, it seems henceforth to have been consigned to neglect. The opinion of the "Chorizontes" is indeed frequently noticed in the extant scholia, but in the light of an exploded heresy. Amid the virulent disputes between the leading Homeric critics of subsequent ages, on almost every point where room existed for controversy, no notice occurs of further discussion upon this. Seneca⁴ alludes to it as one of the fruitless speculations which exercised the subtle minds of the Greeks; and Longinus⁵, in an elaborate disquisition on the characteristic properties of the two poems, on the usual basis of a common author, has not so much as hinted at the existence of a different opinion.⁶

The above facts, which exhaust the antient history of the question, comprise unfortunately, beyond the few indirect remarks of Aristotle, no notice of the precise grounds which induced the critical public of antiquity, so unceremoniously to reject a doctrine which has found so much favour in our own day. So unanimous an expression of opinion however, on the part of the best native scholars, must in itself possess weight as historical evidence. The simple fiat of any critic or school of critics cannot, indeed, be admitted as actual proof, apart from its own intrinsic merits. Yet it is not easy to divest oneself of a certain feeling of diffidence in adopting, on purely theoretical grounds, opinions relative to a nice point of speculative criticism in the literature of a foreign language, so different from those to which the profoundest authors in that language have recorded their unanimous adhesion; men too, whose refined taste and consummate sagacity have obtained for them an authority in the universal republic of letters, such as few of any other age or country can boast. These men certainly were as readily disposed to adopt new theories, as competent to uphold them. Their division, upon almost every other controvertible point of Homeric history, into factions animated by virulent hostility towards each other, is in itself a sufficient guarantee that Aristarchus and Crates, for example, could never have so cordially agreed in rejecting this doctrine, but after careful investigation, and on the firmest conviction of its fallacy. But we have a practical test of their impartial discrimination in the equally decided manner in which, while setting apart the Iliad and Odyssey as the joint productions of Homer, they discarded the pretensions of other once little less favoured claimants to that honour. The extent and subtlety of their speculations on the genuine and spurious portions of either poem, also prove that they were as alive to the importance of internal evidence in such questions, as ready to turn it to polemical account.

2. These difficulties are apt to be disposed of by the plea, that the enlarged genius of modern taste and critical science, renders the inquirer of the present day a more competent judge in such matters than either Aristotle or Aristarchus. This is a doctrine which is not confined to the case of Homer, but extends to all similar questions of antient criticism. Nor can it be disputed that in many branches of classical pursuit, the advance of science at large, and of philological science in particular, gives the present race of scholars an advantage over the native Greek and Roman critics. The more penetrating researches of the moderns, in the purely technical or etymological department of linguistic knowledge, enable them to trace the origin and affinities of different tongues to a far greater extent, and with greater precision, than their predecessors of antiquity. In respect however to the more imaginative departments of criticism, it seems very doubtful, whether any of these advantages can counterbalance those on the side of the Greeks. It may even perhaps be a question, whether that extensive range of verbal philology which forms the boast of the modern schools, be not calculated to deteriorate rather than improve the judgement, as exercised on more delicate questions of elegant literature. Among the Greeks, on the other hand, the all but exclusive concentration of literary talent on the study and analysis of their own language, tended, within the limits of that language, to impart additional acuteness and precision to the discriminating faculty.

How disposed of in the modern schools.

That the Greeks were inferior in native subtlety or purity of taste to the moderns will hardly be pretended. There is, therefore, surely something palpably unreasonable in the supposition that Aristotle, Aristarchus, and Longinus, with the entire resources of the national library at their disposal, were less competent to judge of the relation which one portion of that library bore to another in style or merit, than foreigners toiling by dint of grammar and lexicon through its scanty existing remains. As well might in our own day a German or Dutch professor, on the strength of a deeper insight into the abstruser mysteries of general philology, claim a greater competence to pronounce on the authenticity of a play of Shakspeare or a passage of Milton, than Addison or Wharton. It were easy to point out instances of foreign linguists, with whom few British scholars could compete in the mere mechanical or antiquarian knowledge of the English tongue, who are yet insensible to defects and anomalies in the style of its popular authors, such as no well educated native lady would hesitate for a moment to detect and condemn.

Comparatively little weight, therefore, can attach to the speculations so rife among the last and present generation of classical grammarians, relative to the genuine or spurious character of works transmitted under the names of illustrious antient authors, unless conducted under the sanction, or at least not in the face, of standard native opinions. There can, indeed, be no doubt that much benefit has resulted from this branch of modern analytical criticism, where cautiously exercised; but as little can it be denied that the licentious excess to which it has been carried, has tended both to pervert the taste and mislead the judgement of the classical public. Researches undertaken in such a spirit cannot fail to be prolific in discoveries. A mind morbidly bent on detecting flaws and blemishes in its objects of favourite study, will be at no loss to find ample food for its appetite even in their most characteristic excellences. Such a mind is like the habitually jealous lover, who discovers in the most artless looks or gestures of his mistress, often in those which, to the eye of the unprejudiced admirer, are replete with candour and innocence, the strongest confirmation of his own chimerical suspicions. The justice of this distinction may be tested by transferring the same rules, now so generally received in the case of Homer, to the literature of the present age. Were the most original writings of modern times to be judged by the same Separatist ordeal as the Iliad and Odyssey, who could believe that Julius Cæsar emanated from the same genius as the Midsummer Night's Dream; that the poet of Zaire was the satirist of Candide; that the miscellaneous poems of Dante were by the author of the Divine Comedy; or that the Paradise Lost and Regained were by the same Milton? If all historical notice of the origin of these pairs of works, or of numerous others that might be adduced, were extinct, no professor of the modern Separatist school could, without an entire abandonment of its principles, admit of their being assigned respectively to the authors whose names they bear.

3. The arguments from internal evidence, favourable to the antient opinion, have been in a great measure disposed of in the previous chapters on the joint properties of the two poems. In order the better to appreciate such as have been adduced from the same source on the opposite side, attention must be directed somewhat more closely to a critical rule already noticed as essential to a right judgement in similar cases: "that the evidence of common authorship, supplied by any large amount of resemblance in works of the higher order of genius, is stronger on the affirmative side, than that resulting from a proportional amount of discrepancy on the negative side, of any such question."

First then it may be remarked, that there never yet has been an authenticated example of the same nation and language producing more than one genius of the rank and character of Homer. Italy, during the many centuries that her language has now existed, has produced but one Dante; England but one Shakespeare; the only two authors who, in modern times or perhaps in any age, offer what can properly be considered a parallel to Homer. Nor is this the mere result of accident or destiny, but depends on causes inherent in the intellectual history of our species. As one essential condition of the appearance of any great masterpiece of national art is, that it should be composed without deference to any prior equally distinguished model; so the natural effect of its promulgation is to preclude the chance of similar success in other quarters, by generating a spirit of imitation, and consequent mediocrity or mannerism. The only case to which this remark might seem not to extend would be, the simultaneous appearance of two or more equally gifted poets under the same favourable auspices. The improbability of such a coincidence is in itself great; that of so close a resemblance as should cause their productions to be unanimously ascribed, by the first native critics, to the same author, amounts to a moral impossibility.

If the common authorship of the Iliad and Odyssey be admitted, they supply both an illustration and a confirmation of this fundamental law of historical probability. In considering their respective claims to excellence, although the one poem, from the advantage of its subject, may deserve the palm as an integral work of art, yet the varied powers of the author are still more extensively displayed in the other. Nor, amid so great a general resemblance, is there the slightest symptom of imitation. That the author of the Odyssey was familiar with the Iliad, has never been doubted. It were however difficult to show, from internal evidence, that the author of the Iliad was less familiar with the Odyssey. The previous analysis supplies a large body of evidence that the author of each was familiar with both; that the two poets therefore, by reference to the above law, were the same person. But the modern opinion involves as signal a violation of the same fundamental law. It assumes two poems by different authors, the one an immediate successor and close imitator of the other, to be equally distinguished by the same internal proofs of original genius; by the same unity of design, the same concentration of parts around the whole, the same preference of the dramatic to the exegetic mode of management; the same deep knowledge of human character and passion; the same tone of moral sentiment, style, imagery, and versification; the same high superiority in all these attributes to a host of emulators and imitators. No such phenomenon, it may safely be asserted, ever has been or will be exemplified.

Supposed
"common epic genius."

The only argument by which it has been attempted to evade this difficulty, is the assumption that the similarity between the two works reflects the genius, not of the individual poet, but of the primitive epic minstrelsy, embodying the taste of the whole nation, under the same conventional forms, in all its popular organs. That any such community of excellence in the primitive epic genius is altogether chimerical, even were the fact not sufficiently clear from a comparison of the remains of the secondary organs of that genius¹, is abundantly proved by the recorded judgement of the great critics of antiquity who possessed their works entire. The declared, the only apparent, motive with those critics, for setting apart the Iliad and Odyssey as the sole productions of the genuine Homer, was the number and striking nature of the excellences, by which they were jointly and broadly distinguished from all the other poems of similar compass vulgarly comprised under the same title. Had those others been marked by any real community of epic genius, would not that community as readily have blinded the same critics to the difference between an Iliad and a Cypria or Thebais, as between an Iliad and Odyssey? But in fact, any theory which would ascribe the composition of two such works to the collective rather than the individual efforts of human intellect, is in itself as repugnant to sound reason as to experience. The mass of mankind are in all ages ordinary beings. The mere routine of popular usage could never originate any thing new or brilliant in art or literature. It is to the eccentric phenomena of our nature that, through a breach rather than observance of conventional practice, we are indebted for what is really great and admirable in human productions.

Let us however be content to pass from these more fundamental principles, and restrict the inquiry to the narrower limits within which it has been confined by Separatist commentators. The following question will then present itself. Is the actual amount of discrepancy or dissimilarity between the two poems sufficient, so far to counterbalance their pervading unity and harmony, as, even by reference to the more familiar and popular rules for our guidance in such cases, to justify our attributing those other opposite features to a difference of author, rather than explaining them as the result of different impressions on the mind of a single poet?

4. Before entering on any of the points of detail arising out of this question, a few special remarks are due to the last-mentioned or "personal" causes of dissimilarity, owing to the small share of attention which they have hitherto received in the course of the discussion. Of these, the most important certainly in the present case, and which may be said in some sense to embrace all others originating in the same source, is the difference of Subject in the two poems. Even where the varied powers of an author may qualify him to treat a variety of materials with equal success, their own peculiarity of character, such as tragic or comic, peaceful or martial, of high or low life, would necessarily involve a corresponding difference of style and vocabulary. If, in addition to this variety in the action, the scene of each poem were laid, and itself composed, in a different region, and at a different period of the author's life, the result of such a combination of influences, of time, place, and circumstance on his mind, could hardly fail to be largely displayed in his work. The operation of all or most of these causes will be pointed out in the sequel, as traceable in the distinguishing features of the two poems.

Here however the question may possibly arise: Whether, admitting the full value of such secondary influence, it is probable that any one poet of Homer's age and habits, should have possessed either the faculty or the inclination to conceive and mature two great works of so opposite a character. Do not the simplicity of design, sustained grandeur of treatment, and martial turbulence of the Iliad, as contrasted with the lively vicissitudes of events and scenery, and homely descriptions of life and manners in the Odyssey, bespeak in themselves a wide difference of genius in the respective authors? The best answer to this objection is, an appeal to the history at large of the poetical art, which proves both the power and the will to excel in its most opposite departments, to be the ordinary privilege of the higher order of genius.¹ The faculty of portraying nature and character depends on that of discerning and appreciating their varieties, and, by consequence, the modes and circumstances through the medium of which such varieties are displayed. If therefore, the author of Macbeth could write the Wives of Windsor; if the heterogeneous materials of the Divine Comedy proceed from the stores of the same Dante; the poet of the Iliad could plan and execute the Odyssey. But apart from foreign examples, the text of each poem supplies abundant evidence of the capacity of its author to excel equally in the style more immediately proper to its rival. The Iliad abounds in traits of the same ethic humour which pervades the Odyssey; while the Odyssey, in its turn, offers numerous specimens of the pathetic and sublime no way inferior to the parallel portions of the Iliad.

Let it then be assumed, that a single gifted poet had selected from the traditional annals of his race two distinct series of heroic adventure; the one from the events of the Trojan war, the other from the domestic annals of the Cephallenian princes: that he had preferred, as the protagonist of the one, the haughty impetuous warrior; of the other, the sagacious enterprising adventurer: had allotted to the one, as its distinguishing feature, simplicity of design and tragic pathos; to the other, complexity of action and ethic interest. Admitting such a plan to have been conceived, its successful execution were hardly compatible with less diversity in the details. The scene in the one poem is confined within the narrow limits of a naval station, a besieged city, and a field of battle; in the other it spreads over the whole Hellenic world, real or imaginary. The heroes of the one are exclusively princes and warriors, those of the other combine every variety of rank and vocation. The whole action of the one is made up of battles, councils of war, and funebral solemnities; the other embraces every species of adventure, foreign or domestic, by land or by sea, which the realities of life in those days, or the visions of mythology could supply.

5. As to the influence of time and place, it may safely be assumed that the two works must have been matured at different periods, and in different localities. Without therefore assigning specific weight to the speculations of Longinus¹, as based on the respective character of the poems, it seems at least a reasonable conjecture that the one must have been produced in the morning or noon, the other in the evening of the author's life. The extent and accuracy of Homer's geographical knowledge have been proverbial in every age. The region around which that knowledge, as common to each poem, is concentrated, is European Greece. With the localities of that region each work displays an equal familiarity. In each, however, the more detailed topographical notices relate naturally to the countries in which the scene of action is more immediately laid; in the Iliad to the Troad, the Hellespont, and the neighbouring shores and islands of Asia Minor and Thrace. The poet's manner is that of one speaking from the coast of Asia. The mountains, plains, rivers, seas, and atmospheric phenomena of that country all appear present to his mind. The same local impressions betray themselves in the mythological element of the poem. The popular deities combine a large share of Asiatic with their Hellenic attributes. Jove blends an Idæan with his Olympic character, and Apollo is a Lycian more than a Delian or Pythian god. In the Odyssey, on the other hand, the poet, like his subject, lives and moves on the western shores of Greece. The Cephallenian islands, the plains of Elis and Messenia, the mountains of Peloponnesus, the coasts of Epirus and Southern Italy, with their respective modifications of manners and religion, take the place of the parallel regions of the Asiatic coast. Without here subtilising on the question whether Homer, considered either in the individuality or the multiplicity of his character, was a native of Europe or of Asia, this much at least may with some confidence be asserted, that each poem must have been composed by one habitually resident in the region where the principal scene of action is laid. If the author of the Odyssey was a native of Asia, his work must have been composed under a preponderance of European associations. If the author of the Iliad was a native of Europe, he must have possessed similar means of identifying himself with the eastern shores of the Ægæan.

That the poet of the confederacy, in right of his office a citizen of each of its states, whose company would everywhere be welcome in its cities and palaces, and belonging to a race remarkable both in the mass and the individual for migratory habits, should, in the course of a long life, have been tempted to change his habitual place of abode, is certainly in itself a probable supposition. Nor, in that case, could his Muse fail to be affected by the new influences to which he would be exposed. If this probability be combined with the improbability already pointed out, of twin Homers flourishing independantly or simultaneously, the following suggests itself as the simplest mode of reconciling the conflicting elements of the inquiry: That the two poems were composed in their substantial integrity by the same author at a certain interval of time, and consequently at different periods of life; the one during a residence on the eastern, the other on the western side of the Hellenic world. That the Iliad is the older of the two ¹, is the opinion generally adopted by critics of all classes, much as they may differ on other points; and it is one reasonable certainly in itself, however little weight may attach to many of the arguments by which it has been supported. It results in some measure from the historical order of the subject. That Homer should have composed his Odyssey before his Iliad, is in itself as little likely as that Dante should have written his Purgatory before his Inferno, or Milton his Paradise Regained before his Paradise Lost.

Such being the grounds on which a substantial difference of character in two such works may be reconciled with a substantial sameness of authorship, it remains to be considered how far the specific discordances to which importance has been attached by Separatist critics, may exceed the just limits of such indulgence. These discrepancies may be classed under the following heads: I. Of historical fact or allusion; II. Of religious doctrine; III. Of manners, arts, and social condition; IV. Of language and phraseology.

6. That discrepancy of fact, even in parts of the same poem, is quite compatible with sameness of author, has been abundantly shown in a previous chapter; and the same rule must be equally or still more valid in respect to different works.¹ Something however must, in every such case, depend upon the nature and degree of the anomaly. But little room, it must be admitted, is here afforded by the poems for sceptical objection. The simplest mode of testing the value of that little will be to adduce, in the words of Payne Knight², a leading Separatist commentator, almost the only case to which serious importance has been assigned in any critical quarter.

"All that we learn from the poet of the Iliad concerning Achilles implies that, at the period of his death, he was yet so young that he could not have begotten a son before his departure from home. His father had sent him forth to the war under the tutelage of Phœnix and Nestor, a mere boy, inexperienced in the council or the field¹; nor could he at that period have passed the 15th or 16th year of his age. This is confirmed by the claim advanced by Ulysses in the *Iliad*² to a superiority over him in judgement, on the ground of more mature age and experience. But Ulysses himself, when he set out for Troy, was but lately married, and the father of one child, so that he could hardly have passed his 35th year at the period (ten years later) when he put forward the above claim; nor, consequently, could Achilles at the same period have been much above twenty-five. Yet in the *Odyssey*³, Neoptolemus, son of Achilles, is described as appearing immediately after the death of his father, as his successor in all the duties of the camp and the field. For this reason alone," concludes the commentator, "we should pronounce the Iliad and Odyssey to be works of different authors."

It will be remarked that the above computation rests on the assumption, in the case of Ulysses, that the heroes married at the age of twenty-three or twenty-four; an assumption arbitrary in itself and repugnant to the poet's own authority. Setting however aside for the present the question of heroic marriages, and giving a somewhat more liberal construction to the texts directly bearing on the age of Achilles, let us assume him to have been thirty at least at the epoch of his death in the tenth year of the siege, twenty at its commencement, and not more than fifteen or sixteen at his final departure from his father's house to join the Greek armament: for that event, as will be shown, took place in the spirit of the same conventional chronology, several years before the actual formation of the siege; and while the hero, according to every version of the legend, was yet in the stricter sense of the term a boy.¹ Nor can it be said that thirty years were too mature an age to justify the complaint of premature death in a national champion. If then, as P. Knight's own argument assumes, Achilles was qualified at fifteen to stand forth as chief warrior of a great army, he may certainly, by the same law of heroic precocity, have been capable at a still earlier age of procreating a son. Neoptolemus would hence, upon this more reasonable adjustment, have reached, at the epoch of his father's death, the same age, fifteen or sixteen, which Knight himself allows Achilles on first entering military life; and would have been consequently, as the inheritor of his father's great qualities, equally competent for the duties devolved on him. There results therefore, upon Knight's own data, a singular harmony rather than incongruity between the two poems, in the adjustment of their mythical chronology.

In considering how far this arrangement, not certainly in a strictly historical sense a very probable one, is consistent with the general spirit of Homer's school of epic art, we must once more guard against the fallacy of a hypercritical exaction from the poet of rigid historical probability in his legendary details. It is certain at least that whatever anomaly may here exist was not peculiar to Homer, but common to the whole system of facts and chronology of which he was but one of the organs. That this system was nowhere better connected than as embodied by himself, will appear from the subjoined analysis of its epochs, which will also tend to place in a distinct and compact point of view, the fundamental basis on which his great edifice of Troic mythology has been constructed.

It is clear from the incidental notices interspersed throughout both poems, that the adventures which supply their immediate subject form part of a great "Cycle of events," extending over a long period of time, and which were more fully treated in what were afterwards called the "Cyclic poems."¹ As those works were evidently composed as subsidiary or supplementary to the Iliad and Odyssey, there can be no reason to assume, unless where distinct proof exists of the fact, that the tradition of the disciples or imitators, whatever license may have been taken by them in matters of detail, differed in any essential point fundamentally or irreconcilably from that authorised by the acknowledged chief of the school. It will not here be necessary to recapitulate in detail, the numerous allusions contained in either poem to this extra-Homeric or Cyclic portion of the Troic series of adventures.² Our citations will be restricted to such passages as tend to illustrate the question of unity or duality of authorship.

cycle of Troic legend.

7. Helen, in her lamentation over the body of Hector¹, describes nineteen years as having then elapsed since her flight from her home and husband. She may, therefore, have been at this time about thirty-seven years of age, assuming her to have been married at sixteen, and allowing two for her cohabitation with Menelaus, during which was born their single child Hermione. The Homeric cycle of chronology, from the rape of Helen to the return of Ulysses, comprehends consequently a period of thirty years, which may be subdivided into three epochs of ten years each: 1. the preparation for the war; 2. the siege; 3. the wanderings and resettlement of the heroes in Greece. There is something in this threefold subdivision of a great poetical era into round decennial periods, singularly characteristic of the mixed spirit of hyperbole and method which marks the genius of heroic romance in every age.² The chief stumbling-block with fastidious commentators lies in the ten years of preparation. Yet this period hardly involves so great a real improbability as that of the siege itself. That an army of 100,000 men, and a fleet of 1000 ships, should have maintained themselves during ten years on an open coast in the midst of a hostile country, and during the first nine without any intrenchment; that not one of the chiefs should have absented himself from his quarters during this whole period, either for the purpose of visiting his home or recruiting his forces, are facts all formally vouched for by Homer and the unanimous voice of tradition, but which, if not physically impossible, are certainly not more credible, than that the same confederacy should have spent ten years in reflexion and preparation for so superhuman an enterprise. The historical improbability of the first decennium is also relieved by its poetical details. Homer tells us¹ that Paris, instead of returning at once with Helen to Troy, sailed first to Phœnicia, as a blind doubtless to her pursuers. After his return came vain negotiations for her restoration.² Then follow the long and arduous exertions of the Greek chiefs to rouse the feelings and collect the forces of the confederacy.³ After the muster of the armada, notice occurs of further delays from contrary winds, and of desultory warfare on the coasts and islands of the Ægean (in the course of which another city was taken by mistake for Troy), before the final lodgement on the Troad was effected. These various adventures, narrated in detail by the Cyclic poets⁴, the Cypria in particular, were amply sufficient, in the conventional spirit of the system, to occupy a period of ten years. That the same round number in the third decennium, though often pointedly laid down by Homer himself, was yet purely conventional, results, as has been seen⁵, from the details of his own chronology in the Odyssey, where the sum total of the separate epochs specified in the action of the poem gives but eight years and seven months.

Let us then take this conventional cycle of thirty years as a basis for adjusting the respective ages of the heroes. Let Ulysses be supposed to have been twenty-four when he undertook the embassy to Troy described in the Iliad, twenty-nine at the epoch of his marriage, thirty when he finally left his home for the siege; forty¹ when he claims a superiority of experience to Achilles, and fifty on his resettlement in Ithaca. Helen, let it be assumed, marries at sixteen. Her flight took place at eighteen. She was twenty-seven at the commencement of the siege, thirty-seven at its conclusion, and forty-seven when Telemachus visited the court of Sparta.

Regarding Achilles the more popular fable is, that as the muster of forces approached, Peleus, forewarned of the fatal result of his son's participation in the war, sent him in female disguise, while yet a beardless boy therefore, to the Isle of Scyros, to be educated with the daughters of King Lycomedes; and the birth of Neoptolemus was the result of an amour with Deïdamia, the eldest of the princesses.² The Cypria and Little Iliad give another version of the story: that the hero's connexion with Deïdamia was formed during an expedition to Scyros, in the course of the desultory warfare of the first decen-

¹ This were little enough, by reference to v. 791. of II. xxiii., where Ulysses is described as "an elderly man" (ἀμυρότατος). Payne Knight would have had some difficulty in reconciling this epithet with his own assumption, that Ulysses was but five and thirty at the time when he is so addressed. He evades the dilemma, like so many others of the same kind, by expunging the passage. But this is not the only new anomaly which this critic would force upon Homer, in his hypercritical anxiety to dispose of such as really exist. Assuming Achilles to have died at twenty-five, and that the heroes habitually married at that age, (which forms the foundation of Knight's whole theory,) Peleus would have been about fifty at the epoch of his son's death. Yet throughout the Iliad the same Peleus is alluded to as a superannuated man, tottering on the brink of the grave. (xix. 334., xxiv. 486. alibi.) It is difficult indeed, even by a more liberal construction of the text, to reconcile the allusions to the extreme youth of Achilles, and the extreme age of Peleus, with each other; unless indeed the latter hero be supposed to have been already long past the prime of life when he espoused Thetis, which is not a very satisfactory alternative.

nium.¹ Whichever view be preferred, it results that Neoptolemus was born to Achilles while scarcely arrived at years of puberty, during the first decennium of the cycle.² If the young hero's birth be placed about the middle of that decennium, he would have been, at the epoch of his father's death and his own first appearance in the field, about the same age as his father was when he set out for the war. The whole cycle therefore may be distributed as follows :

I. Decennium.	{	1st year.	Flight of Helen, aged eighteen.
		2.	Arrival of Paris and Helen at Troy.
		3.	Embassy of Ulysses to Troy, aged twenty-four.
		4.	Commencement of desultory warfare.
		5.	Birth of Neoptolemus.
		8.	Marriage of Ulysses to Penelope.
		9.	Birth of Telemachus.
II. Decennium.	{	10.	Commencement of the siege.
		20th year.	Death of Achilles, aged thirty ; appearance of Neoptolemus on the field, aged fifteen ; taking of the city, and restoration of Helen, aged thirty-seven, to Menelaus.
III. Decennium.	{	28th year,	Return of Menelaus and Helen to Sparta. ³
		29—30.	Journey of Telemachus, aged twenty, to Peloponnesus ; return of Ulysses, aged fifty, to Ithaca.

¹ Diintz. p. 11. 19. ; conf. Welck. Ep. C. pt. i. p. 60. ; Eust. ad Il. p. 47. Schol. Ven. ad Il. xxiv. 765. This view seems also to be countenanced by Homer in Il. xi. 766., although the passage has been differently interpreted.

² Is not the fact that the same Little Iliad in one place distinctly describes Neoptolemus as born during the early stages of the war, and in another, like the Odyssey, makes him figure as the most distinguished hero of the concluding part of the siege, in itself sufficient proof how little offensive such anomalies were to the taste of the primitive public ?

This series of events, if it cannot boast of much historical probability, can as little, if judged in its own poetical spirit, be taxed with inconsistency. Nor are its anomalies greater, or so great as occur in other epic poems of historical times. A poet whose whole machinery is regulated by supernatural agency, and whose warriors are described as threefold stronger than ordinary men, was surely at liberty to represent the flowers of this chivalry, the types of this super-human prowess, as possessing at an earlier¹ or retaining to a later age than their descendants, the brilliant qualities with which he invests them. That Payne Knight's fastidious rule was as little observed by other primitive organs of epic legend as by Homer, is clear, not only from abundant evidence that the representation of Achilles as simultaneously a boy in years, a father in virility, and a veteran in military prowess, was common to the whole body of Cyclic poets, but by still more glaring anomalies authorised by the same or other schools of primitive epic art, and no way repugnant, consequently, to the taste of the times. It was a favourite tradition in those schools, that Helen's charms were such even in her childhood as to have inflamed the desires of Theseus, and led to her rape and the birth of a child by that hero before her marriage to Menelaus. This legend, monstrous as it is, seems to have given no offence to the antient public of any age, and to be partially countenanced even by Homer.²

8. That, with the above exception, if such it be, no serious discrepancy of fact between the two poems has been urged in any authoritative quarter, may be considered as in itself a powerful argument against the Separatist view. Amid so great a mass of conflicting fables as were current relative to this cycle of events, any such accidental harmony in the adjustment of its details by two of its organs were scarcely conceivable. This improbability, and the consequent fallacy of the customary appeals to the "common genius" of the epic minstrelsy, may be placed in a still broader light, by a comparison of the discordances in the tradition of the other representatives of that genius, even as evinced by the scanty remains of their text, relative to the same facts where the Iliad and Odyssey so harmoniously agree.

According to the Cypria Helen was daughter, not of Leda as with Homer, but of the goddess Nemesis.¹ In the same poem, if Herodotus² may be trusted, Paris and Helen on their elopement sailed direct from Sparta to Troy, where they arrived after a voyage of three days. According to Homer³ they first sailed to Sidon, and seem to have been several months, or even years, in reaching the Troad.

In the Iliad, the first illicit intercourse between the fugitives takes place after their departure from Lacedæmon, in the island of Cranaë, where they land

In the former poem, the youthful hero is made his father's son by Circe; in the latter, by Calypso. In either case, his own bride might have been his grandmother. Conf. infra, Ch. xviii. § 16. in the course of their voyage.¹ In the Cypria, the seduction takes place while Paris was a guest in the Spartan palace.² In the Iliad, the daughters of Agamemnon are described by himself as but three in number; the Cypria gave him four.³

In the Iliad, the omen of the snake and sparrows at Aulis relates solely to the ten years' war after the actual formation of the siege, and settlement of the camp on the shores of the Hellespont.⁴ In the Cypria⁵ the prophetic import of the prodigy comprehended a number of events belonging to the previous decennium; the abortive attack on the coast of Mysia, and sack of Teuthrania; the dispersion of the fleet by a storm, the marriage of Achilles at Scyros, the return of the fleet to Aulis, and remuster of the forces in that port; the sacrifice of Iphigenia, and various other adventures prior to the first lodgement on the Troad.

In the Iliad, Calchas by his divine inspiration guides the Greek fleet from Aulis to Troy. In the Cypria, Telephus an Asiatic chief is engaged for this purpose, after a vain attempt of the Greeks to find their own way.⁶

In the Cypria, Protesilaus is slain by Hector.⁷ In the Iliad⁸, he falls by the hand of an obscure Dardanian warrior.

Among the higher distinctive excellences of the one genuine Homer, attention was formerly directed to his ideal conception of the heroic character, as distinguished by common attributes of generosity and personal honour. Diomed, Ulysses, and Menelaus, especially, are, with the poet, each in their respective mode and degree, among the most excellent models of heroic virtue. Not only was no such principle recognised by the other representatives of the common epic genius, but the characters of those three heroes, in particular, are exhibited by several of the immediate successors of Homer in an odious or despicable light. The two former are represented in the Cypria as heartless assassins, basely circumventing and murdering, from motives of malice or sordid self-interest, their fellow-chief Palamedes¹, a person of some celebrity with these secondary organs of heroic legend, but one of whom Homer himself betrays no knowledge.

According to the Cypria, the anger of Ulysses against Palamedes was owing to the latter hero having been the instrument of unmasking the Ithacan chief's cunning schemes for evading his stipulated participation in the war. In the Odyssey, Agamemnon and Menelaus are described as having secured the coöperation of Ulysses by their own persuasive influence.² In the Cypria again³, Nestor, not Agamemnon, is made the companion of Menelaus on his visit to Ithaca on that occasion.

In the Cypria, Deïdamia, daughter of Lycomedes king of Scyros, is made the wife of Achilles⁴; in the Iliad Achilles represents himself as unmarried.⁵ In the *Cypria*⁶, Briseïs was described as captured by Achilles in the town of Pedasus; in the *Iliad*¹, as taken in the sack of Lyrnessus.

In the Iliad Jove reluctantly grants the prayer of Thetis to avenge the wrongs of Achilles, by favouring the Trojans at the expense of the Greeks. In the Cypria the quarrel between the two Greek heroes is described as preordained by Jupiter, for the express purpose of favouring the Trojan cause.

In the *Æthiopis*², Achilles is carried off immediately after his death, and installed as a deity in the island of Leuka. In the Odyssey he is found still in the realms of Pluto several years afterwards.

In the Little Iliad, Ganymede is son of Laomedon³; in the Iliad, he is brother of that king and son of Tros.⁴

The compensation made by Jupiter to the father of Ganymede for the loss of his son is, in the Iliad, a valuable breed of horses⁵; in the Little Iliad, a golden vine.⁶

In the *Little Iliad*⁷, Æneas, on the fall of the city, is taken and carried off captive by Neoptolemus. In the tradition of Homer⁸, he reigns over the Trojans after the destruction of Priam's empire.

In the *Nosti*⁹, Neoptolemus, returning home after the fall of Troy, meets Ulysses at Maronea, the city of the Ciconians. This account cannot be reconciled with that given by Homer in the *Odyssey*¹⁰, of the adventures of Ulysses on the same coast. In the *Nosti*¹¹, Neoptolemus, instead of returning to his father's native territory of Phthia, migrates by land to Molossia, where he finds his grandfather Peleus already settled. No such migrations are known by Homer.¹

In the *Odyssey*², Tantalus is debarred from the enjoyment of the proffered dainties by their being drawn off beyond his reach; in the *Nosti*³ by the interposition of a large stone.

That the inferior Cyclic organs of the "common epic legend" were, in respect to its details, bound by no more rigid law of conformity towards each other than towards Homer, is also abundantly clear from their existing remains. A few examples are subjoined.

In the Ilii-persis of Arctinus, Æneas retires previously to the fall of Troy into Mount Ida, and escapes; in the Little Iliad of Lesches, he remains in the city and is carried off captive by Neoptolemus. In the poem of Arctinus, Ulysses kills Astyanax; in that of Lesches, the infant hero is slain by Neoptolemus. In the former work, Priam is slain at the altar of Jupiter; in the latter, he perishes at the gate of his own palace. The deliverance of Æthra, the captive queen of Athens, is also differently narrated in the two poems. In the Nosti, Telegonus is son of Ulysses by Circe, in the Telegonia he is son of Calypso.⁴

If it be remembered that these discordances are but a sample of what the entire poems referred to may have presented, it must be evident that, far from uniformity, a wide latitude, at least in such matters of detail, was authorised if not enjoined by the primitive Epic Muse upon her different votaries. The evidence therefore of identity of author, supplied by the singular harmony observable in the Iliad and Odyssey, is the more conclusive.

9. The second head of Separatist argument, and the one to which the greatest importance has been attached in the modern schools¹, is based on the religious element of the two poems.

"The gods," it is said, "are essentially better in the Odyssey than in the Iliad." "In the former poem there is more religion, in the latter more mythology." "In the Odyssey the gods appear, not only superior to the race of men, but distinguished by many of the higher excellences which ought to adorn the representatives of the Deity. In the Iliad, they are exhibited as no way better than their own creatures, and influenced both in their relations to each other, and their management of mundane affairs, by caprice, sensual passion, or a spirit of arbitrary tyranny."²

This comparative estimate of the poems, apart from its intrinsic merits, offers a curious example of the different lights in which the same objects may present themselves to different minds, according to the medium through which those objects may be contemplated. The older more popular view of the religious moral of the Iliad, among both critics and philosophers, was quite the reverse of that above stated. By those authorities the Iliad was wont to be held up as the noblest Pagan illustration of the fundamental principles of divine justice. To such an extent has the admiration of this feature of its composition been carried, even by some ingenious recent commentators, that it has been pronounced inexplicable by reference to any purely Pagan source, and an emanation, however disguised, from the genuine fountain-head of Scripture morality.

“The history of the guilty and devoted Troy,” we were wont to be told, “is but a mythical type of those vicissitudes of human offence and divine retribution, which mark in every age the course of earthly affairs. Ilium was a city celebrated of old for its vices and impieties, and the condign punishment with which, from time to time, they were visited. Her career of iniquity was brought to a climax by the crime of Paris, abetted by his family and nation. The peaceful overtures of the Greeks are contumeliously rejected. The divine vengeance, slow but unerring, finally overwhelms both city and nation. Æneas, who alone had discountenanced their iniquity, is spared to reign over a scanty remnant of the Dardanian race. The Greeks however, while asserting their just rights, are not themselves exempt from guilt and its attendant punishment. Their commander-in-chief, influenced by selfish passion, wantonly offends the deity in the person of his priest, and a destructive pestilence ravages the camp. On the remonstrance of the warrior to whom the offender chiefly owed the previous success of his arms, he propitiates the divine wrath and relieves the host from the calamity, but repays the author of this timely interference with outrage and contumely. The other chiefs tamely acquiesce in the injurious treatment of their champion. Jove, espousing his cause, turns the tide of war against the Greeks. Achilles, from whom alone they can expect relief, sternly refuses pardon or succour to his repentant countrymen. His vindictive spirit meets, in its turn, with well-merited punishment, in the loss of his dearest friend. All parties therefore, in so far as guilty, each in their respective mode or degree, of impiety to the gods or injustice to man, are subjected to their due share of castigation.”¹

and religion
of the Iliad.

Such is the system of epic morality admired by former generations of Homeric commentators, as the nearest approach to the pure Scriptural doctrine of retributive justice. By their Separatist successors the same system has been denounced as not only pernicious in itself, but greatly inferior to that of the Odyssey, which with the old school was no such object of warm eulogy. By these later authorities we are assured that :

“In the Iliad the whole theory of divine government is as corrupt, as in the Odyssey it is commendable. Had the author of the later poem sung the war of Troy, that genius of discord Juno, could never have been represented as exciting the passions of Olympus, and dividing its inhabitants into contending factions. The gods in the Odyssey no longer hate blindly and passionately. They are never, as in the Iliad, systematically introduced as promoters of evil. The Jupiter of the former poem would never, to gratify the mortified vanity of Achilles, have misled the Grecian commander by a delusive dream into a series of cruel disasters. The Atridæ indeed rest their hopes of success on the retributive justice of the Deity, but these hopes are not fulfilled ; nor is the crime of Paris ever seriously mentioned in the council of Jove, among the motives of his policy. In the Odyssey, on the other hand, the hopes of the guilty are frustrated ; sure punishment visits their crimes ;”¹ and so forth.

Religion and morality of the Odyssey.

10. To the impartial reader it will perhaps already have occurred that the truth lies between these two extremes of theory. If the theology of the Iliad be not so immaculate as it appeared to its antient eulogists, it is certainly not so bad as described by the more zealous partisans of the Odyssey. The best mode of dealing justice to both sides will be, adopting the tone of a keen advocate of the Iliad, to try how far, by the same dismal style of colouring, the divine management in the rival poem might not be held up under still darker shades of iniquity.

"In the council of Olympus Ulysses is admitted to be a hero of irreproachable virtue, and a worthy object of divine favour. On his voyage home from Troy, where, during ten years he had proved a powerful instrument in forwarding the decrees of Fate, this same blameless hero is driven by the caprice of those same deities, upon distant inhospitable shores. On one of these he falls in with a race of bloodthirsty cannibals, whose chief boast is their disregard of every law human or divine, and with whom the gods themselves are especial objects of contempt. After seeing several of his comrades devoured by the patriarch of these monsters, he succeeds in effecting his escape by inflicting blindness on his enemy. The cannibal however was a favourite son of the great god Neptune, under whose protection he had hitherto carried on his practices. The god, enraged at the mishap of his beloved offspring, vows unrelenting vengeance against its author. Jupiter, though sympathising with the virtuous hero, consents to indulge Neptune in his vindictive schemes, and Ulysses is condemned to wander during nine years on the face of ocean. His fleet is destroyed. His brave company of warriors perish in the waves, or are massacred by other tribes of savages. After infinite hardships he lands, a solitary survivor, on his native island, but to witness still severer calamities within its bounds. For the vengeance of Neptune extended to his whole family, who are subjected, equally guiltless, to equally cruel afflictions. His mother dies of a broken heart. His father, borne down by age and sorrow, abandons himself to despair and a life of squalid misery. The domestic peace of his spotless queen is violated by a host of unprincipled vassals, who conspire against his life, occupy his palace, consume his substance in debauchery, and corrupt the morals and allegiance of his subjects. At length a tardy compassion visits the mind of Jove, and the hero in the end succeeds in destroying his enemies and reestablishing his authority."

The facts here too are warmly coloured ; but still they are undeniable facts ; and he must be a very nice casuist who, in the face of them, can maintain that "the gods in the Odyssey are never introduced as abettors of evil ; that they never hate blindly or passionately ;" and that "the Jupiter of that poem could never, for the mere gratification of the offended pride of Achilles and his mother, have so afflicted the Greeks." It is indeed certain, that, while in the Iliad the general train of events, amid all the conflicting interests in heaven, is steadily guided by the laws of retributive equity, the same can hardly be said of the Odyssey. This forms in fact a serious defect of the latter poem. No reader of taste or judgement can fail to experience in its perusal a certain feeling of impatience, not only that the destinies of a blameless hero and an innocent woman, but that any important train of events, should hinge on so offensive a mechanism as the blind affection of a mighty deity for so odious a monster as Polyphemus.

points of conformity and discrepancy.

11. As a counterpoise to the contrast above traced in the divine agency of the two poems, attention may be directed to certain very curious points of conformity, or even sameness in this element of their composition, supplying no mean head of circumstantial evidence of identity of authorship. "In the Iliad Jupiter himself is impartial, or, as minister of the decrees of fate, leans to the cause of Agamemnon. That hero, however, offends the son of a deity possessing influence at the court of Olympus. The divine parent appeals to Jove for vengeance on the aggressor. The appeal is successful, and upon its consequences hinge the whole plot of the poem, and subsequent fortunes of Agamemnon." Substitute in the above passage the word "Odyssey" for "Iliad," and "Ulysses" for "Agamemnon," and the remainder applies letter for letter to the former work. Add to this that in each poem, at the outset of the action, the absence of a deity chiefly interested exercises a certain influence on the course of events; which absence is, in each case, among the Æthiopians. Now here, as formerly, so obsequious an imitation as it would, on Separatist principles, be necessary to assume, by any one great original genius, of any other, in such peculiar features of his plot, were scarcely conceivable. But the parallel is quite in harmony with the operations of the same genius, availing himself instinctively and unconsciously of a similar foundation for a different superstructure.

Equally fallacious is the other head of Separatist argument, that "in the Iliad there is more mythology, in the Odyssey more religion." The very reverse of this assertion may indeed be demonstrated. In the former poem the whole train of events revolves on a properly religious agency, that of the great gods of Olympus, with Jupiter himself as their controller and director. In the Odyssey the action is swayed throughout by a host of petty mythological personages; Demigods, Nymphs, magicians, and sorceresses. Where can be detected in the Iliad an example of mythological, as distinct from religious influence, to be compared with that exercised by Proteus, Æolus, Circe, Scylla, Calypso, or Ino Leucothea, in the Odyssey. Nor are the defects of the divine morality in the Odyssey less plainly exemplified in these details than in the higher religious agency. What is to be thought of the morality of a pantheon, with one of whose leading members a favourite amusement was the conversion of her guests into hogs; and another of whom, instead of helping the distressed hero home to his family, detains him a prisoner for the gratification of her own passions, and does her best permanently to corrupt his fidelity to his wife!

Any inference as to the age or author of the poems, grounded on this more reasonable estimate of their religious element, were as out of place as that based by the Separatist critics on their own fallacious theory. The whole distinction resolves itself, in fact, into a difference of subject. In the purely Olympic mechanism of the Iliad, as in the fantastic or monstrous mythology of the Odyssey, the poet's object was, not so much to inculcate lessons of moral instruction, as to entertain his audience by working on their wonder, curiosity, or terror. In each poem, however, the higher didactic principle is based on the doctrine of retributive justice, in a form which, though similar in both, is undoubtedly more simple and dignified in the Iliad than in the Odyssey. To the same fundamental cause may, with equal propriety, be traced what is perhaps the only characteristic in which the religious element of the Odyssey appears superior to that of the Iliad, the absence of that spirit of dissension, occasionally resulting in personal encounters between rival deities, which pervades the latter poem. Little or nothing of this kind is observable in the Odyssey. Minerva, by Jove's authority, counteracts it is true the destructive schemes of Neptune against the hero. But she never ventures openly to attack or insult her uncle.

heaven.

It cannot be doubted that the tradition of "War in Heaven," in all its varieties, was inveterate in Greece from the remotest period and familiar, consequently, to the author of both works, whether the same or a different poet. That tradition was indeed an essential element of Hellenic Paganism, in its primary physiological capacity, where different deities represent separate, and often conflicting agencies. It was natural therefore, that any great conflict on earth should be attended by a parallel collision in heaven ; and that, in a poem celebrating such a conflict, the divine agency would participate in the martial spirit of the heroes. In a poem descriptive of a state of profound peace, the case was different. The gods could hardly with any propriety be there represented in a state of warfare. But during the action of the Iliad, Troy was the spot around which all the elements of discord in the Hellenic world, human or divine, were concentrated. In the Odyssey, on the other hand, there is no war upon earth, and no room for any, by consequence, in heaven. The scope of the author is not to awaken martial ardour, but to amuse by accounts of marvellous adventure, dark intrigue, and familiar scenes of domestic life. To have introduced the few deities who take part in the action pitted in mortal strife against each other, while the hero on whose account they were quarrelling was quietly following out his cautious schemes for the settlement of his affairs, would have been as great a breach of propriety, as to have represented the gods of the Iliad reclining at ease on their thrones in Olympus, while their respective favourites were engaged in fierce combat on the plain below.

12. If the substance of the Separatist theory as to an essential amelioration of the divine character in the Odyssey be fallacious, still less will its details bear any close examination. Great stress has been laid, for example, on the remark of Jupiter, "how wrongously the gods are accused of being authors of evil to men, who by their own sin and folly bring misfortune on themselves."¹ "Can any such noble declaration," it has been asked, "be discovered in the Iliad?" This is no doubt a fine sentiment. It is however but a sentiment; and it were as reasonable to maintain that it represents the religious dogma of the Odyssey, in the face of evidence supplied by every portion of the poem of an entirely opposite practice, as to assert an entire freedom from superstitious weakness in the heroes of the Iliad, on the strength of the far nobler sentiment denouncing all such weakness placed in the mouth of Hector in that poem. But in fact the former sentiment is completely neutralised in a subsequent part of the Odyssey, by another of the poet's pithy philosophical apophthegms above quoted, to the effect that "mortals had no free-will whatever, but are mere machines in the hands of Jupiter."¹ Besides, it may be asked: Were all the calamities of the Laertian royal race the result of their own sin and folly rather than of divine dispensation? Was Neptune the author of no unmerited evil to Ulysses and his family? Did not Jupiter, the organ of the above noble sentiment, indulge Neptune in his vindictive malice, while acknowledging the virtue and innocence of the victim against whom that malice was directed? Is it not said, not only that Minerva hardened the hearts of the suitors and incited them to their crimes, but actually stifled the rising spirit of repentance in the breast of Amphinomus, and hurried him forward against his own better feelings in his career of perdition?² It were difficult to find in the Iliad, tools as men are even there in the hands of the gods, any thing so utterly subversive of all freedom of human will.

The further assertion that "no divine omen or prophetic announcement ever deceives in the Odyssey, as does the dream sent by Jove to Agamemnon in the Iliad,"¹ is altogether groundless. This will appear by reference to a previous chapter, where the two cases² of such divine treachery, occurring one in each poem, were shown to stand in so close analogy to each other, as to supply argument of harmony rather than discrepancy of religious mechanism. The circumstance that the falsehood involves more serious consequences in the one than in the other case, is merely accidental, and no way affects the principle of divine morality here in question.

omens.

But perhaps the most singular shape which this argument has taken, is the appeal made to "the superior sanctity attached by the gods to the duties of hospitality in the Odyssey, as compared with the divine indifference to that virtue in the Iliad." "In the latter poem Jupiter," it is said, "neglects to fulfil the desire of the Atridæ for the punishment of Paris; nor does that hero's ungrateful violation of the domestic peace of his host seem to be an object of concern with the gods. How vitally, on the other hand, does the Odyssey bring home the duties of hospitality to the heart!"³ The case here adduced against the Iliad is not very intelligible. Surely the destruction of Troy was a judgement on the crime of Paris, and as such is distinctly promised to Menelaus, and as distinctly denounced against the Trojans in numerous passages of the poem; while Æneas, as free from the national guilt, is expressly exempted from the national destruction.¹ But are there no offenders against the rights of strangers in the Odyssey; and how stands the divine morality in regard to them? Is not the favourite occupation of Circe, herself an "honourable goddess," the transformation of her confiding guests into swine? Is not the ordinary diet of Polyphemus, the favourite son of Neptune, the flesh of his guests? Do the gods punish him for this crime? Does not the well-merited chastisement inflicted on it by Ulysses, draw down the severest weight of divine vengeance on that virtuous hero? Are the Læstrygonians, who emulate the treacherous ferocity of the Cyclops, punished? How, on the other hand, is the most generous exercise of hospitality in the poem, or in the whole cycle perhaps of classical fiction, that of Alcinoüs to Ulysses, rewarded? By any special favour on the part of the gods? By the utter destruction of all concerned in it!²

state of society in the two poems.

13. The next class of discrepancies on which stress has been laid by Separatist critics, are those in the habits of social or political life described in the two poems. Here, as in the previous cases, the argument has been mainly directed to establish that the Odyssey exhibits a more advanced state of

² Od. XIII. 128. sqq. ; see further, Appendix B. society than the Iliad. The best evidence perhaps, of the weakness of the whole body of examples accumulated in favour of this view, is the readiness with which the cases of distinction most prominently put forward by one commentator, are dismissed as inapplicable or hypercritical by another, who as confidently directs attention to a fresh series, to be rejected¹ in its turn by a successor in the same arena. Of the few such distinctions which can be considered as involving a real difference, there is scarcely one but admits of the most obvious reference to a corresponding diversity of subject or locality; while several, in so far as they furnish any solid ground for speculation, might rather be urged in proof of a more advanced stage of culture in the Iliad.

Appeal has been made to the more extended knowledge of distant or foreign geography in the Odyssey.² But is not the Odyssey, in some sense, a geographical poem, the Iliad a local one? Could we reasonably expect the same variety of geographical allusion in a work the action of which is limited to a single narrow valley on the shore of the Hellespont, as in one which, in its very essence, was an epitome of the entire foreign navigation, fabulous or real, of the day? Suppose the parallel case of two English epic poems, the reputed works of a single author flourishing during the middle ages of Europe; the one devoted to the wars of Edward and Bruce, the other to the Crusades of Cœur de Lion. Could a greater knowledge of Oriental geography displayed in the latter be seriously urged as a proof of the more advanced intelligence of the author or his age? As a more specific argument has been adduced the occurrence in the Odyssey alone of the name Messene¹, denoting the south-western district of Peloponnesus, afterwards familiarly so called. But was it not quite natural that, in a poem immediately devoted to the affairs of Western Greece, and describing travels and adventures in that region, titles for its provincial subdivisions should occur, for which there would be no opening in a work involving mere general allusion, if any, to the same countries? Messene, in the Odyssey, is in fact a provincial title, Pylos being still the general term for the dominions of Nestor.²

Among the cases to which weight has been attached under the head of domestic manners, is the mention in the Odyssey, and not in the Iliad, of the primitive species of inn or tavern called Lesche; indicating, it is urged, a more advanced stage of social comfort.³ It may however safely be asserted that no people ever reached the degree of culture which the Iliad itself exhibits, without having made the discovery of some such expedient for supplying the wants of travellers or idlers. A sufficient reason for the mention of it being confined to the Odyssey is, that the actors of that poem comprise both travellers and idlers, while in the Iliad no individual of either class is introduced. Nor, had one accidentally made his appearance, was it likely that a camp, or a devastated country would have supplied him with such a place of refreshment.¹ The argument that columns² are mentioned in the Odyssey, and not in the Iliad, admits of being similarly disposed of. The column is an essential element of Greek architecture. The existence of the spacious primitive halls or porticoes incidentally described in the Iliad were inconceivable without the aid of this earliest and simplest mode of constructing them. It happens however that the scene, during more than one half of the Odyssey, is laid in the interior of buildings, to the minutest parts of which the action involved continual allusion; while in the Iliad the descriptions of domestic life are scanty and general.³

But if such arguments be valid at all, they ought

³ Another example adduced by P. Knight (§ 47.) deserves attention, as a specimen of the singular kind of logic employed, even by acute critics, in the course of this discussion. "The terms κίθαρς and φάρμυξ, denoting a lyre, occur," he observes, "in both poems; but the word κόλλοψ, signifying the pegs or keys on which the chords were strung, is limited to the Odyssey. The author of the latter poem, consequently, was familiar with a more advanced stage of the musical art." It were essential to the full value of this syllogism that we should be informed how such an instrument could exist at all, without some kind of mechanism for fastening or tuning its chords. That mechanism was a κόλλοψ. Might it not as well be argued: "Chariots are indeed mentioned in both poems; but the term ἄρτιξ, for the framework of the vehicle, which occurs fifteen times in the Iliad, is not found in the Odyssey? If the want of columns to the porticoes, or pegs to the harps of the Iliad be a proof of barbarism, the like inference must result from the want of backs to the chariots of the Odyssey." In the Iliad the ἵππον of the lyre is mentioned, but not in the Odyssey. No allusion occurs in the Odyssey to statues of the gods. The Iliad however does contain such an allusion; and for the obvious reason, that in the Iliad alone mention happens to be made of worship in the interior of a temple. II. vi. 303.

at least to be consistently carried through. There might then perhaps be room, in reasoning at least on Separatist principles, for turning the tables, and maintaining the Iliad to be the more recent work, as abounding with notices of arts not mentioned in the Odyssey; some of these arts too, of a nobler description than any described in the latter poem. Such are the trades of the horn-dresser¹, tanner², leather-cutter³, and chariot-maker⁴; of the armourer in all its varieties; of the wool-carder with her scales⁵, weighing out and fixing the price of her work. The potter's wheel is also familiarly noticed in the Iliad alone⁶; while, in the department of agriculture, the winnowing-machine⁷ is mentioned, with the cultivation of beans and peas⁸; also threshing⁹, irrigation¹⁰, and other refinements of rural husbandry; and the professional voltigeur is described exhibiting his feats of horsemanship to the public.¹¹ Of none of these marks of advanced civilisation do we discover anything in the Odyssey, although that poem abounds far more than the Iliad in descriptions of rural and social life. Where shall we find in the former poem such indications of advanced culture as the account given in the *Iliad*¹² of the art of embroidery, comprehending, by obvious implication, also that of painting; or the description of the Lydian lady emblazoning ivory ornaments for the cheek-piece of her cavalier's bridle?¹³ where anything parallel to the Shield of Achilles, an episode which really does exhibit a state of the plastic art difficult to comprehend in the age and country of the poet? There can hardly indeed be a doubt, that the notices of arts connected with more advanced civilisation greatly predominate in the Iliad. Any counter-argument however, founded on this predominance, as to the later origin of that poem, were not only a sophistry, but would involve a blindness to a characteristic distinction in the poetical genius of the two works. The Iliad, as a natural consequence of the historical meagreness of its subject, is far richer in figurative embellishment than the Odyssey, where the necessity or propriety of any similar amount of such accessories was superseded by the variety of the general action. The allusions accordingly to elegant or interesting works of art are, in the latter poem, chiefly such as incidentally present themselves in the ordinary course of the narrative, and are comparatively rare. In the Iliad, on the other hand, they are for the most part introduced in the form of similes, or other illustrative details, and are proportionally more numerous and specific.¹

14. The objections to a common authorship derived from varieties of language in the two poems, may be equally met by reference to the corresponding variety of their subject. New or different objects and ideas require new and different names to denote them, with new modes of thought and expression. In so far, however, as the question has been made to hinge on the relative proportion of archaic idioms in the two works, after all the elaborate efforts of the Separatist commentators in an opposite sense, it may confidently be asserted that the result of an impartial scrutiny leaves a decided balance of such phraseology on the side of the Odyssey.¹ This apparent anomaly may also be explained on a juster principle than by any appeal to the comparative antiquity of the text. In a language in course of formation under poetical auspices, as was that of Homer, the most approved and elegant modes of expression would, as a general rule, be selected for the higher tone of description or dialogue. The studied adoption of, or adherence to, antiquated idioms, as a means of ennobling poetical composition, is an affectation proper to the later stages of literature, to the taste of Apollonius or Lycophron, but foreign to that of the primitive Epic Muse.² But in every state of society antiquated idioms maintain their ground, apart from such artificial causes, chiefly in vulgar use. The more homely therefore the subject and treatment of any poetical work of primitive times, and the closer its connexion with ordinary life, the greater the number of such idioms it would be likely to comprise: and such in fact is the case with the Odyssey as compared with the Iliad. In addition to this greater predominance of old-fashioned phraseology, the number and variety of novel facts and ideas in the former poem, also sufficed to insure a corresponding amount of novelty to its vocabulary. The language of the Odyssey accordingly, while identical in its substantial features, is more or less distinguished from that of the Iliad in both these incidental peculiarities.

1. FROM the tenor of the previous course of this analysis, it will not be expected that the more subtle details of speculative criticism connected with the subject on which we are about to enter, will here receive a degree of attention at all corresponding to the momentous importance attached to them in the popular schools of Homeric criticism.

Treatment of this subject in the modern schools.

That the Iliad and Odyssey, allowing to each poem an original integrity of composition, as a necessary basis of all such inquiries, must yet in the course of their passage to posterity have been subjected both to addition and corruption, is a doctrine which no intelligent critic of the present day will be disposed to question. The state of society which produced them, and which prevailed during the earlier vicissitudes of their history; their subsequent treatment by the native grammarians and editors; the voice of tradition; even the internal evidence of portions of each work; all vouch, in some measure, for the correctness of that doctrine. But the same sound discretion which constrains us to admit the doctrine in theory, will, in the absence of distinct historical data, render us cautious of giving it practical effect. The fallacious and arbitrary nature of the tests by reference to which judgement is here habitually passed in the modern schools, especially of that most popular criterion derived from anomalies in matter or style, has already been abundantly pointed out.¹ Such incongruities, it has been shown, must be inseparable from the productions of human art, as long as imperfection is inherent in human nature. They are indeed, as a general rule, more largely exemplified in original works of the highest order than in those of a secondary class; uniformity being the attribute of mediocrity rather than of greatness. As this rule is in close harmony with the law of nature, it is also amply illustrated by the example, not only of Homer, but of all the other great masters whose genius, in point of native originality, most nearly resembles his own. If anomaly were in itself valid evidence of variety of workmanship, and were the rule to be consistently applied to Dante, Shakspeare, or Milton, what havoc would be the result! The modern critic peruses, in one page of these comparatively polished and artistic poets, a passage of surpassing brilliancy, and in the next a series of heavy commonplaces or trivial conceits, without a suspicion as to their emanating from the stores of the same mind. But no sooner does he discover, in the work of the "rude unlettered bard," the gentlest illustration of the old adage that "Homer occasionally slumbers," than he resorts to the most improbable theories to explain what, far from requiring explanation, would involve a breach of the common law of nature were it otherwise. The same experience however, which proves that every great original work, such as the Iliad or Odyssey, must present varieties of matter or treatment sufficient, by reference to those arbitrary criteria, to insure the condemnation even of genuine portions of its text, equally evinces that an imitator of taste and talent may, in partial instances, produce supplements so closely in harmony with the original as to escape suspicion altogether. In this way it might happen, and has undoubtedly often happened, that by reference to such merely speculative data genuine portions of an author are condemned, while corruptions or interpolations are approved or pass unobserved.

The principle by which this analysis has throughout been guided is different. The fact that Homer habitually treads a path beyond the range of ordinary poets, has been, and will be, held but the more surely to imply that he may at times sink even below their level. Accordingly, wherever the matter or the manner of his composition offered ground of censure, it has in the previous pages been fairly and freely bestowed. Attention has been directed from time to time, to diffuseness in his descriptions or flatness in his dialogues ; to the undue accumulation of battle scenes or of figurative embellishment ; to the offensive features in his portraits of divine character, and to other serious defects in the religious element of his works ; to his occasional indulgence in trifling or unseasonable jests ; and to numerous petty laxities and inconsistencies in his narrative. So far, however, are such improprieties from constituting any necessary evidence of spuriousness in the passages where they occur, that the characteristic similarity of the mode in which they are exemplified may often, with better reason, be urged as proof of the unity, even in its anomalies, of the genius which has been guilty of them. Equally inconclusive, on grounds already also detailed, are the arguments derived from calculations made, and balance struck, of rare or idiomatic words, phrases, grammatical flexions, or metrical forms. Such criteria, at all times fallacious, are more especially so in the case of works composed in a semibarbarous age; at different periods perhaps of a long life; and in an unsettled and fluctuating language.

Its results.

2. In a former page it was remarked that the text of Homer, were effect to be given to the views of his various commentators, might be compared to the picture exposed in public by its author, with a request that each passing dilettante would draw a brush through the part he considered defective; the result of which operation was the effacement of every essential feature of the composition. Following up this illustration, it may here be proper to enumerate some of the more bulky passages of the poems which, in quarters where a certain basis of unity seems still to be acknowledged, are rejected as foreign excrescences or additions. The object will be sufficiently obtained by limiting the citations to the Iliad.

In the earlier portion of the poem, the latter half of the second book, containing the Catalogue of Forces, has been very generally rejected. In the third book, the interview of Priam and Helen on the walls¹, with that between Paris and Helen in her chamber²; and in the sixth, the episode³ of Glaucus and Diomed, with the address of Andromache to Hector¹, have been condemned. Some would discard the entire "Prowess of Diomed,"² comprising the fifth and greater part of the sixth book, or even the whole five books from the third to the seventh, as one great interpolation, subjected in its individual capacity to several smaller ones.³ The eighth⁴ and ninth⁵ books have each been visited with an obelus, while the tenth has been very generally stigmatised. One critic of high rank discards the five books from the eighth to the twelfth⁶ as one great interpolation; subjected, as usual, in its integral capacity, to others of pettier bulk. The episode of the Shield of Achilles⁷, in the eighteenth book, has also been condemned. The last six books of the poem have, on the highest modern authority in these matters, been rejected in the mass, as a later supplement on the foregoing eighteen, of which the original Iliad is supposed to have consisted.⁸ Others pronounce this too great a curtailment, and are satisfied with lopping off the last two books.⁹ A third party, still more moderate, would be satisfied with the last alone¹⁰; and one of the advocates of this view afterwards restricts his verdict to the 128 last lines.¹¹ Others, while retaining these six books in their general extent, reject parts here and there; such as the Battle of the gods, the Funeral games, and the Lament over the body of Hector.¹

It will be observed that several of the passages against which the greater number of voices are united, are precisely such as those accustomed to judge the poems by the old standards of taste, have been used to consider the most excellent and characteristic specimens of their author's style. Such for example are, in the Iliad, the scene on the city walls in the third book; the episode of Glaucus and Diomed in the fifth; the embassy to Achilles in the ninth; the "Shield of Achilles;" and the noble series of pathetic scenes in the last book. If to these be added the eighth, and the latter part of the eleventh book of the *Odyssey*², with some other equally striking texts of inferior bulk in each poem, the result would be a virtual subtraction of the greater number of those passages which constitute the very essence and marrow of the poet's genius; the very idea, as it were, embodied in the term "Homer." To speak of the remainder of his text, thus emasculated, as the genuine substance of his poems, were somewhat as if a commentator on Shakspeare were to premise, as the basis of his labours, that Hamlet, Macbeth, Lear, Richard, and Othello, found no place in his edition of the plays.

Apart however, from such more licentious excursions into what are called, by our German neighbours, the "higher regions of criticism," it were yet unreasonable to deny that anomalies of matter or style, where of a very glaring description, and without any counteracting proofs of originality, may form an important ingredient of negative evidence in questions of this nature. But without some solid basis of historical testimony they can never amount to proof, still less supply foundation for any sweeping general theories. In order therefore to avoid all risk of being drawn into the popular vortex of chimerical speculations, the following remarks will be restricted to those passages of either poem where the stigma, as being sanctioned by respectable native critics, may claim to rest on classical, or even, in so far as grounded on more antient copies of the text, manuscript authority. The few exceptions to this rule will be limited to portions of the text more pointedly cited, in the course of this analysis, as illustrative of the higher attributes of the poet's genius.

3. It is essential to the accurate treatment of this whole matter, that some previous clear estimate should be formed of the degree of deference due to the Alexandrian grammarians and their schools; and more especially, how far their critical distinctions between the gold and the dross in the poems are to be held as representing merely their own conjectures, how far as embodying earlier authority or tradition. That their own editions of the poems were founded on a careful collation of earlier manuscripts procured from different parts of the Hellenic world, is certain. The extent to which they profited by those aids also abundantly appears from the frequent notices, by the scholiasts who have preserved their views, of varieties of reading preferred by them on a balance of such authorities. Of passages expunged by them on the ground of absence from those older MSS., the distinct notices are comparatively few ; nor are their stigmata or "repudiations," so frequently mentioned, often described as based on any such data. These condemnatory verdicts evidently for the most part express but the commentator's own opinion, as to defects or anomalies in matter or style, unworthy, in his judgement, of the poet's genius.¹ In the comparatively few instances where a passage is actually "ejected," the fact is distinctly so stated, in terms different from those merely expressive of condemnation. With regard however to the bulkier passages "condemned" or "repudiated," there is no trace of the censure having been grounded on manuscript authority, still less of its having been practically followed up to the extent of omission from the text, even by the more licentious editors. This forms obviously a strong argument of substantial harmony in the older standard editions of the poems, in regard to these bulkier passages, at the remotest period to which such manuscript evidence is traceable. And that argument is further borne out by the circumstance, that where single verses or shorter passages of either work are expunged by the same Alexandrians, it is stated in various instances¹, that they were so treated on the ground of their finding no place in one or other of those earlier more accredited manuscripts.

The analysis of this shorter class of doubtful texts² supplies some interesting illustrations of the critical method of the Alexandrian masters, and the vicissitudes of the poems in their hands. Zenodotus, the founder of the school, appears by far the most licentious in his treatment of his author. The notices of passages not only censured but discarded³ by him, are much more frequent than in the case of any of his successors. Certain of those passages are said, it is true, to have been wanting in some one or more of the older codices⁴: but the greater part were evidently disposed of without any pretext of manuscript authority, merely from not happening to square with his own particular theories. Nor did he scruple at times to indulge in the still less justifiable license of engrafting new matter of his own on the genuine text.⁵ Similar irregularities are chargeable, though not to an equal extent, on his pupil and successor Aristophanes⁶, a scholar in other respects of superior judgement. Traces also remain of a partial indulgence in such license by Aristarchus, the most distinguished master of the Alexandrian school. The allusions however to any serious tampering with the text on his part, are so rare or so vague, when compared with the notices which tend to prove his discretion and caution, as scarcely to warrant any charge against him of wilful or unauthorised alteration of the genuine reading. It is certain, that passages condemned by him on internal grounds were yet often retained by him in the text, even in cases where his own critical judgement was backed by the absence of those passages from one or more of the accredited antient codices.¹ They were doubtless so retained, because the balance of historical or documentary authority in their favour still appeared to him sufficient to outweigh his own speculative opinion, though partially supported by such authority. It becomes therefore the less probable, that in the few cases where the notices of ejection², insertion³, or alteration⁴ by him, do not happen to be accompanied by any allusion to documentary evidence, his treatment of such passages should have been altogether arbitrary. Of Crates, the rival of Aristarchus, many varieties of reading have been recorded⁵, but without specific notice whether they rested on antient authority or were the fruit of his own conjecture. No allusion occurs to his rejection of genuine or insertion of spurious verses.¹ These varieties in the views or practice of the antient critics, may also partially be traced in corresponding variations of the extant manuscripts. In frequent instances short texts, seldom exceeding four or five lines, contained in one of those manuscripts, are omitted in others. Similar, no doubt, is the case with many of the texts incidentally cited from Homer by antient authors, but no longer extant in his works. Of such apocryphal passages quoted by writers prior to the Alexandrian era, some may have been omitted in the course of the more accurate Alexandrian redaction. Others may have been retained only in certain editions, the various readings of which have not been preserved. Some it is certain belonged neither to the Iliad nor Odyssey, but to the Cyclic poems or other secondary productions of the poet's school.²

The foregoing remarks on the more licentious exercise of their editorial functions by the Alexandrian scholars, apply, as already observed, solely to the shorter passages which, in either poem, supply material for their commentaries. Their verdict, where unfavourable to the bulkier portions of the text similarly called in question by them, appears in no instance to have been grounded on any sort of "diplomatic" evidence, still less to have been enforced to the extent of exclusion from their editions. It represents consequently nothing more than their own speculative opinion ; and to this extent alone can the modern critic be required to defer to it. While paying all due respect to strictly documentary evidence where it can be had, he will, in questions of a purely conjectural nature, claim as full a freedom of judgement in regard to the notoriously unsparing obeli of Zenodotus or Aristarchus, as of Wolf or Heyne.

Dolonea.

4. The only integral portion of the Iliad relative to which there is trace of scepticism among the ancient critics, is the tenth book, or "Dolonea."¹ The extant notices on the subject, being limited to a comment by Eustathius and one other anonymous scholiast, deserve but little attention. The book is certainly, both in point of matter and style, well entitled to the honour of emanating from the genuine Homer. It abounds more especially in spirited passages, essential to the fulness of the poet's descriptions of character.² Nor indeed are its claims disputed even in the notices above cited. It is there acknowledged as an original composition of Homer, but conjectured to have been an after-thought, or supplement, first permanently admitted as an integral part of the Iliad at a later period. This is a hypothesis which, under reasonable restrictions, might be extended to other portions of either poem ; as quite in conformity with the mode in which any great epic work of a primitive age, amid the imperfection of mechanical aids, might naturally, even in the hands of a single author, acquire its harmony of parts or consistency of whole.

What has here been said applies with equal or still greater force to the description of the Shield of Achilles. Achilles, where a similar want of absolute necessary connexion between the previous and subsequent text, from 482. to 609., has supplied a handle to sceptical doubts, exclusively however on the part of modern critics. The arguments in favour of the genuine Homeric origin of this episode, supplied by the distinctive Homeric style of its composition, have been elsewhere considered. They are, it may be added, singularly corroborated by the miserable inferiority of the earliest and most celebrated attempt to emulate its excellence, the Hesiodic "Shield of Hercules." But even the position of the episode, and its connexion with the main text, the very points which have been most objected to, imply, in so far as the fundamental laws of correct composition can form a rule of judgment¹, that some description, of similar bulk and tendency, must here have found place. It is hardly credible that any poet of ordinary taste or discretion, would have been at pains to accumulate so formidable a mass of prologue to so meagre a sequel of principal matter as would remain, were the descriptive part of the episode rejected. The long preliminary notice of the visit of Thetis to Olympus, and her interview with Vulcan; the detailed account of the workshop, instruments, machinery, person, and equipment of the god; of his studied preparation for some great and elaborate work, and of the number and variety of the precious materials he employs,—could never have been meant to end in nothing but a simple statement, in ten lines, of the fact of his having made a shield, helmet, and coat of mail for the hero. Let any impartial reader try the experiment. Let him discard the 125 lines from 483. to 608., and read the text thus curtailed from 369. to the end of the book, in continuous order. He will at once be sensible of something wretchedly jejune and issueless in the whole description. The last ten lines will infallibly strike him as a most impotent conclusion to so tantalising an exordium. The argument may here safely be reversed. Had no specific account been given of the actual produce of so much divine labour and ingenuity, expended on such a profusion of metallic treasures, there might indeed have been plausible ground to surmise some grievous hiatus in the original text.¹

Last book.

The last book of the Iliad has also been rejected in the modern schools alone, and exclusively on speculative grounds. Little need here be added to what has elsewhere been incidentally urged upon this point. The poetical necessity of the transactions narrated in the concluding canto, as a winding up of the great drama of the Iliad, appears so absolute and so obvious², that, whatever may be the case with that section of the modern school who consider the whole poem as a patchwork, it is difficult to understand how those who admit its substantial unity of plan, can yet deliberately cast away this apex or head corner-stone of its perfection. To have parted with Achilles, immersed in the vortex of vindictive passions in which he is left at the close of the previous narrative, were a complete sacrifice of the crowning excellence of his character, his generosity. It would have equally destroyed, consequently, that moral unity between the portrait of the hero and the conduct of the action, which now constitutes the noblest attribute of the poem. The very notion indeed, of any poet finishing off a grand heroic epopee, by leaving one of his two best and bravest warriors a mangled corpse in the hostile camp, and the other engaged in the daily work of its mutilation, is something almost too monstrous to contemplate! ¹

5. The first integral part of the Odyssey against which any serious charge has been brought, is the song of the Phæacian bard Demodocus in the eighth book. The objections, on the part of the antients, here consist but in an obscure hint from the scholiast of Aristophanes.² To modern critics few passages have afforded a more frequent, and perhaps a more plausible theme of sceptical commentary.³ The chief arguments urged against it are: I. The impropriety of introducing a musician reciting a poem as the accompaniment of a dance; unless the dance itself were a pantomimic representation of the subject of the poem. II. The variation from the genuine mythology of Homer, Vulcan's wife being here Venus, while in the Iliad she is one of the Graces. III. The occurrence of words and phrases not observable elsewhere in either poem. It seems strange that the first objection, or rather the distinction on which it is based, should have occurred to any critic familiar with the state of the musical and poetical arts as represented in the poet's works. The song, in every primitive age, is an accompaniment of the dance; and where there was a song there were also words.¹ That such was the case in Homer's time is proved by numerous passages, where the only difference is that the words of the song do not happen, as in the present instance, to be given. Wherever a bard is represented engaged in his vocation, whether for the purpose of enlivening a banquet or leading a chorus, he sings to his harp; and rarely is there wanting some more or less specific notice of the subject of his lay.² So far therefore is the song itself, in the case of Demodocus, from being out of place, that its omission would have been repugnant to national usage. As to its style, there are few portions certainly of either poem which, in this department of composition, are more worthy of the varied powers of Homer's art, or more completely in the spirit of the Odyssey, and the lively fantastic audience. The objection above stated to the omission of "the Shield" in the Iliad, here also applies. That the poet, in his anxiety to give effect to this orchestric exhibition, after expressly sending for Demodocus to take his share in the performance, and dwelling so minutely on the other details of the ceremony, should omit all further notice of the minstrel's mode of acquitting himself, were no way consistent with his usual practice.

The argument based on conflicting mythology, even if in itself well founded, would admit of one very obvious answer, that it is not Homer, but the Phæacian court poet, who indites the song. Attention has elsewhere been directed to the popular error of holding Homer personally responsible for whatever he puts into the mouth of his speakers. It were very unreasonable to make him individually answerable for the accuracy of all the details even of national legend, human or divine, which may, from time to time, have been promulgated by the different organs of that legend in the course of the action. With still less justice can he be called to account for variations from the pure Hellenic mythology, placed in the mouth of a minstrel belonging to a race inhabiting a different world, and remarkable for their fantastical gasconading disposition. But in fact the two passages of the Iliad and Odyssey, whether representing the mythological tenets of the same or of different "authors," will be found, if impartially judged, to be in close harmony with each other. In this episode Venus appears, no doubt, as the wife of Vulcan. But the whole point of the story is her infidelity to her nuptial vows. The injured husband expressly declares his intention of divorcing her; or, as it is worded, "sending her back to her father Jupiter; and receiving in return the purchase money originally paid for her." He even refuses to release her from her durance, until Neptune becomes surety to him for Jove's fulfilment of his share in this agreement. The mythological fact therefore conveyed in this ballad is, that Vulcan of old divorced his wife

Venus, on account of her adultery with Mars. Where then is the anomaly in the same poet's introducing the same Vulcan, at a later period, as husband of another wife; while Venus his faithless consort continues to cohabit with Mars, as she does throughout the Iliad? It matters not here what may have been the version of Vulcan's matrimonial history received in the later mythology, on which the Separatist argument rests. It is with Homer alone that we have to do; and the Homer of the Iliad is in complete harmony with the Homer of the Odyssey. The anomaly is on the part of the latter fable, which assumed Vulcan to have remained the husband of Venus after divorcing her for adultery.¹

6. A still more fatal importance would attach to the charge of interpolation, if established against another integral portion of the Odyssey, the latter part of the Necromancy, or Descent to Hades. The imputation here acquires weight from the sanction of Aristarchus.² His arguments however, as stated by his quoters, are so trivial or farfetched, as to be altogether insignificant when weighed in the balance against the opposite verdict of other distinguished critics, antient and modern, by whom the passage has been justly cited as one essentially linked with the individuality as well as excellence of the poet's genius.¹ A reference indeed to the striking parallels traced in the foregoing pages, between various parts of the supposed interpolation² and other equally characteristic texts of the two poems, might seem in itself to establish a claim to genuine origin.

The objections of Aristarchus and his modern supporters, turn chiefly on the defective nature of the mechanical cohesion between these sixty verses and the framework in which they are encased. His argument is, in fact, the same hackneyed charge of self-contradiction already examined in a former chapter. It will be necessary, in order rightly to estimate the value of that argument in its application to the present case, to have clearly before us the more important previous question, as to the epic spirit and connexion of the general context in its existing form, as compared with that which it would assume were the passage in question to be removed.

The poet's object in carrying his hero down to Hades may be considered in a twofold point of view, historical and poetical. The historical scope of the episode was to enable Ulysses to obtain information from Tiresias as to his own future lot. The poetical scope was to enliven the poem by the visions of wonder and terror which the infernal regions presented. The last motive may certainly be assumed as the more weighty of the two. The prophecies of Tiresias have really no vital bearing on the action of the poem. They could in themselves therefore offer no sufficient inducement to such an enterprise. If, on the other hand, the disputed portion of the episode were to be struck out, its poetical value would be lamentably affected. Not merely are the visions there described the only objects of essentially Tartarean wonder or terror which the narrative comprises, but have always been considered the most awful and striking in the realms of Pluto. To have omitted their description would have been a sacrifice of nearly the whole pith and marrow of any such adventure.

Another little less glaring anomaly which this omission would involve would be, that the only inhabitants of the other world considered worthy of attention by the poet, solely on account of their celebrity on earth, would be women. If we except the heroes and heroine more immediately connected by blood or friendship with Ulysses, his mother Anticlea, and his fellow-warriors, Agamemnon, Achilles, Ajax, and Elpenor, his whole time would have been occupied in passing in review the ghosts of some thirteen females, in none of whom he had any immediate personal interest. While common probability seems thus to demand the introduction of a proportional number of the older male inhabitants of Erebus, the same inference results from the epic connexion of the narrative. Ulysses, on concluding what may be called the actual business of his expedition, his conference with Tiresias, first invokes and converses with his mother Anticlea. As the ghost nearest and dearest to him is a female, her appearance naturally suggests a preference of the same sex, in passing on to the Manes of those less nearly connected with him. In regard to the male spirits, a similar order is observed. He first sees and converses with the souls of his own friends and contemporaries, and then follow, in corresponding order, the other male worthies of more antient celebrity.

7. Let us now consider how far these higher poetical or historical criteria, are counterbalanced by the Aristarchean objections founded on the mere mechanical cohesion of the passage. "Ulysses," it has been urged, "is described, at the commencement of the adventure, as not himself entering the habitation of departed souls, but, remaining on the 'outskirts of Erebus,' he conjures them 'out of the House of Hades.' Accordingly the spirits, in the early portion of the hero's visit, are described as coming forth in succession to taste the blood and converse with him, and then as retiring, in the same order, 'into the House of Hades.' In the sequel however, immediately after his interview with Ajax (568., where the supposed interpolation commences), he is suddenly found, without any notice of his having advanced or changed his ground, himself exploring the recesses of the Mansion of Pluto; or," it has been ironically asked by Aristarchus¹ and his followers², "are we to suppose that Minos with his tribunal, Tityus with his nine roods of land, Tantalus with his lake, and Sisyphus with his mountain, were all conjured up like the rest for the hero's inspection?"

where it has been proved by numerous examples, that such occasional vagueness or incongruity in the order of the poet's narrative, is so familiar a characteristic of his style, as to constitute quite as good an argument of the genuine character of the passage, as the methodical precision which it is here proposed to exact. The question of Aristarchus might therefore be satisfactorily answered by asking in return: Are we to suppose that Polyphemus heard the speech of Ulysses uttered at twice the distance to which the sound of a human voice could penetrate? or that the sun set twice in the same evening in Scheria, or rose twice in the same morning in Ithaca? Many similar, equally hypercritical questions might be accumulated. But a more accurate consideration of the passage in its relation to the previous context will show, that the mechanical incoherence here imputed, if such it be, affects far too extensive a range of the poem to admit, even conceding the validity of such arguments, of their being so exclusively concentrated against these forty verses.

Circe, in her instructions delivered to Ulysses in the previous book, orders him to leave his vessel on the shore of ocean, and advance alone, "into the House of Hades,"¹ there to perform the requisite enchantments, turning "towards Erebus;" and the ghosts, she adds, will come forth at his command. In the sequel accordingly, he is described as disembarking and repairing to the "place appointed by Circe"² (viz. within the House of Hades), where he conjures up the souls "out of Erebus."³ First Elpenor appears, and supplicates the hero, on returning "out of the House of Hades"⁴ (Ulysses, therefore, was now himself within it) to the upper world, to perform the just obsequies to his corpse. Tiresias then comes forth, and at the conclusion of his interview returns "within the House of Hades";¹ (Ulysses, therefore, must here be without it). Afterwards appear in succession the hero's mother, the other thirteen females, and his own comrades of Troy; the last of whom, Ajax, retreats "into Erebus." Thither Ulysses declares he would have followed him, but for his anxiety to see the ghosts of other heroes. In the sequel accordingly he passes in review the further series of male spirits, ending with Hercules, who is also described as retiring, after his dialogue, "within the House of Hades."

It is plain then from the foregoing summary, that by reference to the rigid Aristarchean test of uniformity, whatever self-contradiction exists in this series of passages, affects equally the whole text from v. 512. of the tenth book to the conclusion of the eleventh. But there is really no incongruity whatever. The term House or Abode (δόμος, οἶκος), is here obviously used, according to the familiar idiom of the Greek as of most other languages, both in a general and a specific sense.² In the former sense, it denotes the whole infernal abode or dwellingplace of the Tartarean deities, and of departed mortals, comprising, together with the "place appointed by Circe," the Asphodel Meadow, Erebus, the Tribunal of Minos, and the scene of punishment of Tityus, Tantalus, and Sisyphus. The hero therefore, after having disembarassed himself of the crowd of ghosts who surrounded him on his first arrival, was free to inspect such objects of wonder or terror, distant or near, as were accessible to his view. That Homer has not described the particular place or manner of this inspection, can form no difficulty with those who understand and appreciate the free genius of his style of narrative, abounding, as it does, in examples of similar licence. The occasional use of the term δῶμον "Αἴδος εἶσω in a more limited sense, alludes plainly either to the actual interior of the palace of Pluto, or to the inner and more distant recesses of Erebus, into which the souls retire, but whither Ulysses is not permitted to follow them.

Virgil and Dante.

A curious and interesting illustration of what has been said, here and elsewhere, regarding Anomaly as a characteristic of the higher epic genius, is supplied by the fact, that each of the two next greatest poets who have in different ages treated this subject, have been guilty of a real inconsistency very similar to that here imputed to Homer. With Virgil, Æneas descends into Hades through a dark cavern, which without obstacle conducts him at once "into the mansion of Pluto."¹ In the sequel, however, he is described as not yet arrived at the outer vestibule of the same infernal abode : 273. sqq.

where he is obliged to make good a passage through a legion of monsters. Now at least we are led to assume that he is safely housed in the palace ; yet, after a hundred and fifty lines descriptive of its inhabitants, we find that he is not yet across the threshold ; nor can his entrance be effected (424.) until the porter

Cerberus is bribed over to his interest. A similar, though not quite so serious confusion is observable in Dante's topography of the "Inferno."¹ Here again the rule should either be made general, or the primitive bard should enjoy the same privilege of exemption as his more civilised successors.

8. The last and largest portion of the Odyssey, the genuine character of which has been questioned by the antients, and where a rational scepticism finds the most legitimate exercise, comprises the whole concluding book of the poem, with a considerable portion of that which precedes. Aristarchus and Aristophanes pronounced the 296th verse of the xxiiird book, where Ulysses and Penelope after their recognition retire for the night, to be the end of the Odyssey. This verdict however must be understood, as in other similar cases, to intimate merely what, in the judgement of the critics, would have been the most appropriate termination of the action; not what either tradition, manuscript, or even perhaps internal evidence, authorised them to assume was the form in which the poem was originally composed.²

of the

It cannot indeed be denied that the latter portion of the Odyssey, from the destruction of the suitors downwards, not only contains a larger portion of jejune and tedious matter than perhaps the whole remaining text of either poem, but is absolutely deficient in the essential requisites of an appropriate consummation. Had the narrative been wound up by a simple recognition between the hero, his wife, and father, respectively, on the understanding that the destruction of his domestic enemies was a complete settlement of his affairs, the Odyssey would unquestionably, on mere grounds of speculative criticism, have been a more perfect work. The long episode of the suitors' descent to Hades, with its diffuse and pointless dialogues, and the campaign between Ulysses and his contumacious vassals, are not only tedious and uninteresting in themselves, but a sore weight on the proverbial eagerness with which the mind, in the perusal of an eventful narrative, hastens, after the main catastrophe is over, to the conclusion.

² This seems further evident from the circumstance, that all the specific arguments of Aristarchus in favour of the proposed curtailment, as cited in detail by the Scholiasts, affect exclusively the Psychopompia, or first 204 lines of book xxiv. He is also, in the same citation (Schol. ad ver. 1.), pointedly described as having condemned this particular passage in its individual capacity, as an interpolation; which would imply that he considered the remainder of the text with which it is connected to be objectionable on poetical grounds alone.

Admitting however that the action as it now stands has been unduly spun out, it is yet difficult to see how, consistently with either historical or poetical propriety, it could have been broken off in the manner proposed by the Alexandrian critics.¹ Throughout the previous series of occurrences, it is plainly implied that the destruction of the suitors insured no immediate peaceful settlement of the hero's affairs, but that other momentous difficulties remained to be encountered, from the resentment of their friends and dependants. The reconciliation of the royal family with their discontented vassals was indispensable to the proper winding up of the action. Had Homer meant to conclude his narrative with v. 296. of book xxiii., he could hardly have composed vv. 117. sqq. 137. sqq. of the same book. The recognition between Ulysses and his father Laertes, is also both poetically and historically indispensable. The poet could never have broken off without relieving the old king from his life of squalid misery at his hut in the country, and admitting him to a share of the joy and prosperity to which his family and dominions had been restored. The only portion of this concluding stage of the narrative presenting no such necessary bond of union with its previous details, is the Psychopompia (xxiv. 1—204.), an episode which is also, in itself, the most defective passage of the whole poem. Its amputation therefore, which some have proposed as a middle course, need cause little concern, either to the admirers of the poet's genius or the defenders of the unity of the poems. As to the remainder of the disputed text, the safest inference that can be drawn from existing criteria is, that the good Homer, according to the proverb, has slumbered towards the close of his great and laborious task.

¹ Even allowing a general plausibility to their more sweeping scheme of curtailment, it would yet be difficult to agree to its precise limits, excluding, as it would, one of the most characteristic and truly Homeric passages in either poem, and quoted as such by Aristotle, the hero's recapitulation of his adventures to Penelope on retiring to rest. This passage indeed, far from detrimental, would be highly conducive to the propriety of the suggested conclusion. The conciseness and rapidity of the hero's narrative, tempered by the easy harmonious flow of the versification, with the gradual and gentle interruption at the close by supervening slumber, seem to dramatise, as it were, that lulling effect which the poet evidently meant to produce on the senses of the speaker, the listener, and the reader. Aristot. Rhet. iii. 16. Conf. Plutarch, Vit. Hom. ii. 74.

tradition and internal evidence of
the poems.

1. ON first entering upon the subject of the Homeric poems it was remarked, that while by the prevailing usage of literary history, the biographical notice of a writer ought to precede the critical estimate of his works, an opposite course was required in the case of Homer, where the analysis of the poems affords the only sound criteria for judging of the age, birthplace, or destinies of the author. The result of that analysis has been, it is hoped, to place in a preferable light the antient opinion, that the Iliad and Odyssey are, each in its substantial integrity, the production of the same poet; or, if an absolute sameness of person be disputed, of poets so identical in genius and character as to warrant the adoption, as the basis of the present inquiry, of a single epoch, a single birthplace, and a single Homer.

To the further inquiry who that Homer was, what that epoch or birthplace, the same general answer still presents itself, that it is to his works alone that we have to look for any authentic data on the subject: and this maxim is usually followed up by another, to the very discouraging effect, that throughout both poems, Homer with characteristic modesty, has abstained from all notice whatever of himself or his concerns. Both these rules however, though in a general sense perhaps correct, may admit of exception, or at least of modification. With regard to the second of the two it must be remembered, that a want of accurate knowledge from external sources of the particulars of Homer's history, precludes in a great degree the means of judging what amount of allusion to his own affairs his works may contain. Even the most egotistical epic poets rarely favour their readers, in their verse, with any plain statements on the subject of their nativity or fortunes. Such notices are usually introduced indirectly, or through the figurative medium of the events and persons described. They require consequently, as a key to their right understanding, some previous knowledge of the facts from other sources. Were there for example any solid ground of belief that Homer, as tradition describes him, was blind, it might fairly be conjectured that he has figured his own lot in that of the blind Phæacian bard Demodocus, so prominently put forward in the Odyssey. Or to take a broader case of illustration, were the theory admitted, which has found favour in fanciful quarters, that Ulysses himself was Homer¹, far from being silent on his own affairs, he would of all poets be most open to the charge of garrulity. There may then, even upon a rational view of the question, be much of his personal history interwoven with his fable; and the ignorance in which posterity remains may be owing, not so much to his own modesty as to our inability to detect his vanity. In the absence however of such external data for our guidance, any conjectural knowledge to be extracted from his text, will be more likely to bear on the country or times in which he composed, than on his own person or destinies.

The other axiom, that it is exclusively from internal sources that any satisfactory light on his history can be expected, must also be taken with some limitation. It proceeds upon the supposition that the popular accounts of his life are fabulous. But even admitting this, it does not follow that they should be totally false, nor, consequently, that some approximation to fact may not be attainable through their medium. There are two modes in which such narratives may be turned to historical account. First: they may contain some element of positive truth as a nucleus for the mythical appendages. Secondly: they may convey, apart from any such more solid basis of reality, the substance of the opinions which their promulgators had been led to form, by a joint estimate of the internal evidence of the poems, and of the current tradition of a period nearer the age which produced them. It is chiefly or solely in the latter respect that aid is to be hoped from Homer's legendary biographers.

Should these two branches of evidence, internal and traditional, be found in general harmony with each other, they will supply as near an approach to a historical result as can be expected in a case of the kind. The simplest mode of conducting the inquiry will be, first, to have clearly before us the substance of the popular accounts; secondly, to test their value by the text of the poems. As the several versions of the Legend of Homer, however differing in their details, are essentially agreed on certain more fundamental points, it becomes the less material which variety be selected as the standard text or vulgate. A preference will here be given to the biography which passes current under the name of Herodotus, as embodying to all appearance the oldest, as well as the most comprehensive stock of materials.¹

2. Among the adventurers who took part in the settlement of Cuma in Æolia, about 150 years after the fall of Troy, was Melanopus of Magnesia in Thessaly, son of Ithagenes, son of Criton. This Melanopus, dying in narrow circumstances, left an only daughter Critheïs, to the care of a friend and fellow-colonist, Cleanax, by birth an Argive. The damsel, on approaching woman's estate, was found to be with child. Cleanax, vexed and ashamed at the condition of his ward, determined to remove her from home. For this purpose he committed her to the charge of a friend, Ismenias of Bœotia, then about to join in the foundation of Smyrna, with a body of Cumæans led by a Thessalian chief. Soon after her settlement in her new residence, Critheïs, while taking part in a festival on the banks of the river Meles in the neighbourhood of the city, was seized with her pains, and gave birth to a son. The boy, from his place of nativity, received the name of Melesigenes, afterwards exchanged for that of Homer. Critheïs soon after quitted the house of Ismenias, and, desirous of supporting herself by her own industry, entered the service of Phemius, a teacher of music and letters. So exemplary was her conduct in this new position, as to induce her master to place her at the head of his household; and Melesigenes, displaying, as he advanced in years, a superior genius, with many amiable qualities, was adopted by him as his son, and provided with a liberal education. About the period of his reaching manhood, the young poet lost his mother; and shortly after Phemius also died, bequeathing his property and school¹ to Melesigenes.

Myth.), contains some valuable commentaries on the poet's style. Three shorter lives, one of which is a different version of that by Proclus, are prefixed to the Tract of Leo Allatius de Patr. Hom. Another is comprised in the Agon, or "Contest," of Homer and Hesiod, usually appended to the editions of the latter poet. A short but valuable sketch is given in the Catalog. MSS. Græc. Bibl. Matrit. t. i. p. 233.; and similar compendia are preserved by Suidas and other compilers of the same class. These documents, however late their own composition, derive value from their copious citations of early writers of eminence, from Pindar and Hellanicus downwards.

Such was the reputation of his genius even at this early age, that he was already an object of curiosity to foreigners visiting the port. Among these was a merchant named Mentès, of Leucadia in the Ionian Gulf, who persuaded the youth to accompany him on a voyage in the Western Mediterranean. After trafficking on the coasts of Tyrrenia and Iberia, during which time the poet took careful note of every new and curious object, they arrived in Ithaca. Here Melesigenes was attacked by ophthalmia.² Mentès, under the necessity of continuing his course to Leucadia, consigned him to the care of a benevolent friend, named Mentor. While resident in the island, he learned all the particulars of the life of Ulysses. On the return of Mentès he reembarked and sailed to Colophon, where in a relapse of his complaint he lost his eyesight. Returning after this misfortune to his native city Smyrna, he made his first essays in poetry. But his affairs not prospering, he determined, in the hope of bettering himself, to migrate to Cuma. On his way thither, passing through Neonteichos, another Cumæan colony, he was so kindly received and entertained by one Tychius a leather-cutter, that he remained for some time in his house. Here he composed the Thebais and Hymns. The Neonteichians afterwards used to show the spot where he sat and recited his verses. In the sequel becoming less pleased with his condition among them, he prosecuted his journey to Cuma, and on his way through Larissa composed his epitaph on Midas king of Phrygia. In Cuma he carried on his rehearsals with the same applause as elsewhere. His offer however to settle there, and render the city illustrious by his muse, on condition of support at the public expense, was declined by the citizens. It was here that the surname of Homeros¹, or the "Blind man," first superseded in familiar use his youthful appellation of Melesigenes.

Leaving Cuma, he next established himself at Phocæa, where, pinched by want, he bargained with a citizen named Thestorides for his maintenance, on condition of his composing certain poems, to be made over in return to his patron, together with the benefits of their recital. These works were the Little Iliad and the Phocæia. Soon after, Thestorides left Phocæa and settled at Chios, where he passed off the poems as his own. Homer, on being apprised of this act of treachery, immediately set out for Chios by way of Erythræ. Unable to procure a passage by sea from that port, he wandered into the surrounding country, and after various adventures was engaged by Chius, a wealthy citizen of the town of Bolissus, as tutor to his sons. Here he composed the Cercopes, Battle of Frogs and Mice, Epikichlides, and other minor poems. On quitting Bolissus, he carried into effect his original intention of visiting Chios, from which city Thestorides, on hearing of his arrival, retired. During his residence in Chios he composed the Iliad and Odyssey, repaying his debt of gratitude to his antient benefactors, Mentes, Mentor, Phemius, and Tychius, by immortalising their names in the text of these his two greatest works. His genius now procured him both wealth and honours. He married and became the father of two daughters, one of whom died young; the other he betrothed to a citizen of the town. His fame had by this time spread into Continental Greece, and he yielded to the pressing invitations he had received to visit that country. Touching at Samos on his way, he composed the Caminius, or Potter's oven.² The vessel continuing its course to Athens, next put in at the small isle of Ios, where the poet's voyage was brought to a sudden and fatal termination by his equally sudden illness and death. His remains were consigned to earth on the shore of the island.

Among the variations of this story, as embodied in other text-books, the most popular is that in which the poet's mother is described as a native of Ios, the islet of the Cyclad group celebrated in every variety of his history as the place of his death and sepulture. This account, which may be called the Ionian version of the Æolian legend, derives importance from the sanction of Aristotle.¹ Its remaining details differ little in substance from those of the Cumæan tradition. The maiden is impregnated by a divinity unknown. Wandering disconsolate on the shore of her native island, she is carried off by pirates to Smyrna then a Lydian town, and sold to king Mæon, who captivated by her beauty espouses her, and adopts as his own the son of whom she is delivered, as above, on the banks of Meles. Driven from Smyrna when occupied by neighbouring tribes of Æolians, the poet takes refuge in Ios the native island of his mother, where he is hospitably received and entertained by a citizen called Creophilus.² Here

¹ In Vit. Plutarch. i. 3. This version helps, remarkably enough, to set aside Strabo's account (xiv. p. 633.) of a primitive Ionian foundation of Smyrna by colonists from Ephesus, afterwards ejected by the Æolian settlers from Cuma. For in the Aristotelian legend, the Lydian aborigines of Smyrna are dispossessed at once, not by Ionians but by Æolians. Strabo's tradition may safely be pronounced a local fiction, invented to favour the pretensions of the Ionian Confederacy to the old Æolian metropolis, during the subsequent struggles for its possession. Herodotus knows nothing of any such story; and had Aristotle and Aristarchus, or whoever may have been the first propounder of the Iete version of the poet's nativity, believed in any such, they would never have shaped their own tradition as above. In fact, in that tradition, the Ionian colonies were not yet founded at the period of the poet's birth. (Vit. Plut. ibid.) In the genuine legend, the antient Smyrna and its river Meles are purely and exclusively Æolian. See Welck. Ep. Cyc. pt. i. p. 142. sqq. 187.; conf. Müll. Hist. of Gr. Lit. vol. i. p. 43.

² This Creophilus is a person of some celebrity in the mythical history of Homer, from the time of Plato (Rep. p. 600.) downwards; sometimes as son-in-law, sometimes as friend or patron, sometimes even as preceptor of the poet. In the more popular version of his own history he is called a Samian (elsewhere a Chian), and transmitted his name to a he composes his Siege of Œchalia, with which as a mark of gratitude he presents his host, and dies not long afterwards. The Homeric pedigree is carried back by several of these authorities to Apollo, through a long line of fabulous ancestors, comprising most of the principal poets and musicians of primeval celebrity.¹

3. It need scarcely be remarked that throughout this tradition, as in the subsequent schools of criticism, the term "Homer" represents not merely a single poet, inventor and perfecter of the heroic style of epic composition, and author of its two greatest masterpieces, but the genius or eponymus of this higher epic style during its flourishing era. In this latter figurative capacity, Homer appears either as the author or originator of most of the great works modelled after the design of the Iliad and Odyssey, concerning the real origin of which no very positive notices were extant. The historical substance therefore, if any there be, in the above biography, is, that the original poet was a denizen of one of the early Æolian colonies on the north-eastern coast of Asia Minor. His journeys school of Homeric literature in Samos, similar to that of the Homeridæ in Chios. He himself obtained credit, as will appear in the next chapter, for the authorship of several Homeric poems. He is also celebrated as the person from whom Lycurgus obtained the copy of the Iliad and Odyssey promulgated by him in Sparta (Aristot. ap. Heraclid. frg. II. ed. Schneidewin). The name is usually written Creophylus; but the form here adopted is that authorised by Plato, and probably other earlier writers on the poet's history, whose text has been very improperly altered to accommodate it to the later usage. The form Creophylus appears to have originated mainly in an attempt to give etymological value to the title of the tribe or gens (φυλῆς) of the "Creophylians," or reputed descendants of the owner of the name; partly perhaps in the metrical convenience of epigrammatic writers. See Welck. op. cit. p. 219. sqq. 226.

from country to country and city to city, in the course of which his numerous works were composed, indicate, unless in so far as necessary even in his single person to acquire his extensive stock of geographical knowledge, the spread of his art through those regions where it continued chiefly to flourish, or where its more popular secondary specimens were produced. His ultimate settlement, marriage, admission to municipal rights, and composition of his two greatest works in Chios, may, on the same principle of interpretation, be held as figurative of the subsequent zeal of that city for the cultivation and preservation of his poems.

The Æolian legend is also embodied in the fabulous genealogy of the Lesbian Terpander¹, the great Æolian master and originator of the Greek school of scientific music, in the first century of the Olympic era. The descent of that artist is there deduced from both Homer and Hesiod. The Æolian character of the latter poet is ascertained, and in the popular legend he and Homer are described as first cousins², through their common Cumæan kindred. Similar in spirit is the tradition of the head and lyre of the Æolo-Thracian Orpheus floating across the Ægæan, in one version to Lesbos, in another to the mouth of the river Meles³ the birthplace of Homer, as symbolic of the passage of song from Western to Eastern Hellas with the Æolian migration. The very early connexion between the legend of Homer's birth and this Smyr-næan river, is further evinced by an extant epigram

The other claims on the poet's nativity cannot, either in point of antiquity or inherent probability, enter into any reasonable competition with the Æolian legend. They seem, for the most part, to originate in some fanciful inference from facts or allusions contained in the various poems, genuine or spurious, as to a partiality of their author for the city in favour of which the honour was asserted. It was natural that the cities of Asia in which secondary works of the school were produced, or where they enjoyed popularity, should, amid the general doubt on the subject, also aspire to be the birthplace and residence of their eponyme author. His Ithacan predilections afforded a natural opening to the pretensions of that favoured island. In the same way he became a Thessalian in honour of Achilles; an Argive in compliment to Agamemnon and Diomed; a native of Cyprus in respect of the Cypria; a Colophonian on the strength of the Margites, where Colophon was celebrated. The pretensions of Athens², and even Egypt, can hardly imply any thing more than the proverbial title of those two regions in later times, to have originated, directly or indirectly, every thing great or excellent in Grecian art and literature.³

² Favoured by Aristarchus (*Vit. Hom. Rival
Ionia.

In spite of this general concurrence of the best accredited tradition, backed as will be shown by the internal evidence of the poems, the claims of Æolia upon Homer's nativity have been in a great degree set aside and overlooked, both in the antient and modern schools, in favour of the purely speculative opinion, that he was a native of the Ionian colonies established at a later period, farther to the south on the same line of coast. Hence the phrases, "Ionian poet," "bard of Chios¹," and the like, have become inveterate in popular use, as synonymous with the name Homer. This may be attributed to various causes; the chief of which perhaps is the circumstance already noticed, that the poems were from a very early period extensively cultivated, adopted as it were, and endowed with the rights of citizenship by the Ionian states. Chios in particular boasted from a remote period of a race called Homeridæ, who claimed descent from the poet, and professed a peculiar devotion to his Muse.² The precise character of this fraternity, whether their poetical functions were derived from their name, or the name from their office and assumed ancestor, is doubtful; but the fact of their existence could not but be highly propitious, in later times, to the pretensions advanced by Chios to the much contested honour of Homer's nativity. The ascendancy of the Ionians in wealth, art, and civilisation, at the period when the poet's history and works first became subject of critical attention, would also favour their efforts to appropriate to themselves an Asiatic author whose origin was at the best doubtful. The early destruction, on the other hand, of Smyrna, around which the Æolian legends were concentrated, as were those of Ionia around Chios, with the subsequent transference of the former city, when restored, from the Æolic to the Ionian confederacy¹, would be as detrimental to the claims of Æolia as advantageous to those of the rival district. With this amount of circumstantial evidence in favour of Chios, it becomes the more worthy of remark, in corroboration of the Æolian legend, that even the Chian traditions hardly advance any serious claim, beyond that of hospitable reception and protection, on the bard of Smyrna. His Æolian nativity they both admit and inculcate.²

4. It will now be proper to test these traditional data by those derived from the poet's works, and which appear equally conclusive in favour of the Æolian Homer. Some trite arguments have, however, been borrowed from the same source, in support of the claims of Ionia. The familiar title of Ionic, which a certain general resemblance to the cultivated Ionic of later times obtained for the poet's dialect, naturally led to its being classed in the popular text-books as itself of Ionian origin. In modern times it has also been customary to characterise its poetical attributes as the offspring of the lively versatile genius, refined manners, and joyous habits, which distinguished the Ionian colonies towards the commencement of the Olympic era.¹ The poet therefore, who first carried to perfection the branch of composition in which that dialect chiefly excelled, was himself naturally presumed to be a native Ionian. This doctrine has now lost much of its credit in more critical quarters. That the poetical culture of a language is in itself a necessary, or even an ordinary concomitant of rapidly advancing social refinement, is in itself a questionable theory. But the dialect of Homer is marked by other features besides those of musical or metrical culture; features which, while no less characteristic of its true genius, are not certainly favourable to the above explanation of its rise and formation. It is distinguished by a native simplicity and energy, which bespeak a martial vigour or even ferocity in the race among whom it flourished, not very compatible with the seductive effects of a soft climate and luxurious habits. But independantly of these considerations, there are few better attested facts in the early history of the Greek language, than that the dialect which the Ionian colonists spoke during the earlier more flourishing part of their career, was substantially the same which they brought with them from the mother country. It must therefore, even if identical with that of the Homeric poems, which is by no means established, have been of primitive European not of Asiatic formation. The language common to the whole race while united, could not be the invention of a portion of it after their separation. The affinity appears also to have maintained its ground long after that separation. Greek historians and geographers are agreed as to the fact, that the older Attic dialect and that of the Ionian colonies were, down to a comparatively late period, the same or closely similar: and this similarity is traced by the same authorities to its true and only possible cause, that the two dialects were originally one common idiom, transferred by the Ionian settlers from Attica and Northern Peloponnesus to Asia.¹

At an early stage of this history it was observed, that according to the most probable, or indeed only critical view, the Homeric dialect had its origin in European Greece prior to the Dorian invasion. It was the common language of poetry during the heroic age of Hellas, formed and matured under the race of kings celebrated in the Iliad and Odyssey. Hence one of its familiar properties is that of combining, in pristine simplicity of form, many of those idioms which, on the subsequent spread of literary culture are found peculiar to other dialects. After attaining its maturity in Continental Greece it was transported to Asia, where it was carried to its highest perfection by Homer. That its original formation dates from the more remote period, is further proved by the fact, that even after the downfall of the Achæan or Pelopidan empire, it still maintained its former privilege throughout Continental Greece, as the dialect of all the higher branches of composition. The oracles were habitually delivered in it; the national poets every where continued to employ it, occasionally under slight modifications derived from their native idiom. The dialect of Hesiod for example, (the author of the Works and Days,) a native of Bœotia, a poet of purest Æolian birth and habits, and of nearly as antient date probably as Homer, is, with the exception of one or two local Bœotian forms, identical with the Homeric. That the influence of Ionian dialectical refinement could at this early period have extended across the Ægæan, to the rugged ridges of Helicon or the recesses of the Pythian sanctuary, cannot reasonably be supposed. Hesiod himself tells us that he had never crossed the Ægæan. His poetical idiom was therefore as much his birthright, and that of the numerous race of European authors who inherited his name, as of any one of the bards of Chios or Colophon. The same holds good of other districts of Hellas no way connected with the Asiatic colonies; as evinced by the celebrity enjoyed, among other epic poets of this primitive age, by Stasinus of Cyprus, Eumelus of Corinth, and Cinæthion of Lacedæmon.

Crates.

5. Another view which, both in respect to the country and the age of Homer, may be considered as that most broadly opposed to the Ionian theory, would make him flourish prior to the Dorian invasion, and hence, in the received chronology, prior also to any Ionian settlement in Asia. This view has been rested still more confidently than the foregoing on the internal evidence of his works. It seems to have been first seriously put forth by the Alexandrian critic Crates¹, but found little favour with the

antients. In modern times it has been warmly advocated in several distinguished quarters.¹ The arguments of its supporters, if not conclusive in its own favour, help at least to place in a strong light some of the leading objections to the Ionian theory, against which they are mainly directed. As a general principle, it has been contended: that "the popular bard of an eventful age would naturally prefer recent subjects, possessing an immediate hold on the sympathies of his audience. This principle is, in fact, inculcated by the poet himself in the words of Telemachus.² But, had Homer lived after the invasion of the Heraclidæ, which drove the Ionians to migrate in quest of new seats, that event, with their own subsequent Asiatic expeditions and conquests, would have furnished material more recent, as well as more interesting to an Ionian audience than the siege of Troy. Even admitting that an Ionian Homer had preferred the tale of Troy to the wars of the Dorian conquest, as the subject of his standard work, it were scarcely conceivable that, amid so much matter naturally involving allusions to the late revolution, by which the destinies both of his own province and of all Greece were so deeply affected, not one such allusion should have escaped him throughout his many thousand lines of narrative." To this it is replied by the advocates of the poet's Æolian origin; placing the date of his birth exactly coeval with that popularly assigned to the Æolian migration, or 60 years after Troy. Aristarchus, as an advocate of the Ionian theory, made the poet's birth exactly coeval with the Ionian migration, or 140 years after Troy. Vit. Hom. Plut. i. 3.; conf. Clint. Fast. Hell. vol. i. p. 145.

the Ionian theory: that "the very last subject on which any people would love to dwell, or which their popular poets would select for celebration, would be their ignominious expulsion from their native seats. This therefore was a case to which the incidental remark of Telemachus could not extend, even assuming it to be capable, under any circumstances, of so rigid an application. The poet, turning away with shame and sorrow from so dismal a catastrophe, would find far more congenial matter in the vicissitudes of a war eminently glorious to his own race, but in which their Dorian oppressors had taken no part. Homer however, it is further maintained, has in fact alluded to the Dorian conquest, and precisely in such ambiguous mode as might under the circumstances have been expected, in the passage where Juno assures Jupiter that, 'if he will indulge her by the destruction of Troy, she will hereafter offer no obstacle to that of her own three favourite cities, Argos, Mycene, and Sparta.'"¹

theory tested by the internal
the poems.

6. The balance of the above argument, if on the one hand not sufficient to bear out the opinion that Homer flourished prior to the Dorian conquest, is not certainly more favourable to his Ionian origin. So stoical an indifference to the real destinies of his race on the part of a genial poet, in so voluminous a mass of poetical commentaries on their fabulous annals, were certainly a phenomenon without example in the history of literature. It is the universal privilege and custom of poets, in describing events of antient date, to apostrophise subsequent transactions connected with them, where deeply interesting to their audience. The circumstance that such events were not entirely of an agreeable nature, can form no exception to the general rule. When therefore we find Virgil predicting the historical vicissitudes of Rome, her misfortunes as well as her greatness ; when we find Tasso dwelling on the future glories of the House of d'Este ; when we find Homer himself adverting to coming events of national interest, to the subsequent fate of Ulysses, and of Æneas and his late posterity,—it were hardly reasonable to expect so pervading a silence on the part of an Ionian poet, regarding the immediate future destinies of his Ionian fellow-countrymen, especially when of such momentous interest to those whom he addressed. Admitting the passage regarding the destruction of the three Peloponnesian cities to point at the Dorian invasion, the allusion could hardly be that of an Ionian poet, betraying, as it does, indifference, rather than concern for the disaster. But the anomaly in the case of an Ionian Homer would not be confined to mere silence or indifference ; it would amount to a neglect or contempt inconceivable in any such case. Athens was the parent state of the Ionian colonies ; it was the city which, in every version of their history, affords protection to the fugitives from the Dorian arms, and under whose auspices and leaders they crossed the Ægæan and settled in their new possessions. How then can the insignificant part which Athens plays in the Iliad, or in the poet's fable generally, as compared with her celebrity in her own standard textbooks of heroic tradition, be reconciled with his Ionian origin ? In the Iliad no Athenian chief is ever put prominently forward, except in an unfavourable light.¹ No Athenian combatant is ever represented so much as killing an antagonist.² The allusions to Athens herself or her affairs are rare and incidental; some of them in passages of questionable origin. What could have induced an Ionian Homer to celebrate so many Æolian or Achæan warriors, even chiefs of the hated race of Heraclidæ³, as the flower of Hellenic chivalry, while the single Athenian hero mentioned by name, Menestheus, is scarcely brought on the stage but to be chid for his backwardness to the combat?⁴ The consistency with which this secondary character of the Athenians is maintained from first to last, might indeed be adduced among other valid arguments of the unity of design which animates the poem; or as evidence at least, that among the rhapsodists supposed to have contributed their atoms to its creation, very little can be due to a genuine Ionian. This argument is strengthened by the contrast between the Iliad and the Iliopersis of Arctinus, the oldest Greek heroic poet next to Homer. Arctinus, as a Milesian, was an Attico-Ionian colonist. Hence in his poem, a prominent part was assigned to the Athenian heroes Demophoon and Acamas.⁵

No less pointed is the argument supplied by the cursory, or even contemptuous mode in which, in the geographical notices occurring in the poem, the part of Asia Minor afterwards called Ionia is passed over. Here again there could be no obligation, either in propriety or custom, to such modesty. To have dwelt on political revolutions not yet accomplished, or cities not yet founded, might have been taxed as superfluous or out of place. But, in regard to the localities or scenery around which his own patriotic sympathies were concentrated, silence or reserve could as little be expected on the part of an Ionian Homer as of a Mantuan Virgil. Yet the only town, if it already was one, to the south of the Æolian coast, mentioned in the Iliad, and that but once in the catalogue of Trojan allies, is Miletus. Among the islands no notice whatever occurs of Samos. Chios, also overlooked in the Iliad, is once mentioned in the *Odyssey*¹, but merely as a sea-mark, and with the far from flattering epithet of "rugged Chios." Such is all the celebrity which the supposed "bard of Chios" has thought fit, amid plentiful opportunities, to bestow upon his own favoured birthplace.

The above considerations, in proportion as they invalidate the claims of the Ionian colonies on the poet's nativity, strengthen those of the neighbouring Æolia. The argument indeed in favour of this district combines, with the voice of popular tradition, an amount of evidence derivable from Homer's own text or from historical probability, such as might hardly have been expected in so essentially fabulous a case. In order to do justice to these joint data, a few remarks will be necessary on the obscurer points which they involve in the early colonial history of Greece.

7. That the legend of the Trojan war is in so far founded in fact, as to shadow forth a great struggle between the population of the eastern and that of the western shore of the Ægæan, terminating in the expulsion of the former race from their maritime territory and its occupation by the victors, is not, it is believed, seriously denied by the more reasonable even of those who are least disposed to admit a basis of reality in Hellenic fable. The establishment of civilised Greek invaders among the comparatively barbarous aborigines of Libya, Sicily, or parts of Italy, might have been effected without any such obstinate struggle as to supply an important chapter of heroic tradition. But the submissive abandonment of their native seats, of the fairest regions of Asia Minor, by a race which all historical evidence implies had preceded the Greeks themselves in the arts both of peace and war, cannot be so easily explained. Whether or no the struggle, as in the poetical accounts, lasted ten years; whether the vanquished chief was called Priam, and his conqueror Agamemnon, or by some other name,—the existence of the colonies seems to vouch for the main fact, that a body of Hellenic warriors subdued, after a vigorous resistance, the north-western coast of Asia Minor. This view may be taken in connexion with the legend of the Iliad, where the successive reduction of the neighbouring states, allies of Priam, constitutes the chief part of the first nine years' operations of the Greek army. Achilles describes himself as having conquered, inclusive of the isles of Lesbos and Scyros¹, no fewer than twenty-three cities or states, eleven by land and twelve in maritime expeditions², which must have extended therefore to a considerable distance from the central theatre of war.

An obstacle to any such connexion of fact and fable may seem to exist in the interval of sixty years, interposed in the accredited chronology between the overthrow of Priam's empire and the occupation of the conquered territory. It can hardly be supposed that so fine a country, almost within sight of the native land of the victors, would have been at once so contemptuously relinquished by them, as both that chronology and the Homeric legend inculcate. Still less probable is it that had the Greeks been so strangely indifferent to its value, its antient possessors would have allowed it to lie waste during several generations. It would undoubtedly have been reoccupied, its towns rebuilt and refortified, to the extent sufficient to oppose at least as formidable a resistance as before to a more limited and less warlike body of invaders. No such second struggle however is recorded. The tradition therefore, which describes the Greeks as returning in mass, after the fall of the city, to their native land, must be considered but as a poetical sequel to the purely poetical account, which represents the expedition as undertaken for the sole purpose of recovering Helen. In the actual course of events, of which notice is still extant in classical authors, it may be presumed that the Troad, if not at first fully colonised, was at least occupied by the victors¹, until the vicissitudes of the mother country led to the complete establishment of the states of the Æolian confederacy. The hold thus obtained on the line of coast

¹ Æschylus, Eumen. 398. — Pindar (Nem. xi. 45.), and the prevailing tradition (Strab. xiii. p. 582. 621.; conf. ix. p. 402.; Hellanic. frag. 114. Did.) describe the Æolian migration as led by Orestes son of Agamemnon; other inferior authorities by Penthilus son of Orestes. Conf. Clint. Fast. Hell. vol. i. p. 103. In each case it may be asked: Why should colonies from Bœotia and the neighbouring districts have selected, even in the legend, a Pelopidan leader, but that the title by conquest to the new territory rested, in the same legend, with the Pelopidan dynasty? Herodotus (v. 94.) also founds the title of the Greek colonies to the Æolian territory on the Trojan war; and the traditions of the Nosti, Hesiod, and Callinus, allude to Greek settlements in Ionia immediately after the fall of Troy. Düntz. fragm. p. 23.; *Marcksch. fragm. would afford opportunity for the subsequent extension of Hellenic settlement, and the Ionian colonies followed in the wake of their kinsmen to the northward.

Æolian
predilections of Homer.

8. This view of the original settlement of the Æolian states, strengthens their claim to be considered the mother country of Homer. Assuming his own ancestors to have been among the first occupants of the conquered region, he would have been nourished in the midst of the objects and associations best calculated to inspire him with ardour for the subject he has selected. The arguments urged above against the pretensions of Ionia, from the poet's ignorance of, or indifference to, Ionian localities, are here accordingly all reversed. Every page of the Iliad betrays a minute knowledge of the scenery of the Troad. Not merely the general outline of the landscape; hills, valleys, plains, headlands; but the gardens, fountains, and washing-troughs, in the environs of the destroyed city; the carriage-road, the beech trees, the fig groves; the fords of the rivers, the tombs and landmarks of the plain, are exhibited in the poet's descriptions with a native simplicity of effect, which shows it to be a real Troad with which his own mind was identified, not the mere image of a foreign region which he celebrates. We have already seen that, although the whole country afterwards called Ionia is included in his Trojan Catalogue, not a single city of that country, with the doubtful exception of Miletus, is mentioned by name. The towns, on the other hand, of the comparatively narrow district of Mount Ida, extending along the Hellespont and the neighbouring shore of Propontis, are enumerated to the amount of twenty and upwards, including those previously destroyed by Achilles, or incidentally mentioned in other parts of the poem. Many of their names are identical with those of cities afterwards known as members of the Æolian confederacy; and although the Greek settlers may in some instances have retained the antient titles of Asiatic localities, yet in other cases, especially where the names are of pure Greek formation, it may safely be assumed that the Æolian poet has availed himself of the joint opportunity which purely Æolian names afforded him, of both swelling his Trojan Catalogue and doing honour to his native district. Another curious evidence of Homer's Æolian predilections exists in the circumstance, already noticed, of the importance attached by him in the Iliad to the destinies of Æneas and his race, as future sovereigns of a remnant of the Trojans, after the destruction of Priam's city and empire. There are accordingly few facts of the kind better attested, than that the rulers of several states in this same region of Ida asserted and enjoyed, from the remotest period, the honour of a traditional descent from the Dardanian hero.¹ Among those states, Gergithes, on the north side of the mountain, advanced a more especial claim to this honour. Hence it is no doubt that we find that community, though not mentioned by Homer as a Trojan city, celebrated by him indirectly, and by anticipation, in the name of Gorgythion, a son of Priam. In the same way the name of another later Æolian locality, Cebrene, is poetically forestalled by that of Cebriones, a still more distinguished member of the Trojan royal family.²

While the Æolian tradition, as thus extending to the earliest Greek colonists, has the advantage of giving a wide latitude to reasonable conjecture as to the precise epoch at which Homer may have flourished, it also escapes the objection urged by the followers of Crates against the Ionian theory from the poet's want of sympathy with the victims of the Dorian invasion, or from his ungrateful neglect or contempt of their Attic benefactors. To the colonists from Bœotia or Thessaly, already settled in Asia, the revolutions of Southern Greece were matters of comparative indifference. Such incidental allusions as that placed in the mouth of Juno, to the three Peloponnesian cities, were as much as could reasonably be expected from an Æolian poet.

The picture of Greece presented in the Iliad and Odyssey, the descriptions they contain of the component elements of the victorious army and of its leading heroes, also abundantly betray Æolian feelings and predilections. It was a nice question among the antient critics, why Homer should have commenced his catalogue with Bœotia.¹ The question as treated by them seems frivolous, owing to the frivolity of the attempts at its solution; but weighed on more critical grounds it is not so superfluous as it appears. Modern commentators² have also expressed surprise, that an "Ionian poet" should have been at pains to assign so great a prominence to this district, and enumerate its cities in greater detail than those of any other part of Greece; while the cities of Attica itself, the metropolitan state of the Ionian colonies, are passed over unnoticed with the single exception of the capital. The mystery is explained by the consideration, that Bœotia claimed and enjoyed the undisputed honours of metropolitan state of the Æolian confederacy.¹ It was natural therefore that she should be placed, by the Æolian poet, in the van of the host by whom the country had been subdued. The prominence given to individual heroes of Æolian blood is also remarkable. The protagonist of each poem is of that race, as are four of the seven chiefs of first rank before Troy, Achilles, Ulysses, Nestor, Diomed. The ascendancy of Æolian associations may also be traced in the chief episodical narratives of each poem. Such are the histories of Bellerophon and Meleager in the Iliad, and the adventures of Theoclymenus in the Odyssey. This latter episode indeed, from its very slender connexion with the main action of the poem, might almost appear to have been specially intended to confer honour on the Melampodian family, whose Æolo-Bœotian claims to celebrity have also been recognised by Hesiod in a separate poem in their honour. In the personages most prominently put forward in the Necromancy of the Odyssey the same partiality is observable. Of the seven heroines first introduced, on whose history so pointed an attention is bestowed, six are Æolians: Tyro, ancestress of the chief families of Southern Thessaly; Chloris, the wife of Neleus; Iphimedia, the mother of the Aloidæ; and three illustrious Bœotian dames, Antiope, Alcmena, and Epicasta. The sad destiny of the latter heroine, conjointly with that of her son Œdipus, is also concisely but circumstantially described. Leda alone, among the rest, as the mother of Helen and the Dioscuri, is honoured with any detailed notice. Of the only three heroes whose torments are described, two are Æolians; Tityus a Bœotian giant, and Sisypheus son of the eponyme patriarch of the Æolian race. Homer, like Dante¹, exults in the celebrity enjoyed by his nation even in hell.

9. In the popular adjustment of the Æolian legend, Cuma, founded in 1033 B. C., was the city where the poet's family first settled. Smyrna, founded in 1015 B. C. by Cumæans, was the place of his birth.² He could not therefore, on this basis, have been born prior to the latter date, or about ninety years after the Dorian invasion. This account seems to be but a figurative adaptation of the poet's nativity to his supposed character and circumstances. For the most illustrious of Æolia's sons, Smyrna, the chief city of the confederacy, was naturally selected as, birthplace. Cuma on the other hand, as the first Æolian city which attained celebrity, and mother of Smyrna, no less readily suggested itself as the earliest Asiatic seat of his ancestors. It was also the ascertained seat of the family of Hesiod, a circumstance not probably without influence in the selection. The only historical inference to be derived from this arrangement, is the inveteracy of the tradition relative to Homer's Æolian origin. Any more critical attempt to elucidate his age³, must depend mainly on a comparison of the state of manners described in his poems, with that which prevailed at the later period when historical light begins to shine more clearly on the affairs of Greece, towards the first Olympiad, or the year 776 B.C. The interval of years, which a fair estimate of the difference in the two states of society warrants our interposing between the periods in which they respectively prevailed, added to 776, the year of the first Olympiad, will give the less certain date of which we are in search.

The main characteristics of the state of manners depicted by Homer, are all more or less connected with the form of government which he describes. This may be defined as a combination of the feudal and patriarchal systems, such as prevailed in various countries of modern Europe even within a recent period. In heroic Greece, as in the modern middle ages, chiefs of inferior degree, while paying allegiance by service or tribute to some other potentate of higher rank, enjoyed a royal supremacy in their own district. The dominions of Agamemnon, for example, are described in general terms as comprehending all Peloponnesus ("Argos") and many islands.¹ Yet, in the Catalogue and other more specific notices of the separate states of the confederacy, the territories of Menelaus, Nestor, and Diomed, occupy a much larger portion of the peninsula than the share allotted to Agamemnon; nor is any island whatever specified as belonging to the latter king. This supreme sovereignty, therefore, was but a species of feudal lordship² exercised by him over the peninsula and its dependancies. The following cases may be adduced in closer illustration. Among the gifts offered by the repentant "King of Men" to Achilles, were seven cities in the Pylian Gulf, "inhabited by men of substance, who would honour him with tribute as their liege lord."¹ These cities lay widely detached from the territory of Agamemnon, between the dominions of Menelaus and Nestor. Hence probably why they are omitted in the Catalogue. They could neither be politically comprehended in the districts of Lacedæmon or Pylos, nor geographically in the proper dominions of Agamemnon; nor were they sufficiently important to constitute a section by themselves. They sent however their contingent to the war, as appears by the passage² where two warriors slain by Æneas are described as sons of Diocles of Pheræ, one of the seven communities. By this same Diocles Telemachus is hospitably entertained at Pheræ, on his journey from Pylos to Lacedæmon.³ Diocles was therefore a petty prince, exercising sovereign authority in his own state, but paying allegiance and tribute to Agamemnon, who offers to make over these rights with the hand of his daughter to Achilles. In the same way Phœnix was invested by Peleus with the feudal sovereignty of a province of his dominions⁴; and Menelaus expresses his intention of paying his debt of gratitude to Ulysses in the same substantial manner.⁵ From the historical details of the Odyssey⁶ it is also evident, that the leading suitors were petty princes under the feudal supremacy of the Laertian family. Priam is described as lord of the whole region of Phrygia between the Hellespont and Lesbos, inclusive of that island.⁷ Yet the numerous chiefs of those countries, whose troops swelled the Trojan forces, exercise, each in his own locality, a sovereign sway. This higher imperial order of royal authority is apostrophised by the poet in terms indicating the deep reverence, almost amounting to religious veneration¹, with which, both in his own and the public estimation, it was contemplated; and which contrasts curiously with the equally strong sentiments of reprobation or contempt, entertained for the same dignity during the republican ages of Greece.

The beneficial effects of this state of society in the promotion of heroic poetry are obvious. While the amplest scope was afforded to the martial energies of the dominant order, its members were subjected at the same time to such an amount of control, civil or military, as to prevent their spirit of chivalrous rivalry from degenerating into lawless violence. Each considerable landholder was in his own sphere a king and general. A dispute between two neighbours about a right of pasture, which in other times would be settled by a law-plea, gave rise to a warlike adventure, celebrated by a heroic ballad. But the same rival powers were not the less readily united under the common bond of patriotism and feudal allegiance, in the prosecution of great enterprises, supplying subjects for a higher class of minstrelsy.

The only occupations generally followed by the upper ranks besides war and navigation, were those of rural and domestic economy. Hence the performance of offices considered in more advanced stages of social culture as menial and humiliating, was, to Homer's heroes, not only useful employment but pleasurable pastime. The same hand which wielded the sceptre was not ashamed to assist as mason or joiner in the structure of the royal dwelling, or even as butcher or cook in the sacrificial rites. The king's son tended the flocks, and the princesses helped their maidens to wash the family vestments. An action which it was not beneath the dignity of a king to perform, it was not degrading in the Epic Muse to celebrate; and our sympathy with the genius of the poet's age, as much as the brilliancy of his own descriptions, causes us to enjoy, in his account of the every-day life of his heroes, much that would be offensive or ridiculous in a poem of the present day. Similar is the case with the language of those heroes. Whether in familiar discourse or fierce altercation, the oratory of men neither afraid nor ashamed to call things by their real names, must always possess a power of dramatic effect, for which no studied refinement of modern poetical rhetoric can compensate.

How far those descriptions represent the state of society in his own time.

10. Before adopting this picture of society as a criterion for estimating the age of its author, a question of some importance occurs: How far is that picture to be considered as exhibiting the manners of the poet's own times, how far those of the times which he celebrates? There are probably few students of Homer to whom, from the day when his poems were first placed in their hands as a subject of schoolboy task, until the question was forced on their attention as a point of critical discussion, it has ever occurred to doubt that his sketches of life were borrowed from the reality. There is an artless truthful sincerity about them, which appears altogether beyond the mechanical skill of a retoucher of old and faded portraits. Many poets and romance writers of civilised ages have, it is true, succeeded, by a happy combination of antiquarian research and illustrative talent, in dressing up such pictures in colours so plausible as to produce a lively impression of their reality. Still there remains a wide difference between them and those transmitted by contemporary authors; between the elaborate compositions of Walter Scott, and the original sketches of Villani or Froissart. But all such studied arts of the literary antiquary, were as foreign to the genius of Homer as the means for their exercise were beyond his reach.

Essential however as it may be to the poetical effect of such descriptions, that they should be borrowed from real life, it is by no means so indispensable that they should represent the manners of the period described. The difference between the description and the reality could, in the present case, at the most be but trifling: and Homer's investment of the warriors of Trojan times with the habits of his own, seems certainly both more consistent with his genius and more conducive to the poetical spirit of his narrative, than any attempt to embody antiquarian speculations as to the changes which might have taken place.

The chief objection urged to the admission of such genuine truthfulness in his descriptions, has been the anomaly observable in some of their details; the contrasts of rudeness and refinement, luxury, and frugality, in the habits of his heroes. Some commentators have supposed that, in these symptoms of more advanced politeness, he artlessly represents the state of society with which he was himself familiar; while in his ruder pictures he attempts to transplant his readers into that of a former generation. Others would discover in the former class of passages argument of different authorship. Both inferences are equally fallacious. Such contrasts are the usual characteristics of a comparatively barbarous state of society advancing in civilisation. The refinements or luxuries introduced from abroad cannot fail, in every such case, to appear in marked contrast to the rudeness on which they are engrafted; especially to the eye accustomed to judge by the standard of a fully civilised age, where all such anomalies are smoothed down in the general polish of the social fabric. The same thing is exemplified under very similar features, in the habits of the antient tribes of Palestine as portrayed in the Mosaic writings.¹ In Greece, a country farther removed from the great fountain-heads of Oriental culture, the anomaly would naturally be more marked. Nor could it fail to be greatly exaggerated in poetical description. A popular poet had no inducement to disguise the ordinary social habits of his day, even where capable of such treatment. Princes tending their flocks, or princesses acting the laundress, were matters of fact rather than subjects of fictitious embellishment. But the palace of a wealthy king, its furniture, or the decoration of his person and table, homely as they might have appeared in the age of the Ptolemies, were wonderful in the eyes of the poet's contemporaries. They afforded, consequently, material for such poetical enlargement as renders them more apparently inconsistent with the simple domestic habits of the proprietor. There can also be little doubt that the whole, or a very large portion, of the nobler works of art described in the poems were of foreign importation.¹ Such they are in fact specified to be in many cases by the poet. Even therefore without any exaggeration, they would broadly contrast with the more homely produce of native manufacture. Of the degree in which these descriptions really are exaggerated, the episodes of the Shield of Achilles, of the Palace and Gardens of Alcinoüs, and others, afford abundant evidence ; much of the splendour which here dazzles being not only of a marvellous but a supernatural character.

11. In reverting to the main question, as to the light reflected by the above picture of manners on the epoch at which its author flourished, one cannot fail to be struck with the difference between the form of political government which he portrays, and that which prevailed in Greece from the earliest dawn of authentic history, about or prior to the commencement of the Olympic era. At that period, with the exception of a few chiefly Dorian states of Peloponnesus, where the name and rank of king, though still maintained, no longer represented the former powers of royalty, monarchical rule was extinct throughout Greece and its dependancies. Republicanism, in its various modifications, was every where recognised as the legitimate form of government; and in many, especially the Asiatic states, the spirit of party, with all its machinery and terminology, was fully matured. The efficient, if not the immediate cause of this revolution, was the general break up in the social fabric of the confederacy, and the changes in its population, consequent on the Dorian occupation of Peloponnesus. While in that peninsula the royal dignity continued to exist without regal power, in Attica and the Bæotian states it speedily disappeared both in name and substance. It can hardly be doubted that the republican principle was also about the same time largely developed, though at first probably under aristocratic forms, in the Ionian colonies, founded under the auspices of the Athenian leaders who had aided in abolishing or limiting the royal authority at home. Bodies of enterprising men, collected from different regions for the express purpose of colonisation, or to escape oppression in their native seats, would, on occupying a new country on the more or less equal footing of independant adventurers, be the more keenly alive to the charm of popular institutions. There exists, accordingly, no historical trace of royalty, in the Homeric sense, in these colonies.¹

The presumption that this important revolution in the political state of the Greeks was complete not long after the Dorian invasion, if not sufficient inducement to place the poet's epoch prior to that event, is at least an argument for carrying it as far back as were otherwise consistent with probability. The inference here, as before, is favourable to the claims of the Æolian colonies on his nativity. These settlements, as dating prior to the revolution in the mother country in which the above political changes originated, and formed under leaders boasting descent from the princes by whom the new territory had been conquered, would be likely to adhere longer and more closely to the old patriarchal system in the form exhibited in the poet's descriptions.

The argument in favour of Homer's antiquity derivable from the social habits of his heroes, though not without its weight, is less pointed. The changes in the domestic manners of Greece during this period were apparently less rapid than those in her political government. Traces of the same homely simplicity may be discovered among the higher class down to a comparatively late epoch.¹ But here again the inference, in so far as it reaches, is unfavourable to the pretensions of the Ionians, as the part of the nation where the old patriarchal habits, with the increase of maritime trade and more extended intercourse with Asia, were most rapidly effaced.

But the same traditional evidence which constrains us to award the honour of the poet's birthplace to Æolia, secures to the Ionian states, by equally valid right, that of having most zealously cultivated and preserved the fruits of his genius, and extended the school of poetry founded by him through its various ramifications of Homerids, Cyclic poets, and hymnographers. This adoption or appropriation of his muse, the second important stage in the "Life of Homer," was a natural result of the subsequent Ionian ascendancy in power, wealth, and influence, and is no less distinctly shadowed forth in the tradition of his wanderings. His offer to settle at Cuma, so ungraciously declined by its citizens, and ultimate prosperous domicile and marriage in Chios, are a plain figure of the transfer of the chief credit and popularity of his poems from his native region to the latter city and coast. Hence too may be explained how, in every version of the legend, he dies and is buried in the isle of Ios.¹ This locality, so insignificant unless as connected with the legend of Homer, evidently appears in that legend as the eponyme of Ionian colonisation; an honour which seems to have attached to it, both in right of its name, and as the first Ionian land visited by the sons of Codrus on crossing the Ægæan.²

His personal character and fortunes, as illustrated by his works.

12. In so far as the personal lot of the poet, the degree of honour, fame, or other worldly blessings he may have enjoyed, or the adverse destiny to which he may have been subjected, can reasonably be tested by the internal data supplied by his works, the inference must be that he was a prosperous man. Poetical genius is there represented as a passport to honour and emoluments. Every princely establishment maintained a professional minstrel, a habitual guest at the royal table, and who, if not invested with the attributes of sanctity, as his familiar epithet of "divine" might import, appears to have occasionally combined with the character of poet that of sage, or even minister of state. Agamemnon, on his departure for Troy, consigns his youthful wife Clytemnestra to the guardianship of a bard. By his influence and authority, so long as he lived, she was preserved from pollution. Through his destruction alone Ægisthus was enabled to accomplish his pernicious purpose.¹ That Homer therefore, as the prince of the fraternity, largely partook of its privileges, can hardly be doubted. Both Iliad and Odyssey, amid all their lively sallies of passion and feeling, also display a placid tone of general sentiment, bespeaking a mind at ease with itself and contented with its lot. Here however, his own testimony stands in somewhat strange contrast with the more popular accounts of his life current in later ages, where he appears as a distressed wanderer, whose talents barely suffice to procure him a precarious subsistence, extorted as much perhaps by compassion for his poverty as admiration of his genius. There occur indeed some more favourable versions of this chapter of his history. The author of the joint biography of Homer and Hesiod represents the former as a wandering bard it is true, but as one highly honoured and at times munificently rewarded. The dismal account of his earlier adventures is also, in the Æolian legend, relieved by his attaining, at the close of life, a competence and settled residence at Chios; while Proclus, without entering into details, observes with some simplicity but not without plausibility, that "Homer must have been a man of no mean substance, to have visited so many countries at a period when travelling must have been so expensive." Plato, on the other hand, alludes to his lot as that of the humblest itinerant minstrel, exposed, even on the part of his patrons, to frequent neglect and contumely.¹ The antiquity and popularity of this more gloomy view of his history, are in some degree vouched for by the extant epigrams ascribed to himself, in which he complains of his unhappy fate, and stigmatises those who by their unkind treatment had helped to embitter it.² Several of these productions appear, by reference both to their style and matter, to date from a period at which the Homeric school of epic poetry still maintained a lingering existence. They may be considered as figuratively expressing, on the one hand the fact, that at the epoch when they were composed all authentic notices of the poet had perished; on the other the very natural inference, that had his treatment in life corresponded to his merits, his memory would have been more effectually preserved. They may also figure the ordinary condition of the popular minstrel in the lower periods of epic art; when its professors, degraded from the rank of original bards to little more than promulgators of the works of their predecessors, may have found some consolation in assuming their great master to have been reduced to the same shifts by which they were accustomed to earn their subsistence.

13. To the above speculations on Homer's life and history as a man, it may seem almost superfluous, after the copious train of previous illustration, to add another word on his genius as an author. It may still however be desirable to contemplate, in one comparative view, those attributes which have procured for him, by the unanimous award of three thousand years, the dignity not only of father, but of prince of poets.

Homer's superiority to his successors consists, first, in having excelled them all in certain of the higher, and more essential attributes of an epic poet; secondly, in his having possessed the remainder, collectively, in greater fulness than has ever been exemplified in any other case. In conception and portraiture of character, and the deeper vein of tragic pathos, he may be equalled if not surpassed by Shakspeare; in moral dignity of thought and expression by Milton; in the grace and delicacy of his lighter pictures by Petrarch or Ariosto; and in the gloomy grandeur of his supernatural imagery by Æschylus or Dante. But no one of these poets has combined, in a similar degree, those various elements of excellence, in each of which they may separately claim to compete with him.

Among the properties of his art, on the other hand, in which Homer stands superior to all competitors, a first place belongs to the general design and composition of his poems. The Iliad and Odyssey, as they are the earliest, are still, each in its proper sphere, the noblest models of the heroic epopee, the unrivalled standards of poetical unity and harmony, combined with extent and variety of structure. The long and severe scrutiny to which, by a partial and hypercritical code of by-laws, they have been subjected by the last generation of critics, even to the minutest joints and fibres of their mechanical texture, has served but the more firmly to establish their claim to the above high distinction, awarded to them by the greatest authorities of every age, from Aristotle downwards. Nor, when the late controversies shall have become matter of past history, will it redound to the credit of the present age of literature, that so many eminent scholars should have gloried in a blindness to those excellences upon which, directly or mediately, all that is great and admirable in poetical art has ever since been modelled.

The next peculiar property of Homer is that happy combination of epic and dramatic management, to which attention has frequently been directed in the course of this analysis. This is a faculty which he not only possesses in a degree far surpassing any other poet, but of the nature and value of which his successors seem to have had very little conception. Amid the spirit of imitation which actuates them in regard to so many other features of his style, scarcely an effort can be discovered to emulate him in this. Dante, as in some other essential attributes of the epic poet, here also ranks next to Homer, yet with a wide interval. The individual pictures of the Tuscan bard stand forth indeed in broad colours of truth and reality; but the mimetic effect of his general action bears no comparison with that of the Iliad or Odyssey.

The third, and perhaps the most remarkable of Homer's distinctive excellences, consists in his uniting the delicacy of ideas and purity of expression, which form the usual characteristic of the more advanced stages of literature, frequently of its decline, with the native simplicity and vigour of a primitive age. The state of half-civilisation in which he flourished, although that most generally favourable to heroic poetry, possesses also this drawback, that the same simplicity which insures originality and vigour, is in a corresponding degree opposed to propriety and elegance. This may be illustrated by the parallel of the two modern poets who, either in their own genius or the circumstances under which they composed, offer the nearest analogy to Homer, Dante and Shakspeare. Both flourished, like Homer, at a period which, while affording similar scope to poetical freedom and power, was proportionally unfavourable to poetical taste. But the Greek poet is alone distinguished by the honourable peculiarity, that while adorned by all the higher excellences of the primitive Muse, he has escaped that coarseness of sentiment and crudity of style, with that turn for obscenity and the kindred branches of low humour, which so frequently offend even in the noblest passages of the Italian and British bards. Nor can there be a more striking proof of the innate delicacy of his own taste and that of his age and country, than the fact that, while the entire Iliad and Odyssey offer scarcely a line calculated to call forth a blush on the most fastidiously modest cheek, there is hardly a tale or a drama of our own Christian Chaucer or Shakspeare, which a father of a family could venture to place, unpurified, into the hands of a youthful wife or daughter.

The fourth distinctive property of Homer's muse, its pure and genuine originality, connects itself with a parallel feature of distinction, already noticed in a former chapter¹, between the ruder stages of society in Greece and the corresponding periods of our own middle ages. A concise summary of the remarks there most pointedly urged will suffice for present illustration.

The semi-barbarism of Homer's age was one in which art advanced under exclusively indigenous auspices from infancy to maturity. No external circumstances interfered to thwart the free course of his own or the national genius. He had no foreign models to imitate, no grammatical or critical rules to obey. His materials and mode of treatment, his subjects, mythology, metre, and style, all flowed spontaneously, in natural channels, from the same pure native sources.

In our own early age of literature all this was reversed. The transition stage of society which produced Dante, the Homer of modern poetry, was founded on the ruins and constructed with the fragments of a former state of culture. Original genius, where not entirely perverted from its natural course, was shackled and led astray by the trammels of scholastic pedantry; by a spirit of imitation frequently directed towards what was least worthy of being copied; by a servile deference to a foreign language, and a mythology extraneous to the real habits or sympathies of the author or his public. These causes, apart from all reference to the individual minds of the men, suffice to explain much of the chaste and elegant simplicity which, whether in his highest flights or humblest walks, characterises the style of Homer, as contrasted with the grotesquely compounded mythology, scholastic quaintness, or far-fetched conceits, which too often deform the finest passages of Dante or Shakspeare.

14. One of the most prominent forms in which this native simplicity and purity of the Hellenic bard displays itself, is the exclusion of sentimental or romantic love from his stock of poetical materials. This is a characteristic which, while inherited in a greater or less degree by the whole more flourishing age of Greek poetical literature, possesses also the additional source of interest to the modern scholar, of forming one of the most striking points of distinction between antient and modern literary taste.

So great an apparent contempt, on the part of so sensitive a race as the Hellenes, for an element of poetical pathos which has obtained so boundless an influence on the comparatively phlegmatic races of Western Europe, is a phenomenon which, although it has not escaped the notice of modern critics, has scarcely met with the attention due to its importance. By some it has been explained as a consequence of the low estimation in which the female sex was held in Homer's age, as contrasted with the high honours conferred on it by the courtesy of medieval chivalry; by others as a natural effect of the restrictions placed on the free intercourse of the sexes among the Greeks. Neither explanation is satisfactory. The latter of the two is set aside by Homer's own descriptions, which abundantly prove that in his time at least, women could have been subjected to no such jealous control as to interfere with the free course of amorous intrigue. Nor even had such been the case, would the cause have been adequate to the effect. Experience seems rather to evince that the greater the difficulties to be surmounted, the higher the poetical capabilities of such adventures. Erotic romance appears, in fact, to have been nowhere more popular than in the East, where the jealous separation of the sexes has in all ages been extreme. As little can it be said that Homer's poems exhibit a state of society in which females were lightly esteemed. The Trojan war itself originates in the susceptibility of an injured husband; and all Greece takes up arms to avenge his wrong. The plot of the Odyssey hinges mainly on the constant attachment of the hero to the spouse of his youth; and the whole action tends to illustrate the high degree of social and political influence consequent on the exemplary performance of the duties of wife and mother. Nor surely do the relations subsisting between Hector and Andromache, Priam and Hecuba, Paris and Helen, convey a mean impression of the respect paid to the female sex in the heroic age. As little can the case be explained by a want of fit or popular subjects of amorous adventure. Many of the favourite Greek traditions are as well adapted to the plot of an epic poem or tragedy of the sentimental order, as any that modern history supplies. Still less can the exclusion be attributed to a want of sensibility, on the part of the Greek nation, to the power of the tender passions. The influence of those passions is at least as powerfully and brilliantly asserted in their own proper sphere of poetical treatment, in the lyric odes, for example, of Sappho or Mimnermus, as in any department of modern poetry. Nor must it be supposed that even the nobler Epic or Tragic Muse was insensible to the poetical value of the passion of love. But it was in the connexion of that passion with others of a sterner nature to which it gives rise, jealousy, hatred, revenge, rather than in its own tender sensibilities, that the Greek poets sought to concentrate the higher interest of their public. Any excess of the amorous affections which tended to enslave the judgment or reason, was considered as a weakness, not an honourable emotion, and hence was confined almost invariably to women. The nobler sex are represented as comparatively indifferent, often cruelly callous, to such influence; and, when subjected to it, are usually held up as objects of contempt rather than admiration. As examples may be cited the amours of Medea and Jason, of Phædra and Hippolytus, of Theseus and Ariadne, of Hercules and Omphale. The satire on the amorous weakness of the most illustrious of Greek heroes embodied in the last mentioned fable, with the glory acquired by Ulysses from his resistance to the fascinations of Circe and Calypso, may be jointly contrasted with the subjection by Tasso of Rinaldo and his comrades to the thralldom of Armida, and with the pride and pleasure which the Italian poet of chivalry appears to take in the sensual degradation of his heroes. The distinction here drawn by the antients is the more obvious, that their warriors are least of all men described as indifferent to the pleasures of female intercourse. They are merely exempt from subjection to its unmanly seductions. Ulysses, as he sails from coast to coast, or from island to island, willingly partakes of the favours which fair goddesses or enchantresses press on his acceptance. But their influence is never permitted permanently to blunt the more honourable affections of his bosom, or divert his attention from higher objects of ambition.

15. It will not be difficult to show that this peculiarity is but an element of the genial simplicity, above noticed as proper to the flourishing age of the Greek heroic Muse; that the invasion, on the other hand, and all but exclusive usurpation of the pathetic interest of modern poetry by a single passion, is a consequence of the corruption of manners and tastes inherited from the declining ages of classical art.

Origin of the modern romantic or sentimental school.

In the state of society described by Homer, offering, as it did, so many more manly sources of incitement to the adventurous spirit of the hero, the tender ingredient of sexual affection possessed interest only as contributing to his domestic happiness. The poetical value of the excess of that affection, as of other baneful passions, lay chiefly in the moral lessons it afforded. But when war, maritime enterprise, the chase, and other favourite subjects of early minstrelsy, acquire, with advancing refinement, that commonplace character which unfits them for the poet's purpose, he must have recourse to other expedients for working on the sympathies of his public. The passion of love here naturally offers itself. Of an essentially social nature, and founded on the instincts rather than the reason, that passion alone remains exempt from the vulgarising effects of civilisation. Its power would even appear to be extended by the same complexity of social habits which blunts the influence of its rivals, and by the greater obstacles interposed to its free gratification. The poet, therefore, discovers in it his most effectual hold on the personal sensibilities of every class of society.

The truth of these remarks is borne out by the vicissitudes of literary history from the days of Homer downwards. During the best ages of Greece, the rule sanctioned by his example, whether from a deference to his authority or from national taste and habit, continued to be observed or was but slightly infringed. The energy and activity of republican habits afforded a partial substitute for the old spirit of patriarchal independance, in securing to the antient class of subjects a preference both with epic and dramatic writers. The first marked influence of a taste for pure love adventure is observable in the declining ages of Attic literature and manners; especially in the brilliant comedy of Menander, where love, as the native critics express it, absorbs all other sources of interest. During the Roman period the taste continued to increase, and in the Byzantine literature finally obtained an ascendant in every class of imaginative composition. The romances of Heliodorus, Achilles Tatius, and Longus, are in fact the epic poetry of that day; and their influence is observable on the compositions of a subsequent better period. On the construction of a new framework of society, by the blending of northern ferocity with the degenerate civilisation of the south, the prevailing taste, in the general corruption that ensued, maintained its ground; and has ever since formed one of the broadest features of distinction between the literature of modern and that of antient times.

16. The question as to the relative value of these opposite characteristics, is one which the impartial critic feels both delicacy and difficulty in approaching. Too rigid an adherence to abstract principles would here be out of place. In literature as in morals, the value of a custom may often depend as much or more on its adaptation to the genius of a people, than on its own intrinsic merit; and what is theoretically defective may claim not only indulgence, but approval, in the spirit of the age and state of society which produced it. Romantic love is the life and soul of the modern heroic Muse. It has animated the valour of her heroes, warmed the inspirations of her greatest minstrels, and produced an epic literature which may compete in variety and brilliancy, if not in purity and dignity, with that of classical Greece. So closely is this element of poetical pathos interwoven with modern habits and sympathies, that a poem or a tragedy can hardly hope for success if amorous intrigue be excluded from the action. Even in subjects derived from real history, where this ingredient is wanting, the invention of the author must be taxed to supply the deficiency. There can be little doubt therefore, that the more popular answer to the question above propounded, would favour the romantic rather than the classical school of art. The critic however, who takes up the question on impartial principles, will reason as follows.

The proper objects for the higher exercise of imaginative genius are such as either by their own grandeur or beauty, or by the power of the moral impressions they convey, tend to exalt the mind and purify the affections. But those objects are not certainly alone or chiefly comprised within the narrow compass of lovers' desires, crosses, quarrels. A ready subjection to the fascinations of the inferior order of their species, can hardly be a solid basis of renown for kings or heroes. Had the mighty conflict of passions in the breast of Achilles hinged on the cruelty of some Trojan Clorinda or Angelica, an Iliad could never have been the result. But the rules of the Homeric epopee, as little as those of the modern romance, authorised the banishment of so universal a passion as love from its sources of interest. There may indeed be traced, in the nice discrimination with which the Hellenes have adapted to the different modes of the affection their respective styles of composition, the most delicate perception both of its social and poetical value. The lyric and other minor departments of Greek poetry, contain amorous descriptions equal, at least, in tenderness and pathos to any in modern literature. But the influences of the passion celebrated by Sappho, were different from those considered as honourable sources of heroic renown. These were the chaste affection of a fondly devoted spouse, pining during long years of trial and affliction for the absent husband of her youth; the steady attachment, on his side, which neither time nor distance can impair, to the wife of his bosom; and which, amid all the vicissitudes of an eventful life, still points to his domestic hearth as the centre of his duties and pleasures. Such is the species of love which animates the page of Homer. Of that which has been preferred by Ariosto, Tasso, and the popular romantic school, little more can be said than that it is, as a general rule, unreasonable or senseless, too often licentious and degrading. A modern poet or romance writer may, without serious violation of the laws of his art, glorify his protagonist for supplanting a rival, or even a husband, in the affections of a lovely woman. But it would as little occur to him to make the celebrity of a hero hinge on the steadiness of his conjugal attachment, as to a man of pleasure to boast of the fondness of his wife as his chief claim to success with the fair sex. Nor can it be denied that in the modern school of chivalrous adventure, not only moral principle, but even martial virtue, is often matter of secondary importance, compared with the ardent impetuosity of voluptuous excitement. If then the constant love of Ulysses and Penelope, riveted by mutual confidence and esteem, or the touching scenes between Hector and Andromache, be compared with the orgies of Armida and her host of reckless and debased admirers, none who consider purity of sentiment or dignity of conduct essential to the higher departments of poetry, can hesitate to which of the two schools of art the preference is to be awarded.

Influence of Homer
on posterity.

17. Any detailed inquiry into the influence exercised by Homer on the subsequent vicissitudes of elegant composition, belongs less to the history of Grecian than of universal literature, and would involve a searching analysis of the text of all or most of the distinguished writers both of antient and modern times. The subject, however, can hardly with propriety be here altogether overlooked, and a few remarks will suffice to place its general bearings in a distinct point of view.

This influence may be considered in a twofold light: first, as emanating immediately from the poet's own works; secondly, as exercised through the medium of other popular authors, who have themselves borrowed directly or indirectly from his page.

The deference paid to Homer by his own immediate successors amounted to so close a spirit of imitation, as to have caused the principal epic productions of the next ensuing age, amid the uncertainty which prevailed concerning their real authors, to be classed in popular usage as inferior productions of his own muse. The few preserved specimens of the poems ascribed to Hesiod, also evince that such portions of them as partook of the heroic character bore much of the common stamp of Homeric imitation. A similar deference to the same great original is perceptible, within their more limited scope for its display, in the early lyric poets, Callinus, Archilochus, Tyrtæus, Alcman, Stesichorus.¹ The extent and beneficial results of the dialectical influence of the poems on the whole subsequent cultivation of the Greek language, have already been illustrated.¹ The Iliad and Odyssey were also with reason esteemed by the antient critics, not only the source from which were derived the fundamental principles of the Attic drama, but in themselves the best models for the spirited conduct of debate or dialogue, and for that lively impersonation of character which constitutes the soul both of epic and dramatic composition.² Æschylus accordingly, the father of the regular drama, describes his tragedies as but "fragments from the great banquet of Homer."³

Homer's influence is little less extensively exercised on the prose literature of Greece than on her poetry; though less palpably, and hence in some respects perhaps more beneficially, as involving, owing to the essential difference of the two styles, less risk or appearance of servile imitation. The whole plan of the work of Herodotus⁴, and much in the details of his composition, show that it was by the study of the Iliad and Odyssey, as models of the unity of design and perspicuity of arrangement indispensable to the conduct of a great narrative, that he was enabled to advance the dry monotony of the chronicler or genealogist to the dignity of the historic Muse. By the orator⁵, as by the historian and the dramatist, the poems were equally acknowledged to embody every standard rule, not only for the treatment of a great subject, but for the individual exercise of the rhetorical art in all its branches, of declamation, address, or debate, in the senate, the council, or the law court.

Even in moral or didactic composition, Homer's presiding genius clearly displays itself, in the frequency and the mode of the appeals made to his text by the most distinguished authors in those departments. As a general rule, popular poetry is quoted by authors on scientific subjects solely or chiefly as a source of elegant illustration. With Homer the case was different. His authority, as the primary standard of national history and religious worship, was undisputed. The varied picture which he presents of human nature and character, the fine principles of elementary philosophy embodied in his text, and the rich treasure of pithy moral precept by which those principles are enforced, constituted his poems a national text-book of ethical science as well as of religious doctrine. Hence, in two curiously parallel passages, Homer is described, by one of the earliest of Greek philosophers¹, as "to all the primary source of all education;" and by one of the latest², as "the beginning, the middle, and the end, of all knowledge, to the young child, the grown man, and the grey beard." This maxim is perhaps most pointedly illustrated in the case of Plato, himself the Homer of Hellenic philosophy. His dialogues throughout bespeak a mind under the sway of a certain Homeric spell³, which he often repudiates and condemns, but in vain attempts to shake off. The Iliad and Odyssey are every where present to his mind; they are the poles around which his own genius revolves, "the fountain-heads," as Longinus remarks¹, "from which, by an infinity of channels, his own purest streams of oratory are derived;" emphatically quoted and elucidated where favourable to his views, and anxiously but unwillingly² combated where they appear to militate against him. This deference extends from the sentiment to the phraseology, which in him, as in so many other popular authors, frequently assumes, altogether apart from direct citation, a tone and turn easily recognised as Homeric by the practised student of the poems.

In the literature of Rome, the same deference to the Homeric models is perhaps, in individual cases, still more broadly marked than in that of the poet's native country, especially in the higher branches of epic composition. The first attempt to raise the standard of Roman national taste was a translation of the Odyssey.³ Of the two most distinguished Latin epic poets, Ennius and Virgil, the former, considered the patriarch of elegant composition in Rome as Homer was in Greece, revered, almost worshipped, the Greek bard, as he himself informs us⁴ and his remains abundantly testify, as the guardian genius which inspired and guided his own somewhat rude efforts to impart scope and dignity to the Italian muse. The Æneid on the other hand, in its relation to the Iliad and Odyssey, offers notoriously the most signal known example of genuine excellence combined with the most servile spirit of imitation, extending from the plan and conduct of the whole work to the minutest details of expression and style.

In the earlier stages of modern civilisation, the rudiments of Greek literary culture were chiefly imparted at second-hand through the medium of Latin authors. The full amount therefore, of the poet's sway on our own republic of letters, must be estimated in the cumulative ratio of that of his own genius on Greece, of Greece on Rome, of Rome on modern Europe.¹ The direct influence of Homer's muse is strikingly displayed from the first dawn² of a revival of taste for Greek literature, especially in the page of the two greatest modern masters of regular epic composition, Tasso and Milton.³ Of the extent to which many popular modern poets, unskilled in the Hellenic tongue, were also indebted through some secondary medium to the father of Hellenic poetry, abundant proof would be supplied, by a calculation of the number of passages in their works which a Homeric scholar, unversed in the epic literature of Rome, would pronounce to be plagiarisms or paraphrases from the Iliad or Odyssey. Equally certain is it, that the Odyssey is the fountain-head from which many of the more popular adventures or characters of the legendary poetry of our semibarbarous ancestors, the romance or fairy tale of the middle ages of Europe, by whatever variety of channels, are derived.

³ The servility with which Tasso, under the lash of the Crusca, copied the Iliad in his Gerusalemme riconquistata, a folly in which he himself gloried as his best claim to lasting renown, has caused the same imitative spirit, as displayed even in his great original work, to have been very much overlooked by the commentators. In canto i. of "The Jerusalem," the vision of the angel to Godfred is a paraphrase of the dream of Agamemnon, forming like it the introduction to the Catalogue of forces, which in each poem immediately succeeds. In canto vi. the details of the single combat between Tancred and Argante, its undecided issue, interruption by nightfall, and the interposition of the heralds, are all copied, often nearly to the letter, from the seventh book of the Iliad. Still more palpable is the imitation of book iv. of the Iliad in canto vii.; where, in the renewed combat between Argante and Raimondo, Belzebub acting the part of Minerva towards Orodino, who is charged with that of Pandarus, causes the treacherous violation of the truce and renewal of the general action. The copy extends even to the minute description of the bowshot, the divine protection vouchsafed to its object, and consequent slightness of the wound inflicted. Among minor examples compare canto ix. stanza 75. with Il. vi. 506. The extent to which Milton has formed his style on the Iliad and Odyssey, or borrowed from their pages, cannot require to be pointed out to the English scholar.

poets in their relation to Homer and Hesiod.

1. SETTING apart the Iliad and Odyssey as the most ancient existing productions of the Greek heroic Muse, the remaining epic literature of this period may be classed under three general heads.

I. The poems of the Homeric school, comprising, in addition to those of the regular heroic order commonly called Cyclic Poems, a number of Epic Hymns, with other miscellaneous compositions chiefly of a humorous or satirical character.

II. The body of poems which passed generally current under the name of Hesiod, a name representing, like that of Homer, not merely an individual poet but a class or school of poets, chiefly, it would seem, confined to Bœotia and the neighbouring districts of Central Greece. The works of this school embraced a great variety of subjects, historical and didactic, which were treated in epic style and measure, but in a comparatively brief or desultory manner, and with little or no pretension to that unity of plan and execution which formed an essential property of the Homeric muse.

III. To the third head of Miscellaneous Epic Poems, may be numbered all those not connected by their own style, or in the tradition of the period, with the school of either Homer or Hesiod.

The acknowledged title of Hesiod, as the author of the one or two more antient works which pass current under that name, to rank among Greek poets next if not equal in antiquity to Homer, may seem to entitle him to at least the second place in the order of historical inquiry. A sufficient apology for withholding this privilege, will be found in the peculiar nature of the connexion between the Iliad and Odyssey and the poems of the Homeric school; a connexion which constitutes them in some measure different parts of the same subject, and of one too closely united in its integrity to admit of those parts being effectively treated in a separate form. A similar, if not equally close relation, exists between the leading productions of the Hesiodic school. The course therefore, which obviously suggests itself as the most natural and convenient will be, to follow out each branch of inquiry in its integrity to its conclusion.

The present chapter will be devoted accordingly, to the longer more properly epic poems of the Homeric school. The hymns and miscellaneous poems will be reserved for separate treatment.

In an early chapter of this work it was remarked, that from the remotest period at which historical light gleams on the poetical literature of Greece, a number of epic poems besides the Iliad and Odyssey, passed current in popular usage under the name of

"Homer." The first exercise of the critical art, in the more advanced stages of literary culture, was to set apart two among these works as the sole productions of the one great original genius, while the remainder were ranked under other names or left anonymous as the case might happen. This whole body of poetry, as emanating from the same primary fountain-head of epic art, has obtained accordingly the distinctive title of Homeric, and the authors of its secondary works that of Homeridæ, sons or descendants of Homer. The principal seat of the school was the Hellenic coast of Asia Minor with the adjacent islands, partly owing to the poet being himself a native of that region, partly to the greater zeal of the Asiatic, especially the Ionian states, in the cultivation of the elegant arts. It is however worthy of remark, that of those recorded by name as authors of Homeric poems, a large proportion were natives of entirely different parts of the Hellenic world. Such were Eumelus of Corinth, Agias of Træzen, Cinæthon of Lacedæmon, Stasinus of Cyprus, Eugammon of Cyrene. This fact obviously forms in itself an almost conclusive argument against the modern theory, as to the late period at which the two great works of the original Homer, the acknowledged prototypes and models of all the others, were known or promulgated in European Greece.

Of the precise age, character, or country of many of these poets, little more is accurately known than of the corresponding particulars in the history of their great master. The names of several of them appear under a mythical disguise similar to that which envelopes the name of "Homer;" being mixed up in the relation of kinsman, friend, or otherwise, with the vicissitudes of his fabulous history. In some cases the legend appears to shadow forth, figuratively, the indirect influence of his genius in producing the inferior works of his school, through secondary organs inspired by the study of his poems. Creophilus for example, who in one of the popular accounts marries the poet's daughter, receives from him as her dowry the manuscript of the Sack of Eechalia. Whether this Creophilus be a historical personage, or, as is more probable, a mere fabulous eponyme of a Samian school of rhapsodists, who flourished in later times under the name of Creophylians, it were fruitless to inquire.¹ The above tradition may at least reasonably be interpreted to the effect that he, or the author of the poem whoever he may have been, was considered to have inherited the talent which produced it, and in so far the work itself, from the author of the Iliad. Another similar case is that of Thestorides, who purloins the Little Iliad and passes it off as his own. Others of the Homeridæ have however a more distinct historical character, as will be seen when treating in detail of themselves and their works.

2. When collected and arranged in later times, this body of poems, of which unfortunately but few fragments remain, was found, inclusive of the Iliad and Odyssey, to comprise a more or less continuous series or Cycle of epic history, concentrated around those two works. That series, as defined by Proclus², an antient critic of good authority, extended "from the origin of Earth and Heaven, through the history of gods and men, down to the death of Ulysses ;" to the period, that is, immediately preceding the Dorian conquest of Peloponnesus, which terminates the mythical or heroic age of Greece. It obtained accordingly the collective name of Epic Cycle, and the authors of the separate works that of Cyclic poets.¹ The term Cycle, literally circle, was habitually used in the scientific Greek vocabulary in a variety of senses, all, however, referable to the same fundamental analogy of the geometrical figure to which it primarily attaches. That figure may be defined, a line drawn from a certain point, at an equal distance from another point or centre, until it returns to the point from which it started. The most familiar metaphorical adaptation of the phrase is to the revolutions of the heavenly bodies, whose motions, after a long periodical course, actually do bring them back to the same apparent point whence they set out. By a certain latitude of analogy, any series of events hinging round a common centre or pivot was figured under the name of Cycle or circle. In this latter sense the term was applied to the Homeric poetry, with reference to the Iliad and Odyssey, as centre both poetical and historical of the series. The epoch of the first familiar application of the term in this sense is doubtful. It may, however, be presumed to date from the earliest period at which the Greek public became alive to any degree of continuity or comprehensiveness in the series, or to the intimate dependance of its members on the Iliad and Odyssey. That dependance is chiefly remarkable in the poems devoted to the Trojan war, the more immediate and proper subject of Homeric celebration, which were in fact concentrated around their two great prototypes, to all appearance intentionally by their authors. This fundamental portion of the series comprised so notable a period of Greek heroic history, as readily to suggest the extension of the title to other works, treating in the same Homeric style subjects of previous or subsequent fable. The Cycle however, familiarly alluded to by the critics of later ages, has been supposed, and with apparent reason as will be seen in treating of the contents of the separate poems, to have been the result of a subsequent more methodical redaction of these original materials. This object was effected partly by a selection, from the whole body, of such as carried on the course of events in the most agreeable form and continuous order, partly by subjecting those so selected to alteration or curtailment, in order to avoid repetition, or secure a more easy transition from one head of subject to another. Of the epoch or author of this compilation no distinct notice has been preserved.¹ It has however been ascribed by a distinguished modern commentator, on plausible grounds, to the Alexandrian grammarian Zenodotus, who, it is certain, undertook a collection and ar-

¹ No distinct allusion occurs to an epic "Cycle" prior to the Alexandrian era. But as the phrase seems to have been applied at an earlier period to the popular prose cyclopædias of mythological lore, it may probably have been common to the poetical sources from which those repertories are compiled. The ambiguous tenor of the appeals by classical authorities to these and other "Cyclic" compilations of various kinds, has been a source of some difficulty in the attempts to elucidate that here in question. 3. The number and character of the works comprised in the collection have been, in the absence of any authentic catalogue, a subject of much difference of opinion; and there is scarcely an epic poem of respectable antiquity but has found a place in some one or other of the proposed lists.² This accumulation of Cyclic poems has been made on a two-fold misapprehension of the nature of the collection: first, as having formed a complete encyclopædia of fabulous history; secondly, as having been made up of materials promiscuously drawn from the whole early epic literature, without distinction of subject or style. The Cycle, it is certain, was never meant to form, nor consistently with that continuity of matter which is described as one of its characteristic properties³, could it have formed, any such complete repertory of popular mythology. All the existing data on the subject, some of which are sufficiently precise, tend to establish that the Cycle followed the course of mythical history by a single Homeric line of route, overlooking, or at least but episodically touching on, such events as lay beyond that line. These notices are also practically borne out by the fact, that all the poems attested by good authority as having formed part of the collection, are described as works either of Homer himself¹ or of poets immediately connected with his school. Not one of them can be traced to Hesiod, or can otherwise claim an independent non-Homeric originality of authorship. That the Cycle was a more or less definitely circumscribed and limited body of poems, also clearly results from the remark of Athenæus concerning Sophocles: "that he so greatly delighted in the Epic Cycle as to have borrowed whole dramas from its contents."² Had it formed a complete digest of the popular fable, this remark would obviously be pointless. There could hardly in that case have been room for selection, and the same might have been said of any other tragic writer.

The more essential qualifications therefore, entitling to a place in the collection, seem to have been the two following. First, that the poem should bear some near relation to the Iliad and Odyssey. This relation might consist either in the subject having been episodically treated in their text; or in its forming an appropriate link in the series of mythical legend of which they formed the centre, and of which the other most important stage was occupied by the Thebais and Epigoni, the poems which, next to the Iliad and Odyssey, enjoyed the highest claim to Homeric honours. The second condition was, that the subject should be treated more or less in Homeric style; that it should consequently present or aspire to a certain Homeric unity of action, distinct from the dry method of the Hesiodic or logographic schools of epic art, the productions of which were little more than metrical chronicles of events, or genealogies of heroes.

Of the more general statements on the subject, the subjoined, from an anonymous but apparently critical quarter¹, is the most pointed. "The Cyclic poets are those who treated, in a circle round the Iliad, the events of previous or subsequent history, as derived from or connected with Homer's own immediate subjects of celebration." The same essentially Homeric character of the collection is implied when the "Cycle," sometimes in its collective capacity, sometimes viewed by uncritical authors of a lower age as a single poem, is enumerated among the "works of Homer."² A like inference results from the description by Æschylus of his own dramas, most of which were founded on the poems of the Cycle, as "fragments from the great banquet of Homer."³ Hence Horace defines the "Cyclic poet of old," with a sneer at his imitative spirit, as "one who sang the Trojan war."⁴ The joint Theban and Trojan character of the collection is elegantly described by Lucretius, where, with evident allusion to the primitive poets of the regular epic order, or in other words the Cyclic poets, he asks:⁵

Quur supra Bellum Thebanum et funera Trojæ,
Non alias aliei quoque res cecinere poetæ:

4. The subjects accordingly of the individual poems which, by reference to any valid authority, possess claims to a place in the series, appear to have been limited to the Trojan and Theban wars; with the more important collateral vicissitudes of Troic or Bœotian history; and with such an amount of the earlier theological element of fable, as was required to complete the entire course of mythical events specified by Proclus in his definition of the Cycle.¹ A list is here subjoined: Titanomachia, Europia, Œdipodia, Thebais, Epigoni, Œchalia, Cypria, (Iliad), Æthiopis, Little Iliad, Ilii-persis, Nosti, (Odyssey), Telegonia.²

The titles of these poems from the Cypria downwards, forming the part of the collection devoted to the Trojan war, have been preserved, together with a concise epitome of the contents of each, in the Chrestomathia of the same Proclus³ to whom we owe the greater part of the more exact data on the subject. This portion of the list therefore may be considered as complete, in so far as representing the later grammatical redaction or adjustment of the series; for such, there can be little doubt, was the form in which the Cycle was familiar to Proclus. From other collateral notices we are enabled, as will be seen in treating of the poems of the Troic portion of the series, to supply the more serious deficiencies observable in his Epitome, as compared with the original text of those works. The first or Theban part of the list, on the other hand, may appear but meagre to those who adopt the older more popular view of the widely comprehensive character of the collection. Yet there is no hiatus between the different heads of subject even in that part of the list, but what might be made good by the usual Homeric plan of episodical enlargement or retrospective narrative. Other poems may possibly have been comprised besides those enumerated. The list however, contains all that can be admitted on critical evidence, and must therefore remain for the present the sole authentic basis of future researches. The specific grounds of admission in each case will be explained in treating of the separate poems. In the theological element of the collection, it has commonly been assumed that a Theogonia and a Gigantomachia, as well as a Titanomachia, ought to have found a place. This view rests, partly on the general statement of Proclus that the Cycle comprehended the history of the gods from the nuptials of Uranus and Terra downwards; partly on the assumption, that in a collection supposed to embody a complete system of heathen mythology, two such important heads of matter could not have been excluded. In the absence however of all distinct allusion to a Cyclic poem on either subject, it will be safer to acquiesce, as regards the Theogony, in the view of a distinguished modern critic¹, that this preliminary stage of mythical history, in so far as admitted at all, was incidentally treated in the Titanomachia. It seems very doubtful how far the genealogical, or the properly Hesiodic element of divine history could have fitly entered, in the form of principal subject, into the Homeric Cycle, the whole remaining materials of which were of the properly heroic order. The explanation, on the other hand, of the causes of the celestial contest, which could hardly have been wanting in the Titanomachia, afforded ample opening for the incidental introduction in its text, of such genealogical notices as could with propriety have found place in its action. Accordingly, several of the extant fragments of the poems are devoted to such details. As to the supposed Cyclic Gigantomachia, no such adventure, in the grand cosmogonical form which it assumes in the latter fable, or as distinct from the Titanomachia with which it is sometimes confounded, seems to have been recognised in Homer's mythology.

While in the popular usage of the lower period of antiquity the whole Cycle is ascribed in general terms to Homer, certain of its members, besides the Iliad and Odyssey, seem to have possessed a more special claim to Homeric origin and character. These were, the Thebais, Epigoni, Œchalia, Cypria, and Little Iliad. This may be partly a tribute to their superiority of Homeric style or merit, partly owing to the greater obscurity which involved the names of their real authors. Each of the three latter works was however also provided in the tradition with its separate author, whose name seems alone to have entered into consideration, where the origin or merits of its composition were brought under critical discussion. The Thebais and Epigoni remain anonymous, unless in so far as popularly ascribed to "Homer."

In the following more detailed notice of the individual poems, it is proposed to offer, in the first place, a concise abstract of the contents of each in succession, with a notice of its reputed author or authors. The merits or peculiarities of their composition will be reserved for illustration in a subsequent page.

TITANOMACHIA (EUMELUS, ARCTINUS).

Titano-
machia (Eumelus, Arctinus).

5. The Titanomachia is quoted by Athenæus as a Cyclic poem, and is variously assigned by him and other critics¹ to Eumelus of Corinth and Arctinus of Miletus. To the latter, the acknowledged author of the Æthiopis and Ilii-persis, attention will be directed in treating of those works. To Eumelus is further ascribed the Europa, the next poem of the series; and he enjoys a place among the accredited authors of the Nosti. His name is also connected with various other works possessing no apparent pretension to a Homeric character. Pausanias² is of opinion that, in his own time, no epic poem of Eumelus was extant. If therefore, as there is no reason to doubt, this portion of the Cycle was preserved entire down to that period, the latter part of the second century, it follows that the same critic must have rejected the claim of Eumelus to the composition of the Titanomachia, or of any other Cyclic poem. The only work ascribed to Eumelus still extant in the time of Pausanias, and the genuine character of which he admits, was the Prosdion, or Processional hymn to the Delian Apollo, composed for the Messenians on occasion of their solemn mission and sacrifice to that deity, and of which he quotes two lines in Æolo-Doric dialect. Upon internal grounds, chiefly from the parallel of that hymn, he is also inclined to consider this poet as author of the verses on the Chest of Cypselus.³ These, with other non-Homeric compositions attributed to Eumelus, will form the subject of more special consideration, in treating of the miscellaneous epic literature of this period.¹

Eumelus was of illustrious birth, son of Amphilytus, the chief of the distinguished Corinthian family of the Bacchiadæ², who then held sovereign sway in their native city. The highest date assigned to him by chronologers is 761 B. C. (Ol. iv. 4.), the lowest about 730 (Ol. xii.).³ His composition of the Delian Prosodion connects his epoch with that of the first Messenian war, which commences in the received chronology about 743 B. C. As Arctinus, the rival claimant to the Titanomachia, belongs to the same or a still more remote period, the fact of the poem having been ascribed by respectable authorities to one or other of these authors, and never to any poet of more recent date, is good argument of its genuine antiquity.

The main subject of the Titanomachia, as the name implies, was the overthrow of the Saturnian dynasty by Jupiter, and the defeat and banishment to Tartarus of the elder branches of the royal family of heaven. That the episodes however, or retrospective notices, embraced a wider range of cosmogonical history, may be inferred from the narrative of the events of the same war in the Theogony of Hesiod; admitting, as is probable, the general features of the tradition, as followed by each poet, to have corresponded. With Hesiod both the causes and vicissitudes of the contest, stand in the closest poetical connexion with the previous course of divine history, from the dethronement of Uranus and Terra by their son Saturn, downwards. Several of the more prominent heroes of the war were Saturn's elder brothers, who had been imprisoned in Tartarus by their father Uranus, retained in prison by Saturn, and released by their nephew Jupiter, to act as his allies in the struggle for their common emancipation from the Saturnian rule.¹ One of these Titans was Ægæon or Briareus, the same hundred-handed monster who, in the *Iliad*², afterwards defends Jupiter against a conspiracy of his own family. Here was, therefore, an appropriate field for epic enlargement on the earlier vicissitudes of celestial history. The name of Ægæon accordingly occupies a prominent place in the few preserved passages of the Titanomachia.³ He is there represented as a sea-god, son of Pontus and Terra, and as name-father, it would appear, of the Ægæan sea. Hence Homer, in the *Iliad*⁴, describes the sea goddess Thetis as the friend to whom Jove was indebted for the services of the invincible Titan. With Hesiod on the other hand, Briareus is made son of Uranus and Terra, nor does he bear the additional name of Ægæon as with Homer. Yet his connexion with the sea seems to be indicated, though doubtfully, in the Theogony.⁵ The divine genealogy of the Titanomachia differed also from that of Hesiod, in describing Uranus (the Heaven) as son, not of Terra (the Earth), but, with more propriety certainly, of Æther.¹ The few remaining verses of the poem, while marked by much of the primitive character to be expected from the age of Eumelus, are in an easy and agreeable epic style. The description however, in one of these fragments, of Jupiter after his triumph, "dancing in the midst of the divine circle,"² does not afford a very high idea of the dignity with which the general subject was treated.

EUROPIA (EUMELUS).

6. The amour of Jove with the daughter of Phœnix, and its consequence, the settlement of Cadmus in Bœotia, may be presumed to have formed the main subject of this poem. While offering a compact bond of epic unity for the structure of a Homeric epopee, these are the first and most important transactions recorded in the terrestrial, as distinct from the purely theological department of Greek heroic mythology. They afford, consequently, a most appropriate transition from the divine to the human class of adventure, in the same direct line of Theban history, which in the Cyclic compilation enjoys so marked a preeminence. Although, therefore, there is no direct testimony to the fact of the Europa having formed part of the Cycle, yet the circumstance of its only accredited author, Eumelus, being a reputed contributor to the compilation, added to the above points of internal evidence, constitutes at least a plausible title to a place.³ Accord-

³ We are at a loss, therefore, to see why Welcker (Ep. Cycl. pt. i. p. 40.) should have set aside the claim of this poem to a place in the Cycle, on the ground of its partaking in no degree of the heroic character. He ingly, the few extant citations or fragments¹, while proving the Bæotian tenor of the subject, also imply the author's deference to the fable of Homer. Amphion was described as the first human performer on the lyre, which instrument he had received as a present from its inventor Hermes. The magic powers of the hero's music in attracting the stones for the structure of his Theban metropolis², were also described. The affairs of Dionysus were introduced, more especially the assault of Lycurgus, son of Dryas, on the god, the details of which adventure were narrated precisely as in the Iliad.³ Dionysus, with his attendant "nurses," was described as pursued with whips or ox-goads by the infuriated Thracian; as plunging terror-struck into the sea; and as hospitably received and entertained by Thetis in her marine dwelling; while Lycurgus, as in Homer, was struck blind for his impiety.

CEDIPODIA (CINÆTHON).

Cedipodia
thon).

This poem, as its name denotes, celebrated the next most remarkable epoch of Theban history, and by means of a moderate amount of retrospective episode, would carry on the Cadmean chain of heroic adventure with a sufficient degree of epic continuity. Its further claim to a place in the collection rests, partly on the circumstance of its reputed author, Cinæthon⁴ of Lacedæmon¹, having been a Homeric poet of some celebrity, to whom were ascribed several other ascertained members of the collection; partly on the correspondence between the version it preferred of the history of Œdipus, and that authorised by Homer.

Among the more celebrated chapters of Greek heroic fable, there are few which appear under a greater diversity of detail than that devoted to the calamitous history of the son of Laius. The main particulars of his fate, as known to or recognised by Homer, have been concisely but distinctly narrated in the Odyssey, and in a supplementary passage of the Iliad.² In the Odyssey, among the heroines whose ghosts appear to Ulysses, is "the mother of Œdipus, the beautiful Epicasta, who was unwittingly involved in the grievous sin of espousing her own son, himself equally unconscious of their common crime, or of his previous guilt as murderer of his father. But the gods forthwith brought their offence to light among men; when the heroine passed at once down to the realm of Hades, suspended by her own hand from a beam of her palace. But Œdipus, though tormented by the Furies of his mother, continued, for such was the stern will of the gods, to reign over the Cadmeans in Thebes, where he was honoured at his death³ with sumptuous funeral rites."

The more popular Attic version of the fable differs widely from the Homeric legend. In the former the mother of Œdipus is called Jocasta, and the crime of herself and son, instead of being brought to light immediately after its commission, and as immediately followed by her death, remains concealed until after the birth of four children, the fruit of the incestuous alliance. The remaining details of the same version, the reckless despair and self-inflicted blindness of the old king, his migration to Athens, his friendly reception by Theseus, and death in the sanctuary of the Athenian Eumenidæ, are not only repugnant to the mythology of Homer, but redolent in many of their details of the spirit of a lower age of mystical superstition. The whole or the greater part of them may, from internal evidence, safely be traced to the same source in which so many other innovations on the primitive mythology originate; the anxiety of the early Attic poets to secure their own country a place in the heroic mythology, more worthy of her historical celebrity than that assigned her in the older national legends.

Scanty as are the remains of the Œdipodia, or the allusions of the antients to its contents, they yet suffice to prove that its tradition harmonised with that of Homer. That it recorded, like the Odyssey, the speedy and fatal termination of the incestuous alliance, appears from its having described the four children of Œdipus as offspring, not of Epicasta, but of *Eurygania*¹, another Theban heroine, whom he espoused after the death of his mother. As this tradition is also at variance with that which describes his deposition and expulsion from Thebes, we may safely assume that in the Œdipodia, as in the Iliad, he continued to enjoy his royal authority in his native metropolis to the day of his death. The same tradition was followed out, as will appear in the sequel, by the Thebaïs, the next and most illustrious member of the Bœotian subdivision of the Cycle. This version is also obviously in better keeping with the spirit of the age in which the legend had its origin and of the Greek religion, than that preferred by the Attic dramatists, where the sons of the incestuous marriage succeed to the throne of their deposed parent. National feeling would assuredly have turned from the issue of an impious crime with as great abhorrence as from its involuntary author; and the citizens who banished the father as a polluted object from his throne and country, would have been even less likely to submit to the sway of his incestuous offspring.

The fragments of the Œdipodia afford no sufficient data for judging of its mode of dealing with its highly poetical stock of materials, beyond the few particulars to which attention has just been directed.

THEBAÏS AND EPIGONI.

7. These two poems¹ have been allotted a place in the Cycle in every notice of its contents. The Thebaïs is the one among the secondary productions of the Homeric school, which advances the earliest and strongest claim to genuine Homeric honours. The Epigoni also passed vulgarly current as a work of Homer from a remote epoch, as appears from the doubt expressed by Herodotus of its real claim to that distinction.² There is this further peculiarity in the case of both these poems, among others enjoying a similar distinction, that although nowhere in the more critical notices of the antients actually attributed to Homer, they are never, at least by extant authorities, connected with the name of any other poet.

“The war of the Argives against Thebes,” says Pausanias¹, “was the greatest ever waged between nations of Hellenic race, during what is called the heroic age. The Argive army which marched into Bœotia from Peloponnesus, comprised also the forces of the Arcadian and Messenian allies of king Adrastus; while the Thebans were assisted by the Phocians and Phlegyans. In the first battle, near the temple of the Ismenian Apollo, the Thebans were defeated, and took refuge within their city walls. The Argives attempted to take the town by storm, but being little skilled in the art of siege, were thrown into disorder by the impetuous fury of their own assault, routed, and driven back. The Thebans in their turn resolved to act on the offensive, and sallying forth, defeated and dispersed the hostile force. Adrastus alone among its leaders escaped alive. The Thebans themselves however suffered so severely in the conflict, and so fatal were the ultimate consequences of their triumph, as to have caused the phrase, ‘Cadmean victory,’ to pass into a proverb² for any temporary success involving the future ruin of those by whom it was achieved. Not many years afterwards the Epigoni, as the Hellenes call them, sons of the slain chiefs, invaded Bœotia with a still more powerful host, comprising, in addition to their former allies, the Corinthians and Megarians. The Thebans were again beaten in the first battle, and those who escaped again took refuge in the town, which was however this time taken and sacked by the Argives. This war is celebrated in the poem called Thebaïs, which Callinus and other good authorities have ascribed to Homer, and which is the best epic work, in my opinion, after the Iliad and Odyssey."

From this passage, collated with notices to a like effect derived from other sources¹, it appears that the Thebaïs and Epigoni were often considered as one work, under the common title Thebaïs, with reference to the seat and object of the war in the wider sense. The first portion of the poem, describing the muster and march of the forces, also bore, in honour of one of the leading heroes, the separate title of the "Going forth of Amphiaraus," which by a similar synecdoche seems to have been occasionally extended to the whole work.² This peculiarity occurs, as will be seen, in the case of other poems of the Cycle, where the connexion between two heads of an extensive subject, each individually possessing sufficient scope and unity of action to form a separate epopee, was such as to admit of their being perused in one continuous narrative, like the separate members of a dramatic trilogy.

Expedition of Amphi-
araus.

The Thebaïs, in the more restricted sense, is said to have comprised seven thousand lines.³ The fol-

The original term Ἐξέλασις here obviously alludes, not so much to the expedition, or march of this hero, in his capacity of leader or guide of the armament, as to his final decision, after long refusal and delay, to take the field with the confederates, who either would not, or dared not, embark on the enterprise without him.

lowing, by reference to the fragments and other more authentic existing data¹, was the general outline of the action.

The undutiful and insulting conduct of Eteocles and Polynices towards their father Œdipus, during the latter years of his afflicted life, at length provokes him to pronounce his malediction against them. He had forbidden his meals to be served upon the table or with the eating utensils of his father Laius, shunning the painful remembrance of the events which had caused their possession to devolve on himself. This injunction the young men in a spirit of wanton mockery disobeyed, when the indignant parent uttered the solemn curse, responded to by the guardian deities of the paternal rights: "that neither should enjoy his birthright in peace, but that their lives should be passed in perpetual strife and bloodshed."² The denunciation was repeated, in still more emphatic terms, and with equally dire effect, on another similar occasion, when, in the distribution of a sacrificial feast, the brothers, in the same spirit of mockery, allotted to their parent the knuckle, instead of the more honourable portion of the victim. He then supplicated "Jove and the celestial host, that they might perish by each other's hands."³

After the death⁴ of the old king, his sons quarrel for their share in the royal authority. It had been agreed that each should enjoy the supreme power for the period of a year, in alternate succession. Eteocles, at the expiry of his first year's reign, provoked by some aggressive measures on the part of Polynices, and backed by a strong popular feeling in his own favour⁵, refused to resign the throne to his brother. Polynices, unable with his present resources to assert his privilege, retires from

Thebes in search of foreign alliance, and fixes his residence at Argos. He there marries the daughter of king Adrastus, whom he persuades, together with his own brother-in-law Tydeus, to espouse his quarrel. Accompanied by Tydeus he visits and secures the services of other Peloponnesian princes; though some of the more powerful hold back, forewarned by the gods of the disastrous issue of the expedition.¹

Among these princes was Amphiaraus, one of the most celebrated heroes of his age, both as a warrior and a soothsayer.² On the first proposal of the expedition he foresaw its fatal issue. After vain attempts to dissuade his more rash and reckless fellow-chiefs, he refused to take part, and concealed himself, to avoid their importunities. His absence shed a gloom over the prospects of the enterprise, which could only be dispelled by his accession and countenance. His wife Eriphyle³, bribed with a golden necklace by Polynices, discovers his hiding-place; when, moved by the entreaties of his friends, his own martial ardour, and the shame of alone standing aloof from what had now taken the form of a national undertaking, he consents. Aware however of the perfidy of his wife, he binds his two sons Alcmaeon and Amphilocheus, then of tender age, in the event of his death, to avenge his fate on their treacherous mother, adding much sage advice as to their future conduct in life.⁴

The army musters in the plain of Nemea, the Aulis of the Thebaid.⁵ The country being afflicted with drought, and the troops suffering from want of water, Hypsipyle, nurse of Opheltes the infant son of Lycurgus king of Nemea, who happened to be taking the air with her charge in the neighbouring forest, conducts the chiefs to a fountain. During her absence, the babe, which she had deposited in a retired spot, is bitten by a serpent and dies. The warriors sympathising with the distress of the parents, celebrate games in honour of the royal infant, whose fate, as the "commencement" of the ensuing series "of dire occurrences," obtained him the surname of Archemorus.⁶ Amphiaraus avails himself of this inauspicious omen once more to warn his fellow-chiefs of the disastrous lot which awaited them, but once more in vain. On reaching the river Asopus, Tydeus is sent ambassador to Thebes, to claim restitution of the rights of Polynices, before commencing hostilities. The hero fails in his mission; but finding the inhabitants engaged in public games, he enters the arena, and defeats every competitor.¹ The Cadmeans, inflamed with jealousy and anger, post an ambush of fifty men to destroy him on his return. But he kills the whole band, with the exception of one², spared to report the fate of his comrades to their employers. In the first engagement the Thebans are defeated and fly to the city, which is vigorously but unsuccessfully assaulted. Menoeceus, son of Creon and nephew of Jocasta, offers himself up a voluntary sacrifice, in fulfilment of an edict of the Delphic oracle, which required the death of a prince of the royal blood to insure victory to the national arms.³ In the sequel it is agreed to decide the quarrel by a single combat between the two brothers⁴, who perish by each other's hand, as their father had foretold. A great battle ensues, in which the Argive army is defeated. During the rout the earth opens and swallows up Amphiaras with his chariot; an honourable death conferred by Jupiter on his prophet, lest he should fall by the steel of a mortal warrior.⁵ All his fellow-chiefs are slain, with the exception of Adrastus, who, after having found means during the night hurriedly to perform the obsequies of his comrades⁶, escapes alone, by the swiftness of his horse Arion.⁷

The tradition of the Thebaid seems, from the above details, to have corresponded, in whole or in part, introduced in the Thebais. But the performance by the heroes of the Nemean games, with which it is connected, is vouched for by Pind. Nem. viii. in fin.; Paus. x. xxv., ii. xv.; conf. Propert. ap. Welck. Ep. Cycl. pt. i. p. 202.; Apollod. iii. vi. 4.

From Pausanias (ii. xx. 4.) it would appear that the poetical restriction of the number of leading heroes to seven, though corresponding to the Homeric number of the city gates, was not recognised by the Thebais. with that of Homer and of the Œdipodia, both as to the mother of the sons of Œdipus, and as to the fate of their father after the discovery of his crime. The conspiracy of the two princes to torment or oppress the old king, while it shows that he continued, as with Homer, to reign at Thebes instead of retiring to Athens, is also more consistent with their being the issue of a later lawful marriage, as in the Œdipodia, than of an incestuous connexion. A pair of unfeeling ambitious sons, on attaining man's estate, would thus, with equal inclination, have had better pretext for such conduct, than had they themselves been tainted with so dark a stain of unnatural pollution.

It seems further evident, even from the scanty notices preserved, that at the period when the poem opens, Œdipus was still in ostensible enjoyment of the sovereign authority, and that one chief motive for the unnatural conduct of his sons was to hurry on his death, or coerce him into abdication of the throne. Of his blindness there is no trace. Both the general tenor of the narrative, and certain expressions in the extant fragments, imply that he was still in possession of his eyesight.¹ Of the legend preferred in the Thebaïs relative to his ultimate fate there is no distinct notice. But there seems no reason to doubt that in that poem, as in the Iliad, he was represented, although exposed to the undutiful treatment of his sons, as living and dying a sovereign, rather than as deposed and imprisoned by the rival princes, according to the conjecture of some modern commentators.

This poem was ascribed to "Homer" by the very antient poet Callinus¹, by Propertius, and by other popular authors of different ages, it may be presumed also in the popular sense²; for it was certainly not ascribed to the Homer of the Iliad and Odyssey by Aristotle, Aristarchus, or any other strictly critical authority.³ How far it may have merited any such honour will be considered in a subsequent page.

Epigoni.

8. The Epigoni, or second subdivision of the Thebaid, comprising, like its predecessor, seven thousand lines⁴, seems, in regard to the general outline of its action, to have been little more than a meagre counterpart of the previous adventure. There was this difference however, that the divine favour, and with it the fortune of the war, had now turned on the side of the Argives, although inferior in numbers to their defeated ancestors.⁵

Adrastus, the surviving chief of the Thebais, instigates Alcmaeon, Diomed, and other distinguished warriors⁶, sons of the slain heroes, to revenge the death of their parents. Another army is collected and invades Bœotia. The Thebans, again defeated in the first action, again shut themselves up in their city, which is besieged and taken.⁷ Tisamenus, son of Polynices, is appointed king, as successor to his father. Adrastus dies of grief for the loss of his son Ægialeus⁸, slain before his eyes, and the Argives return triumphant to Peloponnesus.

There is no evidence that the renewed treachery of Eriphyle, towards her sons, as formerly towards her husband (Apollod. iii. vii. 2.), entered into the plot of the Epigoni.

Into the details of the composition we possess little or no insight; and but a single fragment, the opening verse of the poem, has been preserved. Allusion occurred to the Hyperboreans¹; to the dedication of Manto daughter of Tiresias, at Delphi; and to her subsequent migration with the remains of her father to Colophon in Asia Minor.²

The interval of time³ between the main action of these two poems must have been considerable, the junior race of warriors being represented in the tradition as of tender age, by Homer as children⁴, at the time of their fathers' death. Yet, as already remarked, both poems are occasionally classed by the antient critics as one. It may be presumed therefore, that the connexion of events was maintained by episodes or retrospective allusions through the whole period. The poems of the Cycle hitherto examined thus present a single series of subjects, carried, in a single order of succession, from the origin of things to the close of the second Theban war. The commencement of the Cypria, the first poem of the ensuing Troic series, also aptly takes up the close of the Epigoni. One might thus be tempted to assume, that the subjects comprised in the Cycle were limited to the Titanomachia, or divine element of heroic mythology, and to the Theban and Trojan wars in the stricter sense. This limitation seems also, in some degree, to be implied in the allusion of the antients formerly cited to the intimate connexion between these three branches of Cyclic history. In a matter however, where so much must, at the best, remain doubtful, it will be preferable to abide by the principle above suggested, of admitting into the list every epic poem classed by trustworthy authorities as belonging to the Homeric school of heroic composition. To this plan it might perhaps be objected, that any such extension of the historical element of the collection, would interfere with its fundamental principle of chronological continuity. But, although that principle would have been completely set aside by so great an accumulation of materials as some have proposed, the occurrence of partially collateral lines of narrative, of kindred tenor and conceived in the same common spirit of Homeric minstrelsy, might have varied in an agreeable manner, rather than disturbed, the historical symmetry of the compilation.

The only poem which, in following out this partial extension of the range of subjects, existing data warrant our interposing between the strictly Theban and the Troic portion of the compilation, is

THE SACK OF ŒCHALIA (CREOPHILUS, CINÆTHON).

Sack of Œchalia (Creophilus, Cinæ-
thon).

This work, also familiarly called the Œchalia, while involving but a slight, if any interruption of the line of epic continuity, has the advantage of connecting the affairs of Hercules, the greatest of Theban heroes, with the Theban series of Cyclic narrative. The Œchalia is also, with the exception of the Thebais, the most celebrated Homeric poem unconnected with the Trojan war. The relation between the work and its author is figuratively defined in the legend, common to several other poems of the same class, of its having been composed by Homer, and presented by him to a friend, or son-in-law, who passed it off, in this instance with the sanction of the donor, as his own. The person thus honoured was the same Creophilus of Samos, of Chios, or of Ios, as variously reported, who acts so prominent a part in the popular biographies of the poet.¹ This frequently recurring text in those biographies is burlesqued, in his usual lively manner, by Lucian in his "True History." The satirist there describes himself as having, while on a visit to the other world, been presented by Homer with an epopee on a late war between the Blessed and the Damned, the latter of whom had succeeded in breaking out of their place of confinement.

This poem narrated the siege and destruction by Heraclea. Hercules, of Æchalia, a mythical city frequently mentioned, together with the prowess and misfortunes of its royal family, in both the Iliad and Odyssey.² The work is also occasionally alluded to under the title of Heraclea³; and has hence been conjectured, with apparent reason, to be the same as the Heraclea attributed by some authorities to Cinæthon⁴ of Lacedæmon, and which appears to have treated the same portion of the hero's adventures. As Cinæthon claims, conjointly with Creophilus, the authorship of the Little Iliad, it naturally suggests itself that their common pretensions may also have extended to the Æchalia. This more general title of Heraclea, with the tenor of some of the few extant

² Homer knows but one Æchalia, in Thessaly. Il. ii. 730. With this passage those of Il. ii. 596., Od. viii. 224. xxi. 14., are quite in harmony, though often erroneously supposed to allude to a Messenian city of the same name. Pausanias (iv. ii. 2.) implies that the Æchalia of the Cyclic poem was situated in Eubœa.

notices of the contents of the poem, favours the view that, by means of episodes, it may have comprised a more or less ample summary of the Theban hero's life and adventures. The following seems to have been the outline of the principal action.¹

Eurytus, king of Œchalia, the most celebrated bowman of his day, had challenged all Greece to a trial of skill in his favourite art, and promised his daughter Iole in marriage to the first successful competitor. Hercules came off victorious, but was refused the stipulated prize. In revenge of the insult and breach of faith, he besieges and sacks the city, and carries off Iole. As this was the last exploit of Hercules, being immediately followed by his death on Mount Œta, and as that catastrophe was a consequence of Dejanira's jealousy of the captive princess Iole, it becomes the more probable that the closing scenes of the hero's life were comprehended in the action of the poem.

The natural place for the Œchalia in the Cycle, upon the principle of exact continuity, and in accordance with the more accredited fabulous chronology, would be between the Thebais and Epigoni, in the interval between the first and second Theban wars. The epochs however, of the second war and of the siege of Œchalia so nearly coincide in the mythical chronology, that, in any more methodical adjustment of the members of the series, it was perhaps as likely that the compiler would sacrifice the historical to the poetical order of continuity, and bring the Theban section of his materials to a close before passing on to the Heraclea.

9. For the illustration of the ensuing most important division of the Cycle, celebrating the Trojan war and its consequences, we possess, as already stated, a valuable and specific guide in the Epitome of the grammarian Proclus. That Epitome however, as also above remarked, appears to represent the later artificial adjustment of the poems, in which they had been subjected to partial retrenchments, and possibly alterations. It offers consequently several gaps or deficiencies, as collated with the notices derived from other earlier authorities. The mode of treatment here adopted will therefore be to constitute the abstract of each poem, as given by Proclus, the basis of the following summary of its probable contents, adding the substance of such quotations of its text by other authorities as accord with that abstract, and reserving such as differ for future consideration.¹

Troic series.

CYPRIA (STASINUS, HEGESIAS).

A conference is held between Jupiter and Themis relative to the Trojan war, which, it is decreed, shall take place, in order to relieve Earth of the superabundant population under which she groaned.² The Goddess of Strife is sent to sow discord among the deities assembled at the nuptial feast of Peleus and Thetis³, the solemnities of which are described. Chiron bestows on Peleus, as a marriage gift, the spear with which Achilles afterwards fought at Troy.⁴ Juno, Minerva, and Venus compete for the palm of beauty. The dispute is carried for arbitration before Paris⁵, who, bribed by Venus with the proffered possession of Helen⁶, gives the award in favour of the Cyprian goddess. Helen is described as daughter of Jupiter and Nemesis; and the amour to which she owed her birth is detailed at some length.⁷ Paris, on the suggestion of

⁷ Frg. v. For the mode in which Helen is supposed, in this version of

Venus, prepares for his visit to Sparta, and she persuades her son Æneas to accompany him. His brother Helenus and sister Cassandra predict the fatal consequences of the enterprise. He is hospitably received at Lacedæmon by Menelaus and the Tyndaridæ, and ingratiates himself with Helen by precious gifts. Menelaus sails for Crete, recommending his guest to the courteous treatment of his queen during his absence. With the aid of Venus, Paris effects the seduction of his hostess, and she embarks with him for Troy, carrying off her most valuable effects.¹ Driven from their direct course by a storm, they arrive at Sidon, which city Paris assaults and takes. On his subsequent arrival at Troy, he espouses his mistress. In the meanwhile her brothers, the Tyndaridæ, are detected plundering the cattle of Idas and Lynceus, neighbouring chiefs of Peloponnesus. The twin heroes take refuge in the hollow trunk of an oak, where they are discovered by Lynceus, and Castor is slain.² But Lynceus and his brother Idas fall in their turn by the hand of Pollux, who shares his immortality with Castor.³ Iris announces to Menelaus the elopement of his wife. He holds council with Nestor and Agamemnon, after which he sets out with Nestor on a progress through Greece to collect allies among its chiefs.⁴ The feigned madness of Ulysses is detected by Palamedes.

The armament musters at Aulis. Calchas interprets the omen of the snake and sparrows.⁵ Crossing the Ægæan, the Greeks attack and destroy the Mysian city of Teuthrania, mistaking it for Troy. Telephus, coming to the assistance of the town, kills the Theban prince Thersander, son of Polynices⁶, and is himself wounded by Achilles. The fleet then sailing from Mysia is dispersed by a storm. Achilles, landing on the isle of Scyros⁷, marries Deïdamia daughter of Lycomedes, who bears him a son called Pyrrhus, afterwards surnamed Neoptolemus. Telephus, in obedience to an oracle, solicits and receives a remedy for his wound from Achilles, by whom he is retained as guide to a second attempt on the Troad.

The fleet again assembles at Aulis. Agamemnon on a hunting party, elated by an expert shot at a deer, boasts that he surpasses

Diana herself in her own art. As a punishment for his impiety, the goddess detains the fleet wind-bound. Calchas pronounces that she can only be appeased by the sacrifice of Iphigenia, daughter of Agamemnon.¹ The princess is accordingly brought from Mycenæ, under pretext of betrothal to Achilles. Diana, at the moment when the fire is lighted, snatching her from the altar, and substituting a fawn in her stead, transports her to Tauris, and confers on her the gift of immortality.

The fleet then sails for Tenedos, touching at Lemnos, where Philoctetes² is bitten by a snake, and left behind, owing to the stench of his wound. Coldness arises between Agamemnon and Achilles. The Trojans resist the landing of the force. Protesilaus³ is slain by Hector, but the Trojan army is routed by Achilles. The Greeks, after vain negotiations for the recovery of Helen⁴, invest the city, and ravage the surrounding country. Achilles conceives a desire to see Helen, which is gratified through the agency of Venus and Thetis. The Greeks, longing to return home, are restrained by Achilles, who captures the oxen of Æneas⁵, sacks Lyrnessus, Pedasus, and other neighbouring cities⁶, kills Troilus⁷, captures Lycaon, and sells him as a slave in Lemnos.⁸ Briseïs, taken by Achilles in the sack of Pedasus⁹, is allotted to him as his own share of the conquered spoils; Chryseïs to Agamemnon.¹⁰ Palamedes, while fishing in the sea, is treacherously drowned by Ulysses and Diomed.¹¹ A scarcity which afflicts the camp is relieved by a visit of the "Cenotropæ," who supply the troops with corn, wine, and oil.¹² Jove resolves on affording present relief to the Trojans, by detaching Achilles from the cause of his countrymen. The poem concludes with a catalogue of the Trojan forces.

The Cypria is described in the popular legend as an original production of Homer¹³, bestowed by him as a marriage dowry with his daughter's hand on a Cyprian friend, called in the more accredited accounts Stasinus, by others Hegesias.¹ The Halicarnassians also claimed the author of the work as their fellow-citizen. An equal obscurity attaches to the title Cypria. Those who ascribed the poem to a native of Cyprus, derived its name from that island, in which colonies from different parts of Greece were established at an early period. By others it was supposed to have been conferred in honour of the Cyprian goddess, as the chief mover of the action. Perhaps both views might be reconciled, by assuming a Cyprian poet to have preferred a subject tending to the glory of his native deity. That the Homeric poetry was popular in the island from an early date in her festivals, may be inferred from various fragments of hymns in the Homeric collection.² The Cypria comprised eleven books³; the number of lines is not recorded.

THE ÆTHIOPIS (ARCTINUS).

Æthiopis
(Arctinus).

10. The Amazon Penthesilea, arriving in aid of Priam, is slain by Achilles, and honoured with a public burial by the Trojans. Thersites, taunting Achilles with impure love towards the deceased heroine, is killed by that hero. His death causes dissensions in the camp. Achilles sails to Lemnos, and, after sacrificing to Apollo, Artemis, and Latona, is purified of the blood-stain by Ulysses. Memnon next arrives to the succour of the besieged city, armed in a panoply the gift of Vulcan. Thetis foretells the influence of the Æthiopian hero's presence on the war. Memnon slays Antilochus.⁴ Achilles revenges the death of his young friend by that of his destroyer.⁵ The Æthiopian hero receives the boon of immortality from his mother Aurora.

contest ensues for his body, which is borne off the field by Ajax, while Ulysses stems the advance of the Trojans.¹ The funeral rites of Antilochus are solemnised, and the corpse of Achilles is laid out, preparatory to the same honours being conferred upon him, when Thetis and the Nereids perform his funeral dirge.² Thetis then transports his body to the island of Leuka. The Greeks raise a tumulus, and celebrate games in his honour. In the course of the solemnity, strife arises between Ulysses and Ajax concerning the deceased hero's arms.

The Æthiopis, in five books³, was the undisputed composition of Arctinus, son of Teles of Miletus, a reputed "disciple" of Homer⁴, and the same who, with Eumelus, also shares the credit of the Titanomachia. The epoch of Arctinus is placed almost unanimously by the chronologers about the commencement of the Olympic era, 775—761. He was accordingly held, by competent authorities⁵, to be the most antient poet of whose historical existence any distinct trace could be recognised.

Among the epic poems attributed by Suidas⁶, and Amazonia. by Suidas alone, to Homer, is an Amazonia. This notice is unaccompanied by any comment, nor does allusion occur elsewhere to a poem of the name. Concerning its subject therefore, nothing more can be gathered from this single authority than that it was what the title implies, a War or Enterprise of the Amazons. Five such adventures are celebrated in the heroic age: first, the Expedition of Hercules against Hippolyta; secondly, the defeat of the heroines by Bellerophon⁷; thirdly, their invasion of Attica, and their defeat by Theseus; fourthly, their invasion of Phrygia, and defeat by Priam and his allies¹; fifthly, the succour afforded by them to the same Priam under their queen Penthesilea, as described in the first part of the Æthiopis. That the latter adventure is the one treated in the Homeric Amazonia of Suidas; that "Amazonia" is, in fact, with that author, but another title of the Æthiopis, there can be no reasonable doubt. As in the same catalogue of Homeric poems Suidas designates the Thebais, by reference to the first part of its action, the Going forth of Amphiaraus, by a similar synecdoche he entitles the Æthiopis Amazonia. And this view is confirmed by the circumstance, otherwise not easily accounted for, that while the Æthiopis, one of the most celebrated poems of the Troic series, is, under its own ordinary title, omitted by Suidas, its proper place in the list, between the Iliad and Little Iliad, is precisely that assigned by the same compiler to the Amazonia.²

(LESCHES, THESTORIDES, CINÆTHON, DIODORUS).

Little Iliad (Lesches, Thestorides, Cinæthon, Diodorus).

The competition between Ulysses and Ajax for the armour of Achilles, is decided in favour of Ulysses by the award of the Trojan women³, to whose judgement, by Nestor's advice, it had been referred, and who are overheard, while conversing on the wall of the city, ascribing the highest honours to the Ithacan warrior in the late contest for the deceased hero's body. The duty performed by him, of stemming the adverse tide of battle in the rear, is pronounced by them more noble than that undertaken by Ajax of bearing off the corpse.⁴ Ajax, in the phrenzy of his disappointment, vents his fury on the cattle of the army, which he mistakes for its warriors, and then destroys himself.⁵ Agamemnon refuses his body the just rites of sepulture.⁶

Ulysses captures Helenus the Trojan seer. In accordance with a prophetic announcement of the latter hero relative to the future fate of the city, Diomed transports Philoctetes¹ from Lemnos to the camp, where he is healed of his snake-bite by Machaon. Paris is slain by Philoctetes. His body is contumeliously treated by Menelaus, but the Trojans, in the sequel, obtain possession of it, and perform its funeral obsequies. Deiphobus², son of Priam, espouses Helen. Ulysses transports Neoptolemus from Seyros³ to Troy, and delivers over to him his father's arms. Achilles appears in a vision to his son. Eurypylos, son of Telephus, arrives as ally of the Trojans, and after killing Machaon the physician, and other valorous exploits, is slain by Neoptolemus.⁴

The Trojans are again blockaded in the city, when Epeüs, instigated by Minerva, constructs the wooden horse.⁵ Ulysses in mean disguise enters Troy as a spy. Recognised by Helen, he consults with her as to the capture of the city⁶, and, after dispatching several Trojan warriors, returns in safety to the camp. In the sequel the same hero, accompanied by Diomed, carries off the Palladium⁷ from Ilium. The Greeks now garrison the horse with their best warriors, burn their tents, and retire to Tenedos, feigning an abandonment of the siege. The Trojans, deceived by the stratagem, admit the horse into the city, despite the prophetic remonstrances of Cassandra, and institute festivities in honour of their deliverance.⁸

The above epitome, in four books, embraces, as will be seen hereafter, but a part of this poem as known to Aristotle.⁹ The work was reported in the popular legend to have been composed by Homer, together with another entitled Phocais¹⁰, at Phocæa in Ionia, for his host Thestorides of that town, who afterwards passed it off as his own. author was Lesches, or Lescheos, son of Æschylenus of Pyrrha, in the isle of Lesbos.¹ By some it was ascribed to Cinæthon of Lacedæmon², already mentioned as one of the reputed authors of the Œdipodia and Œchalia; by others, to Diodorus of Erythræ. Lesches, according to the more accredited accounts, flourished in the first half of the 7th century. Of Diodorus or his age no specific notice is preserved.

ILII-PERSIS (ARCTINUS).

Ilili-persis
(Arctinus).

The Trojans deliberate on the disposal of the wooden horse³, some wishing to destroy it, while others would consecrate it as a trophy to Minerva. The latter counsel prevails, and, during the subsequent rejoicings in honour of the national deliverance, Laocoon, by whom that counsel had been opposed, is destroyed, with one of his sons, by two monstrous serpents. Æneas, alarmed by the omen, retires with his followers into Mount Ida.⁴ Sinon lights the beacon, announcing to his countrymen the success of their stratagem. The Greek warriors, issuing from their ambush, open the gates to their comrades, and after a bloody combat obtain possession of the city. Priam, seeking refuge at the altar of Jupiter Herceus, is slain by Neoptolemus. Menelaus kills Deiphobus⁵, and carries off Helen to the fleet. Ajax Oileus, dragging Cassandra from the sanctuary of Minerva⁶, overturns the statue of that deity. The Greeks, indignant at the sacrilege, are about to stone its author, who saves himself by flight to the altar of the goddess.

Ulysses kills Astyanax, and Neoptolemus secures Andromache as his captive.⁷ Æthra⁸, the mother of Theseus and slave of Helen, is delivered over by Agamemnon to her grandsons Demophon and Acamas. Arctinus, the poet of the Æthiopis, also enjoys an exclusive title to the authorship of this poem.² Its action, comprising two books according to the Epi-tome, is identical in substance with that of the Lay of the Trojan Horse, sung by Demodocus in the Odyssey.³

NOSTI (AGIAS, EUMELUS).

11. Minerva promotes a strife between Agamemnon and Menelaus⁴ concerning the course of the voyage home. Agamemnon remains behind to propitiate the displeasure of the goddess, while Diomed, Nestor, and Menelaus embark.⁵ The fleet of Menelaus is shattered by a storm, and with five ships, which alone escape its fury, he visits Egypt.⁶ Calchas, Leontes, and Polypœtes⁷, with their followers, proceed by land to Colophon, where they perform funeral solemnities in honour of the Theban seer Tiresias.⁸

(Agias, Eumelus).

As Agamemnon is about to set sail with his division, the shade of Achilles appears and predicts the disasters of the voyage. A storm assails the fleet at the Capheridan rocks, where the Locrian Ajax perishes.⁹ Neoptolemus, by advice of Thetis, proceeds to Phthia by land across the Thracian continent, and at Maronea of the Ciconians¹⁰ meets Ulysses. On reaching home, he performs the obsequies of Phœnix, and afterwards journeys to Molossia, where he is received and recognised by his grandfather Peleus. Agamemnon is slain by Ægisthus and Clytemnestra.¹¹ Orestes¹² and Pylades avenge his death. Menelaus returns and resettles peacefully at Lacedæmon.

That poems celebrating the Nosti, or "Return of the Greeks," already existed in Homer's time, appears from the lay bearing that title, sung by the Ithacan bard Phemius, in the Odyssey.¹³

There can be no doubt that the Cyclic Nosti is the same poem cited by Athenæus under the title of "Return of the Atridæ." Its reputed epoch fluctuates, like that of most other members of the collection, within the first century of the Olympic era. The author with whose name, setting aside the conventional claims of Homer¹, the work was most generally coupled, was Agias of Trœzene, a poet of uncertain date.² It was also, more doubtfully, assigned to Eumelus of Corinth; and, by some, to an anonymous poet of Colophon.³ It contained allusions to scenes or adventures in Hades, in connexion, it may be presumed, with the funeral rites of Tiresias. The heroines Mæra and Clymene, celebrated in the Descent of the Odyssey, were mentioned. The version given of the punishment of Tantalus differed from that preferred by Homer, in describing the famishing voluptuary as debarred from the enjoyment of the dainties exposed to his view, by an enormous stone suspended over his head.⁴ Allusion was made to the future marriages of Telemachus to Circe, and of Telegonus, son of Ulysses by Circe, to Penelope.⁵ The history of Medea was also incidentally treated, with the magic effects of her caldron upon Æson.⁶ The poem was divided into five books.⁷ But a few unimportant lines have been preserved.⁸

THE ODYSSEY.

THE TELEGONIA (EUGAMMON, CINÆTHON).

The obsequies of the suitors are performed by their friends. Ulysses, after sacrificing to the nymphs¹, sails to Elis, to visit his herds on that coast, where he is entertained by Polyxenus.² He then travels to examine the celebrated works of Trophonius, Agamedes, and Augeas, and returning to Ithaca, solemnises the rites enjoined by Tiresias in his interview with that seer in Hades.³ He next crosses into Thesprotia⁴, where he marries Callidice queen of that country, and takes the command of her troops in a war against the Bryges. His army is put to flight by Mars, who engages in single combat with Minerva; but the rival deities are parted by Apollo. Upon the death of Callidice, Polyxenes, her son by Ulysses, succeeds to her dominions, and the hero himself returns once more to Ithaca. About the same time, Telegonus, his son by Circe, wandering in search of his father, disembarks on the island and ravages the coast. Ulysses, attacking the invaders, falls by the hand of his son.⁵ Telegonus, on discovering his involuntary parricide, transports his father's corpse, together with Penelope and Telemachus, to the island of his mother, who confers upon them and himself the gift of immortality. In the end, Telemachus espouses Circe, Telegonus Penelope.

Telegonia
(Eugammon, Cinæthon).

The Telegonia (in two books) was ascribed, by Proclus and the general tradition of the antients, to Eugammon of the Spartan colony of Cyrene in Africa, an author of the comparatively recent date of Olympiad LIII.⁶ (566 B. C.), and the latest contributor to the collection. The more antient Homeric bard, Cinæthon of Lacedæmon, is mentioned, though on somewhat slender authority, as author of a poem chiefly, it would appear, paraphrases or imitations in prose or verse of the Cyclic poem. But the citations of their text are sufficiently distinguished by internal evidence from those referable to the original Nosti.

under this title¹, but whether the same, or another which had not survived to historical times, seems not very clear. Eugammon lay under a charge of pirating his Telegonia from a work entitled Thesprotia, which was ascribed to the fabulous poet Musæus²; although with the same authorities, that celebrated minstrel flourishes several centuries prior to the events treated in the Telegonia. No remains of this poem have been preserved.

Epitome of Proclus compared with other notices of the Cyclic

12. Before entering upon any closer analysis of the respective merits or defects of the separate poems of the Cycle, attention must be directed somewhat more narrowly to the question already briefly noticed: How far the foregoing epitome of the Troic series can be held to represent the works it comprises in the form in which they emanated from their authors. At the commencement of this head of subject it was stated to be doubtful, whether, in the compilation of poems habitually quoted from the Alexandrian era downwards under the name of Cyclic, the individual works may not, where their respective materials interfered with each other, have been subjected to alteration, for the sake of that historical continuity³ which authorities describe as the characteristic feature of the collection. These doubts rest mainly on certain discrepancies, between the Epitome of Proclus and other earlier notices of the contents of several of the poems abridged in that document.

The Little Iliad closes, in the Epitome, with the reception of the wooden horse within the city walls. Aristotle¹ however, and other valid authorities², represent the same poem as comprehending the whole subsequent series of events down to the sack of the city and reembarkation of the Greeks for their own country, much as given in the work of Arctinus, which occupies the next place in the series. The poem of Lesches, according to those authorities, described the lighting of the beacon torch by Sinon; the capture, sack, and firing of the city; the meeting of Menelaus and Helen; the murder of Astyanax by Neoptolemus (not Ulysses, as in Arctinus); the capture of Æneas and Andromache by the same Neoptolemus, and their transport as slaves to Thessaly; the recognition of Æthra, mother of Theseus and slave of Helen, by her grandsons Demophon and Acamas; with other encounters and incidents of the last fatal night of the city, and the subsequent preparations for the embarkation and return of the Greeks. It appears therefore, that the compiler of the Cyclic collection³, finding two poems, or rather integral parts of poems, devoted to the same adventure, had admitted that by Arctinus as the one best suited to his purpose, and suppressed that by Lesches, even at the cost of mutilating the entire work to which it belonged.

As an apology for this proceeding it might be urged, that there is reason to believe that the "Sack of Troy" by Lesches, though usually comprehended under the common title of the Little Iliad, may have partaken from the first somewhat of the nature of an independent poem. The case would be similar to that of the Thebais, which name, while denoting in stricter usage but a portion of the Theban war of succession, was occasionally extended to the whole. Upon this view, the omission of the Ilii-persis of Lesches, in deference to that of Arctinus, while in some degree requisite to give order to the series, could hardly expose the compiler to any very serious charge of tampering with the integrity of his stock of materials.

Another similar difficulty occurs in regard to the Æthiopis. The Epitome of that poem concludes with a simple notice of strife having arisen, during the funeral solemnities of Achilles, relative to the disposal of the arms of that hero. The Epitome of the Little Iliad, accordingly, as next in order, takes up the subject where that of the Æthiopis left it, with the competition between Ulysses and Ajax for the arms. Yet from various authorities it appears, that the original Æthiopis described the same competition and its consequences, down to the death of Ajax.¹ Another commentator however, quotes a bulky fragment of Arctinus descriptive of the latter event, not from his Æthiopis but his Ilii-persis.¹ This would seem to imply that the subject, interrupted at the close of the former poem, had been resumed and completed at the commencement of the latter. But in the Epitome, the Ilii-persis of Arctinus, without any mention of the affairs of Ajax, opens where the Little Iliad closes, with the Trojan council relative to the wooden horse. The Robbery of the Palladium is also stated by many authorities to have been narrated by Arctinus.² It finds however no place in the Epitome either of his Æthiopis or Ilii-persis. Here, again, as in the parallel case of Lesches, this ambiguity of citation favours the surmise of modern commentators, that the titles of Æthiopis and Ilii-persis, with that of Amazonia formerly alluded to, originally belonged to one great poem by Arctinus³, commencing where the Iliad finished, and concluding with the fall of the city. The analogy would thus be complete between the triple subject and title, Amazonia, Æthiopis, Ilii-persis, and the Thebaïc series formerly noticed, Going forth of Amphiaras, Thebais, Epigoni. Each series would have formed a great epic trilogy, where the name of the principal part was occasionally used as common to the whole.

From the details above given therefore, it further results, that the central portion of this great poem or series of poems by Arctinus, the portion namely which comprised the Competition for the Arms, Death of Ajax, Robbery of the Palladium, and other intermediate transactions between the funeral of Achilles and the sack of the city, had been omitted in the artificial adjustment of the Cycle, to make way for the first part of the Little Iliad of Lesches, which treated of the same events; just as the latter part of that poem, devoted to the "Destruction of Troy," was discarded in its turn, to make way for the Iliopersis of Arctinus.

Of actual alteration, as distinct from curtailment, of the text of the original poems in the Epitome, but a single example can be elicited by a collation of earlier and weightier authorities. Herodotus¹, among his reasons for not admitting the Cypria as a genuine work of Homer, mentions the discrepancy between that poem and the Iliad, in their respective accounts of the voyage of Paris and Helen from Lacedæmon to Troy. In the Iliad, he observes, the fugitives are described as taking a circuitous course by Sidon, while in the Cypria their passage home is performed direct in three days. But in the Epitome of the Cypria, the account of this transaction tallies substantially with that given in the Iliad. No satisfactory explanation of this anomaly suggests itself. As the single solitary instance of its kind, it cannot, in the face of so singular a harmony between the Epitome and other collateral authorities in an infinity of other cases, be attributed to any wilful tampering with his materials on the part of the author of that compilation. It is more probably the result of oversight in the adjustment of his copious fund of Homeric tradition, derived from so many secondary as well as primary sources.

The following then, is the general result of the foregoing scrutiny of the various conflicting data relative to the composition and contents of the poems of the Troic series.

There can be no reasonable doubt that the outline of the Cypria, as given by Proclus, represents the original extent of the action; as being in unison both with the notices supplied from other sources, and with the evident scope of the author of the poem, to furnish a prelude or introduction to the Iliad.

The Æthiopis, according to the limits assigned it in the Epitome, terminates with the obsequies of Achilles; according to collateral authorities, it comprised also the Competition for the Arms and Suicide of Ajax. The Ilii-persis of the same poet, commencing in the Epitome with the adventure of the Trojan Horse, according to other authorities with the death of Ajax, extends to the destruction of the city and reembarkation of the Greeks. But on the supposition above adverted to, that these two works formed but separate parts of one comprehensive poem, the whole subject thus treated by Arctinus would have ranged from the conclusion of the Iliad down to the fall of Troy, as an epic trilogy, under the three titles of Amazonia, Æthiopis, and Ilii-persis.

The Little Iliad may, on a similar balance of authorities, be considered either as an integral work, commencing with the contest between Ajax and Ulysses for the arms, and terminating with the fall of the city; or as combining two distinct but nearly connected poems, like the Thebais and Epigoni. In this latter case, the first part would conclude with the feigned departure of the Greeks, the second would describe the catastrophe consequent on their return.

Regarding the limits of the original Nosti and Telegonia there exists no discordance of authorities ; they may therefore safely be taken as in the Epitome.

Critical estimate of the poems.

13. With so slender a stock of internal data for estimating the poetical value of these productions, the safest groundwork of critical speculation will be the recorded verdict of those native critics who, with all the necessary aids to guide their opinions, rank as the highest authorities in such questions. Upon the whole, it must be admitted that the balance of this evidence is by no means favourable. While the title of "Cyclic Poet" is in itself one of very ambiguous distinction, the specific allusions to the different poems are not calculated to inspire any high notion of the credit in which they stood among the antients. It is true that, owing to their near connexion with the Iliad and Odyssey, the opinions concerning them are chiefly expressed in the way of contrast with those two works, and that a fair amount of excellence may have been compatible with a considerable falling off from such standards. Their lightness in this comparative scale might also seem, in some degree, to be counterbalanced by the mere fact of their having been themselves popularly accredited as compositions of Homer. It were however certainly somewhat extraordinary, had they been distinguished by any higher poetical excellence, that with the exception, if it be one, of the qualified allusion of Pausanias to the Thebais, not one of them should have been noticed by a single antient critic in terms of distinct and unequivocal eulogy.¹

The most tangible criteria for testing their value are supplied by the passages of Aristotle's Poetics, illustrative of the peculiar excellences by which that great master of the critical art held the Iliad and Odyssey to be jointly distinguished from all other works of the same class. The properties on which he chiefly dwells are, unity of whole, combined with variety of detail in the action; and a preference of the dramatic or mimetic to the narrative style of exposition. For the better elucidation of the mode and extent in which these properties are displayed, he appeals, in the way of contrast, to the epic poems ranking nearest in character and merit to the Iliad and Odyssey. These important texts are here subjoined, as forming in themselves a concise commentary on the Cyclic school of poetry, and supplying consequently an indispensable basis of any more specific estimate of the individual poems.

Judgement of Aristotle.

"A subject is one, not, as some suppose, from its merely relating to the affairs of one person, for an infinite number of adventures, offering in themselves no unity, might befall a single hero; and in the same way, one man might perform many exploits not capable of being combined into a single action. Hence all those poets are at fault who have composed Heracleïds and Theseïds, or other similar poems; for they imagine that because Hercules was one their subject must also be one. But Homer, excellent as he is in other respects, has here also displayed his usual fine tact, whether acquired by art or bestowed by nature. For in composing an Odyssey, he has not introduced all the eventful transactions of his hero's life . . . but such alone as ranged themselves around that one action which we now call the Odyssey; and so also in regard to the Iliad."²

"In epic as in tragic poetry, the subject must be dramatically treated, and concentrated around a single action, united and complete, with beginning, middle, and end, so as to come home to the apprehension with the effect of one entire living being. It is not sufficient, as in ordinary prose narrative, for the connexion of different events under one head, that the mere time of their occurrence should be the same, while there may be in other respects no bond of union between them; or that they should be narrated in continuous succession, although in respect to their scope and object they may stand in no immediate relation to each other. Such, however, as we have already observed, is the method which almost all other poets have followed. The divine genius of Homer alone appears rising superior to all, in that he does not attempt to place before us the whole Trojan war; for that subject, although presenting (historically) a beginning, a middle, and end, would, if treated in its integrity, either have formed an overgrown and unwieldy action¹, or, if restricted and condensed in the execution, would have been overcharged with matter. He prefers, therefore, selecting one part and diversifying it with numerous episodes. Other poets indeed, also treat of one person, one time, and one action, but comprising many parts; as, for example, the authors of the Cypria and Little Iliad. Hence the materials of the Iliad and Odyssey supply subject each for but one, or perhaps two tragedies. From the Cypria on the other hand may be derived many; from the Little Iliad about eight or more: the Competition for the Arms, the Philoctetes, Neoptolemus, Eurypylus, Ulysses Mendicant, Lacænxæ, Ilii-persis, Apollus, Sinon, Troades."²

cation to individual
poems.

14. The terms in which the critic's test of unity is here applied to the Cypria and Little Iliad are somewhat ambiguous, as compared with our collateral knowledge of the contents of these poems. That they treat of one time and one action can only be true in so far as, like ordinary prose histories, they carry a continuous series of occurrences — an action of "many parts," as Aristotle expresses it, — through a corresponding course of time. The Cypria in fact, judging from the Epitome, must have partaken much of the nature of a metrical chronicle of events, during the thirty years from the nuptials of Peleus to the quarrel of Achilles and Agamemnon. It has a beginning, no doubt; but it can hardly be said to have a middle in the poetical sense, there being no adventure which can rank as an epic climax or culminating point; and so far is it from having any just poetical end or catastrophe, that the conclusion is but a sudden interruption of the main stream of the action, lest it should interfere with the commencement of the Iliad.

The poem of Lesches, comprising in Aristotle's edition also the "Destruction of Troy," is not certainly so deficient in unity as the Cypria. It takes up the subject of the Trojan war after a really important crisis, the death of Achilles, and continues it through a limited but eventful period to the fall of the city, the catastrophe of the whole. It has, therefore, historically speaking, both a beginning and end. It wants, however, the "middle," that is, any one prominent climax or crisis connecting the extremities and cementing the general course of the action. The accumulation of events within the few weeks allotted to that action is also, upon Aristotle's own just principle, as incompatible with poetical unity as the extension of the Cypria over a quarter of a century. The contest for the arms, the death of Paris, and the arrival and exploits of Neoptolemus, though belonging to the same historical series, have obviously no real epic connexion with each other, or with the stratagem of the horse and fall of the city.

The portion however of the text of Aristotle most difficult, in its literal sense, to reconcile with the actual structure of these two poems, is the apparent admission of unity in regard to the Person of their respective heroes, or Protagonists. In the Epitome or other extant notices of their contents, neither work can be said to offer a single character possessing any such prominence. At the commencement of the Cypria, Paris appears as the chief actor; but no sooner is Helen safely housed in Troy, than he retires from the scene. After a brief ascendancy of Menelaus, Achilles steps in and assumes the same precedence which belongs to him in the Iliad. Aristotle could hardly have assigned the functions of protagonist to Venus, who however active at the outset, also retires into the background at an early stage of the history. In the Little Iliad Ulysses appears as a principal actor, but still without any trace of poetical connexion in his performances; and his ascendancy must certainly have yielded to that of Neoptolemus, on the appearance of the latter hero in the field. The expression of Aristotle therefore, "one person one time and one action," in the above text, must be interpreted generally, to the effect that one or other rule might be observed even consistently with an otherwise defective treatment; not that all three rules were actually adhered to in the poems selected as examples.

In carrying on the same test to the other more distinguished members of the Cycle, attention is first called to the Thebais and Epigoni. Overlooking the closer poetical connexion which seems to be established between these works by the antients, and classing each, for the purpose of this inquiry, as a separate epopee, neither can be said to lie open to serious objection, either as to the limits or connexion of its subject. It must, therefore, probably be owing to the defects of treatment, that they have, the Thebais more especially, been tacitly included in the censure of the Stagirite critic. Of the justice of that censure, our slender insight into the precise order of the events of the Thebais, how far they may have been treated in methodical succession from the curse of Œdipus downwards, how far distributed and interlaced in the relation of principal subject and episode, prevents our forming any clear judgement. The part of protagonist seems however to have been wanting or but ill defined. It is at least difficult to determine, from existing sources, whether the honour belonged to the sons of Œdipus, one or both, to Amphiaraus¹ or to Adrastus; or whether it was shared by each party in common or in succession. The action of the Epigoni is open rather to the charge of poverty than defective unity. The events it comprises are few and meagre, amounting in fact to little more than a skeleton of those treated in the latter portion of the Thebais.

The Æthiopis, judging from the abstract of its contents in the Epitome, was a mere metrical history of the life of Achilles, from the close of the Iliad to his death, without any apparent Aristotelian bond of epic integrity. His victory over Penthesilea, murder of Thersites, and retirement to Lesbos, stand in no poetical connexion with his triumph over Memnon. Nor does the catastrophe of his own death, by the joint agency of Paris and Apollo, with his funeral and apotheosis by Thetis, however natural a conclusion to an Achilleïs, stand in any other relation of unity to the previous events, than what Aristotle defines as the mere historical train of succession. If on the other hand the subject, as some authorities imply, was originally carried beyond the death of Achilles to the contest for his arms and suicide of Ajax; or if, according to a third hypothesis, the original work of Arctinus, comprising both his Æthiopis and Iliipersis, brought down the events of the war from the close of the Iliad, in one continuous series, to the fall of the city, it would still more completely merge the character of epic poem in that of metrical chronicle.

The action of the Iliipersis, considered as a single poem, according to the outline of the Epitome is simple and united. No such unity of person can, however, be discovered. The adventures and influence of Neoptolemus, Ulysses, and Menelaus, judging at least from existing data, assume in their turn a prominence equally entitling each hero to the honour of protagonist for the time being.

The Nosti has little pretension to unity of any kind. The very title, by its plural formation, seems in some degree to exclude that property. By reference to the Epitome, Agamemnon, Menelaus, and Neoptolemus, may each lay nearly equal claim to the honour of principal actor, and their adventures to that of principal subject. The secondary title however, of "Return of the Atridæ," would imply that the action was meant to be concentrated around the destinies of those heroes.

The Telegonia performs the same duty by the hero of the Odyssey as the Æthiopis by Achilles, conducting him through a desultory train of action or suffering to his death in his native island, by the hand of Telegonus. That hero, in his turn, is brought into fatal collision with his father by another totally distinct series of adventures on his own part. This poem, forming the conclusion of the Troic series, and of the whole Cycle, ranges through a period of ten or twelve years, the longest occupied by any other but the Cypria, which forms the commencement of the same series.

15. Neither the existing means of insight into the contents of the remaining members of the Cycle, nor their individual importance in the scale of epic literature, render it expedient to extend this analysis to the nicer mechanism of their poetical structure. It remains however, still taking as guide the text of Aristotle and the standard of Homer, briefly to consider the subordinate details of execution or style in the above more celebrated members of the collection. Among the more prominent features of excellence pointed out by Aristotle, as distinguishing the Iliad and Odyssey from other poems of their class, is the dramatic or imitative spirit of their action. "Homer," he remarks, "admirable as he is on so many other accounts, is no less so in that he alone, among poets, has rightly understood what belongs to his own office. For the poet himself ought to say as little as possible, or he would not be, as he ought to be, an imitator of nature. Other poets are accustomed to appear, as themselves the entire managers of the action, leaving little or nothing to imitative art. But Homer, after a brief preamble, introduces at once a man or woman, or some other personification of nature, and always in the most natural and characteristic manner."

The scanty remains of the Cyclic poems can afford but little either of practical confirmation or confutation, of the stigma here indirectly thrown by Aristotle on this common defect of their epic style. But such amount of internal evidence as they supply goes far to support his authority; the extant verses in which the poets appear to speak in their own person, being in the ratio of about six or seven to one of such as can be assumed to have been placed in the mouths of their actors. On several even of the former occasions, the author seems to be introduced repeating the speeches of his heroes at second-hand; informing the reader of what they had said or done, in cases where Homer would unquestionably have imposed on them the duty of speaking for themselves. But even were the proportion of dialogue far greater in these fragments, it would afford but an imperfect index of the dramatic style of the entire works. The criterion of Aristotle, it is evident, consists in requiring the heroes not merely to act and speak their own parts, but also to support their respective characters with spirit and nature.

In regard to some other points of poetical management, taste in the selection and propriety in the treatment of descriptive or illustrative details, the existing remains and notices of the poems afford, even apart from any appeal to the judgement of the antients, considerable scope for criticism.

The Thebais, pronounced by Pausanias the best epic poem in his opinion next to the genuine works of Homer, offers, both in matter and expression, several low and offensive images. Such was the provocation which called forth, on two successive occasions, the direful curse pronounced by Œdipus on his sons. This provocation, the immediate cause of the whole mighty war of extermination, consisted : first, in their having, in disobedience to their father's commands, served up his meal on the table equipage of their grandfather ; secondly, in their having on another occasion, set before the old king as his share of the banquet, the knuckle, instead of a more honourable portion of the animal. It might here perhaps be urged in apology, that such images, in the legend of a remote semibarbarous age, are not to be judged by the same severe standard as in the literature of civilised periods. Motives in themselves comparatively unimportant or undignified assume, it might be said, a different character when estimated in the spirit of national manners and religion. But this apology, however valid as regards the tradition itself, supplies little or no justification of the poet. His judgement ought to be displayed in the choice, as well as the treatment, of his materials ; in either avoiding or ennobling, what is mean or commonplace in the rude elements of his subject.¹ No similar degree of importance has been, or ever could have been attached, (unless in a burlesque sense) to any such incidents by the author of the Iliad, although a poet of an earlier and consequently still ruder age than that which produced the Thebais. One of the most admirable features of Homer's muse is, in fact, the fine taste with which, in the serious element of his subject, he has preferred, among the varieties of the popular legend, those most conducive to the ideal dignity of his heroes. Doubtless many of the more offensive or grovelling traits in their character or conduct celebrated by his successors of the Cycle, such as the murder of Palamedes by Diomed and Ulysses¹, that of Thersites by Achilles, the stench of the wound of Philoctetes, or the slaughter of the sheep by Ajax, may have been familiar to Homer also in the current traditions. But such materials are either rejected by him altogether, or reserved for the humorous element of his narrative. The figure employed by Amphiaraus, in the solemn parting advice to his son Amphilochus as to his future conduct in life, affords also no very favourable impression of the illustrative imagery of the Thebais.² The young man is counselled, in order to ingratiate himself with those among whom he lives, and attach them to his interest, to imitate "the cunning art with which the polypus allures and grasps in his claws the fish on which he preys." The style of the poem, as represented at least by the existing fragments, is also somewhat dry and laboured³, betraying little of Homeric grace or vigour. It

² Frag. Pind. p. 650. There can be little doubt, for the reasons assigned by Boeckh (conf. Leutsch, p. 52.), that this passage is paraphrased from the Thebais.

³ The first five verses of the longest extant passage (Leutsch, Rel. Theb. p. 38.; Düntz. frg. ii.) are marked by a very lame tautology in the recurrence of the commonplace terms καλόν, καλήν, αὔταρ, αὔταρ ἔπειτα. The construction of the ninth verse of the same fragment,

ὡς οὐ οἱ πατὴρ ἐνὶ φιλότῃτι δόσαντο, if genuine Greek in its present form, is also as inelegant as un-Homeric. Compare Homer's far more genial mode of expression in the closely parallel verse, 455. of Il. ix. He would here also, doubtless, have written, μή ποτέ οἱ πατὴρ ἐνὶ φιλότῃτι δάσσεσθαι.

is marked however, by a certain tinge of morbid melancholy, in good keeping with the general tenor of the subject.

Neither the remains of the Epigoni, nor the notices of its contents by classic writers, supply materials for any near estimate of its merits or defects of detail. According to some later, perhaps not very valid authorities, the absurd and unpoetical story of the Teumesian fox¹ would seem to have formed one of its episodes; which would certainly not tend to raise our opinion of the author's taste in selecting his materials.

16. The plot of the Cypria is, in its primary conception, essentially unpoetical. The woes of Terra groaning under the weight of her population; the council held in heaven for her relief; the amour of Jove with so unamiable an object of gallantry as Nemesis; and the birth of the Grecian queen of love and beauty from so offensively fantastic an alliance, while but indifferent materials even for an Orphic hymn, are utterly foreign to the genius of the heroic epopee. These mystical peculiarities of the poem, savour certainly more of the age of Pisander or Aristeeas than of Arctinus or Eumelus, and warrant the belief, that the Cypria was one of the youngest members of the Cyclic family.

Troic series.

In the details of the action, besides the stench of the wound of Philoctetes already noticed, prominence was assigned to other incidents of a trivial or offensive nature. Such are the curiosity of Achilles to behold Helen, and the joint exertions made by Venus and Thetis to bring about the interview. The blunder committed by the armament on its first expedition, in besieging Teuthrania by mistake for Troy, is also a miserable conceit. The degradation of Diomed and Ulysses, as murderers of Palamedes, from the heroic generosity of character which distinguishes them in the Iliad, has already been noticed as a grievous sin against the principles of the Homeric muse. Nor can the ensconcement of Castor and Pollux in a hollow tree to escape detection when plundering cattle, and the death of Castor in that predicament, be reconciled with the dignity of the Dioscuri or of epic composition. Another fantastically un-Homeric incident of this poem, is the visit paid to the camp by the Cenotropæ, nymphs of Corn, Wine, and Oil, as their titles Spermo, Ceno, Elaïs, denote. These heroines, by order of their father Anius king of Delos, appear in the Greek quarters during a season of scarcity, to act the part of commissaries for the supply of the troops, by converting every thing they touch into the good things figured by their names. The general tone of expression and versification in this poem, combines a considerable share of Homeric ease and spirit with a certain lightness and grace, degenerating at times into florid license, in better keeping with the Cyprian character of the subject than the dignity of epic style. It is perhaps to this, upon the whole attractive feature, that the work owes the superior popularity it appears to have enjoyed among its fellow-members of the Cycle, if indeed the length of the preserved passages and the frequency of its citation, can be held as valid evidence of any such preference.

In the Æthiopis, the murder of Thersites by Achilles speaks but little in favour of the taste or judgement of the author. It degrades the sublime protagonist of the Iliad to the level of a brutal assassin, defiling his hands with the blood of a most despicable adversary, upon whom Homer's Ulysses is content, under similar circumstances, to inflict the chastisement of a schoolboy or a slave. The poet of the Æthiopis however, is not only insensible to the meanness of the action, but so impressed with its value, as to assign it an important influence on the progress of events. Sympathy for the fate of the poor buffoon causes sedition in the army, and an interruption of the operations of the siege, by the obligation imposed on Achilles of absenting himself beyond sea. The cause of his wrath against Thersites, an imputation to him by the latter of unnatural passion for the slain Amazon, is as unworthy of the Homeric muse as the vengeance exacted. No remains of this poem are extant.

The first two verses of the Little Iliad, which have been preserved, are in a somewhat lame and pompous tone of Homeric imitation. There can be little doubt that they are the passage, or one of the passages, which Horace had in view, in his satirical description of the mode in which the "Cyclic poet of old" was wont to open his subject. Among the other fragments which have survived, the four lines of conversation between the Trojan women on the city wall, as to the comparative merits of Ajax and Ulysses, seem, with other evidence, to favour the opinion that this was a work of more homely and familiar, occasionally perhaps humorous character, than others of the series. The travesty of Ulysses as a mendicant, and his intrigues in Troy, also belong to the Odyssaic class of adventure. The scene in the wooden horse alluded to in the *Odysey*¹, which evidently partakes of the comic style, has also been supposed, on plausible grounds, to have been more fully treated by Lesches. But this consideration can hardly palliate so ludicrous and offensive an ebullition of insane fury on the part of Ajax, in the last tragic act of his life, as the slaughter of the sheep, by mistake for the warriors of the camp. To such an exploit even the countenance of Sophocles cannot impart dramatic dignity. The degradation by that poet, in the same tragedy, of the character of Menelaus from its nobler Homeric standard, may also be reasonably traced to a Cyclic source. The latter half of the action however, according to the limits assigned it by Aristotle, could hardly have admitted any tinge of the burlesque; and accordingly, the fragments connected with that part of the poem describe in gloomy and severe, though somewhat tame and prosaic language, some of the horrors of the last fatal night of the city. This apparent difference of style in the two subdivisions of the poem of Lesches, favours the view above expressed, that each may have been originally invested by its author with a certain independance of character; the lighter Odyssaic adventures being confined to the first of the two. The other fragments of this part of the text are in an easy flowing vein of versification, justifying, upon the whole, a more favourable opinion of the general style than the two lines of exordium.

In the Ilii-persis of Arctinus, the cowardly flight of Æneas from the city on the day before the assault of the Greeks, degrades the most unexceptionable Trojan character of the Iliad, no less effectually than the characters of Ulysses, Diomed, Ajax, and Achilles, are degraded in the Cypria, Æthiopis, and Little Iliad.

The single extant fragment, describing the two sons of Æsculapius and their art, is in an agreeable unaffected vein of Homeric versification.

The only offensive incidents in the Nosti, are the marriages, of Telemachus to his father's concubine, and of Telegonus to his father's widow. The few remaining lines of the text are not marked by any distinctive features of style.

The Telegonia, as it was the last both in the order of its subject and the date of its composition, was apparently the worst poem of the Cycle. While it still further debases the character of Ulysses, it closes his family history by a senseless and disgusting catastrophe. His wanton desertion, in his old age, of the virtuous Penelope, to whom, in the midst of numberless trials and temptations, he had evinced so devoted a constancy in his rampant days of youth and manhood; his bigamy with a barbarian mistress during her lifetime; and his subsequent return to Ithaca, reunion with Penelope, and death by the hand of his own adulterous offspring, form a tissue of adventures all equally un-Homeric and unpoetical. The ultimate settlement of the family by the pair of unnaturally incestuous marriages also recorded in the Nosti, with the boon of immortality conferred on the guilty parties to the exclusion of the deceased hero himself, offers a most appropriately absurd conclusion to a tasteless and extravagant narrative.

Lest the judgement here passed on the Cyclic poems, in absence it may perhaps be said, and all but unheard, should seem severe, it will be proper in conclusion to remind the reader, that it has been drawn up with immediate reference to the Homeric standard of excellence, an ordeal which they all appear to court by the very claims they advance to Homeric honours, but which few productions of any age and otherwise acknowledged excellence can sustain. It must not however be forgotten, that much of what is objectionable in theory may possess considerable merit in the execution; and many consequently of those conceptions, which in the existing outline or skeleton lie open to serious objection, may, as worked up by a fervid imagination in glowing colours, have possessed their own characteristic value, which we are now deprived of competent means of estimating. In partial illustration of these remarks, appeal might be made to the expressive gloom and melancholy, which dimly beaming through the fragments of the Thebais, harmonise so well with the spirit of the action; and to the fantastic grace and levity which, with equal adaptation to the genius of the poem, distinguish the extant passages of the Cypria.

Special relation of the poems to the Iliad and Odyssey.

17. It remains but to advert once more, with the form and character of these poems thus more fully before us, to the evidence they supply of the fallacy of the late popular theories regarding the origin of the Iliad and Odyssey. Even those who have here carried scepticism to the greatest length, have hardly ventured to maintain that all these bulky epopees, with other equally voluminous non-Homeric compositions of remote date, were, as the Iliad and Odyssey have been pronounced, compilations of fugitive ballads rather than integral works by single authors. Nor will it now probably be disputed in any reasonable quarter, after the more searching investigation to which this chapter of literary history has of late years been subjected, that several at least of the Cyclic poems date, in their integral form and compass, from a period several centuries prior to the rise of the supposed primitive system of bookmaking, to which their two great prototypes have been assumed to owe their existence. When therefore we find, with all the variety of their subjects, how carefully those among the Cyclic poems devoted to the Trojan war abstain from trespassing on the action of the Iliad and Odyssey; when we find the Cypria, at the expense of a most impotent conclusion, halting at the close of its thirty years' narrative, in what is still but the middle of its own subject, lest it should encroach on the commencement of the Iliad; when we find Arctinus taking up the thread with equal servility where the Iliad lays it down, and both Arctinus and Lesches concluding where the Odyssey commences; when we find lastly the Nosti, the only poem which ventures to interfere with the Odyssey in regard to time, carefully avoiding all encroachment on its action, running a parallel but completely independant course; when we add to this the united testimony of the antients, confirmed by the existing remains, to the imitative character of these works, and to the obsequious manner in which their authors borrowed incidental allusions or episodical details from the text of Homer, as materials for their own most important heads of action,— we cannot fail to recognise, in the earlier Cyclic poems, inferior specimens of the same order of comprehensive epopee, of which the genuine Homer had in the Iliad and Odyssey furnished the standard models. The two prototypes must by consequence emanate, in their existing substantial integrity, from a far more remote period of antiquity.

The Cyclic poets, it must also be remembered, are the same "Homerids" who in the Wolfian school of commentary, whether as amplifiers or interpolators of a more or less entire Iliad and Odyssey, figure as authors of many of the very noblest and most characteristic passages or episodes of each poem. The question then occurs: how happens it that authors who, in their subordinate capacity of botchers of existing works, stand forth as minstrels of surpassing genius, should, the moment they turn that genius to the composition of an original poem, of a Cypria for example or an Æthiopis, relapse into mediocrity or plagiarism? He must be a very indulgent, but not very discerning critic, who can believe that the united talents of the authors of all the preserved passages of Homeric epopees, passages representing, we are entitled to assume, the cream of the original compositions, should ever have produced the episode of "The Shield," the Deputation Scene of the ninth book, or the Interview between Priam and Achilles in the last book of the Iliad.

1. A HYMN may be defined a Song or Ode in honour of the Deity or other object of religious veneration. The term consequently, in familiar usage both antient and modern, is limited solely or chiefly to lyric composition. To the Lyric Hymn in the stricter sense, that is, the melic and choral orders of poetry comprised under that title, attention will be directed in the ensuing Book devoted to the lyric literature of this period. The epic or Homeric hymns however, claim on special grounds a place in its epic literature; first, owing to their immediate relation, both in origin and style, to the school of poetry from which they derive their title; secondly, as really partaking more of the epic than the lyric character.

hymns, and their various orders.

To this branch of composition tradition refers the earliest efforts of the Hellenic Muse, the works of her Olen, Orpheus, Thamyris, and other bards of mythical ages. Any general remarks therefore on the origin or distinctive properties of the hymn, might appear, on strictly chronological principles, to belong to a former chapter, devoted to the history of these mysterious personages. But the purely mythical character of those poets, and the consequent absence of all genuine materials for any practical illustration of the subject in connexion with their names, have rendered it preferable to combine its entire treatment with a period when such materials were abundantly at hand.

The Hellenic hymns may be classed under the three heads of mythical, mystical, and philosophical.

Those of the mythical order celebrate the genealogy, actions, or attributes of the popular Pagan deities, in their familiar anthropomorphic capacity.

In those of the mystical order the more recondite notions of the Divinity were expounded, as typified, either by the same popular deities under some more subtle variety of title and character, or by other essentially mystical members of the Pantheon.

The philosophical hymns celebrated the divine attributes of power, wisdom, or justice, as conceived in the schools of national philosophy. These attributes here also were frequently symbolised in the persons of popular deities to whom they were held to be peculiar, or under such other variety of moral or physical abstraction as the fancy of the individual poet, or of the sect to which he belonged, may have suggested.

To the hymns of the two latter classes, which do not, as may be supposed, always admit of being very accurately distinguished from each other, may be numbered a large proportion of those in the Orphic collection, as also of those ascribed to Linus, Musæus, and other fabulous poets. The hymns of the mythical class, to which the entire Homeric collection belongs, with the exception of one to Mars of a philosophical tendency, appear to have been composed in great part for the service of the popular religion, and recited in connexion with the rites to which, in style or subject, they were adapted; the procession, the sacrifice, the dance, or the banquet. That this however was the case with all, even of the earlier more genial among them, is little probable, from the discreditable and even ludicrous light in which the character and conduct of the deities are often exhibited in their text. Such compositions therefore as the Homeric hymn to Mercury, were probably destined less for the solemnities of the altar, than, like the Song of Demodocus in the Odyssey, for familiar occasions of festive conviviality, where the adventures of the popular objects of worship were made, like all other subjects, to contribute their share to the common fund of mirthful entertainment.

How far the mystical hymns current in the popular literature may have been destined for religious ceremonial, is also questionable. Considering the close veil of secrecy under which every thing connected with the Hellenic mysteries, in the higher sense, was shrouded, it can hardly be presumed that the odes performed in their celebration would be generally circulated, at least during the flourishing age of Hellenism. At the later period however, when the penal ordinances by which the inviolability of the mysteries was enforced became powerless, the obstacles to a promulgation of their genuine ritual might be removed; and, in so far, traces of it might be contained in the hymns of the Orphic and other similar collections. The philosophical hymns belonged, probably, at every period, to the literature rather than the religion of the nation.

Homeric
hymns.
Their claims to

2. The Homeric hymns¹, while almost exclusively of the mythical class, are also in great part of purely epic character and style. This is more especially the case with the longer hymns in the collection, those namely to Apollo, Hermes, Aphrodite, Demeter, and the first of the three to Dionysus; six in all, reckoning that to Apollo, on grounds to be considered hereafter, as two compositions, blended in the course of transmission into one. They may in fact be styled theological ballads, narrating popular passages in the lives of the deities celebrated. To the above number must be added the Song of Demodocus in the Odyssey, as being in all essential respects an epic hymn to Vulcan. It requires, indeed, but a slight variation of the introductory lines which now connect that narrative with the main action of the Odyssey, to constitute it as independant a poem as the hymn to Aphrodite or Hermes in the Homeric collection. Of the remaining shorter members of that collection, some may also in so far lay claim to the epic character, as comprising narratives of divine adventures. In most of these cases however, the historical is so subservient to the eulogist or laudatory element, as to turn the balance on the lyric side.

That the claims of this compilation², or of any por-

² Hymns under the title of "Homer," or "Homeric," including apparently the chief of those now extant, are frequently alluded to by the antients (Vit. Hom. Herod. ix.; Diod. Sic. i. 15., iii. 65., iv. 2.; Pausan. ix. xxx. 6.; Schol. Pind. Pyth. iii. 14.; Schol. Nicand. Alex. 130.) in a collective sense; and it seems not improbable that they had been digested as a separate compilation, by the Alexandrian critics or some later school of grammarians. The hymns now extant usually appear in a collective form in the existing MSS., combined however, tion of it, to emanate from the original Homer rest on no satisfactory basis, is the general, it may almost be said the unanimous judgement of the modern critical public; a judgement partly founded on the absence of competent testimony in favour of the vulgar opinion, partly on the internal evidence of the works. The most important authority in opposition to the modern opinion is Thucydides.¹ By that historian, the first hymn in the collection, addressed to the Delian Apollo, and describing its own author as the "Blind bard of Chios," has been quoted, in allusion to certain solemnities of the Delian sanctuary, as a genuine work of Homer. This opinion has also found favour with other respectable classics.² Some modern commentators would set aside this passage of the historian as a mere conventional deference to the popular opinion of the day, and involving no personal guarantee on his part of its critical accuracy. This interpretation however cannot here be admitted. So deliberate and unqualified an appeal to Homer, as a historical authority on a nice point of remote antiquity, could hardly, under any circumstances, be so construed. But the specific allusion by Thucydides to Homer's "mention of himself" in the quoted verses, is conclusive evidence that the quoter actually believed the hymn to be a genuine work of the author of the Iliad. The degree of deference due to the authority of the historian is another question. Thucydides was not a professional critic, and flourished before the grammatical art was sufficiently matured to warrant the belief that, in the course of his Homeric studies, his attention had been seriously directed to the nice distinction here involved. Nor, even in that case, could his judgement be placed in competition with the opposite verdict of the great majority of the professional grammarians and literary antiquaries of the succeeding generation.

in almost every case, with other similar works of what are called the "Minor Greek Poets." For these MSS. see Matthiæ, Præf. ad Hymn. Hom. p. ix. sqq.

That such was their verdict cannot be questioned. It is true that not only the Delian but other of the longer hymns ¹, in the ordinary appeals to their text, are quoted by respectable authors as the compositions of "Homer." But, in most of these cases, the citation may safely be taken in the familiar or conventional sense, as referring to the school rather than the person of the poet. On other occasions, they are characterised as the hymns "ascribed" to Homer; and the same Delian hymn cited as genuine by Thucydides was provided, in more critical quarters, with a distinct author in the person of Cynæthus ², a Chian rhapsodist of the 69th Olympiad. That the claims of these poems to Homeric origin were not countenanced by the Alexandrian grammarians, the highest authority in such matters, may be confidently inferred from the circumstance, that among the peculiarities of facts or phraseology pointed out as repugnant to the genuine tradition or usage of Homer, by those critics in their commentaries on the Iliad and Odyssey, several are found in the text of the hymns.¹ The familiar adage, "that the poet has nowhere distinctly alluded to himself or his concerns," were also entirely unmeaning, had the Delian hymn, the author of which describes himself as "a blind old man residing at Chios," been generally held to possess any solid pretensions to genuine character. Other negative arguments of the same kind might be accumulated. One or two will suffice, from an author of deserved reputation as a Homeric scholar and geographer. Strabo² asserts that the name Samos is never given by Homer to the island on the coast of Ionia, to which it was afterwards almost exclusively appropriated; being limited by him to the Cephallenian Samos, now Cefalonia, and to the Thracian Samos, afterwards Samothrace. The Ionian Samos is, however, mentioned under its familiar title in the Delian hymn.³ In another passage of the geographer⁴, Cnidus, also mentioned in that hymn⁵, is specified, on the same negative authority of the Iliad and Odyssey, as not yet founded in the days of Homer. The same rule of critical distinction might be extended to the names Europa⁶, Peloponnesus⁷, and other terms repugnant to genuine Homeric usage, which occur in the various members of the collection.

3. It has been conjectured by modern critics⁸, that these hymns were originally mere exordia or preambles, prefixed to other longer more regular compositions, epic or lyric, in the public recitals of the rhapsodists at the popular religious solemnities.

Among other arguments urged in favour of this view, is the occasional recurrence of certain lines of introductory or valedictory commonplace at the commencement or close of the text, intimating that the poem just recited was but a part of a series, and announcing a transition to some other object of celebration. That many of the minor compositions in the collection were of this nature might, even in the absence of more specific reasons, be inferred from their general style and tenor. Their brevity, and the abruptness of their conclusion, while scarcely compatible with the dignity of independent composition, harmonise well with the inaugural prelude to another longer poem. That such invocations were a customary preamble to the heroic song of the bard also appears, not only from the testimony of Pindar¹ and other later writers, but from the terms in which Homer in the *Odyssey*², describes Demodocus as prefacing his Song of the "Wooden Horse" by an address to some patron deity.

The extension of this theory however to the whole collection, especially to the bulky poems which form the first part of it, cannot be so readily admitted. The length and epic fulness of those poems seem incompatible with any such purpose. A short address to a popular deity might have a happy effect, prefixed to a narrative of adventures where his agency had been conspicuous : an address to Minerva, for example, before the Doloneia ; or to Hermes, before the last book of the Iliad. But to have prefaced one of these subjects by another long narrative, distinct and complete in itself, and describing other and different portions of the life and exploits of the same deity, were a breach of that propriety which distinguishes the Greeks in all that belongs to the mechanism of their literature. Appeal has been made to the title Proœmium, frequently applied by the ancients to the Homeric hymn to Apollo and to various other compositions of the same class. This title has been interpreted, according to what is no doubt its more familiar acceptation, as denoting that the compositions so designated served as introductions to other longer poems.¹ It seems however certain, that the term is here applied in a nobler and more extended sense, as indicating the first or inaugural ode of a series of similar hymns, many of which were recited in the popular national solemnities; some during the advance or procession to the sanctuary or altar, others in the course of the sacrifice, others at the sacrificial banquet, or at the close of the whole ceremonial. Hence may be explained how the title Proœmium, when employed in this more dignified sense, either in the case of the Homeric hymns or of other similar compositions, is limited solely or chiefly to those in honour of Apollo.² This evidently implies that the triumphal hymns of the god of music were habitually preferred as inaugural odes, even perhaps where the rites that followed were common to other deities. That such was the fact is further warranted by the verses³ towards the close of the Delian hymn, where the series of similar compositions at the Delian festival, in honour not only of Latona and Artemis, but of mortal heroes and heroines, is described as opened by a hymn to Apollo.¹ A like preference was awarded in later times to the Pæan, or convivial song of the same god, in the musical exercises of social banquets and Symposia. Hence also, may perhaps be explained the existing combination of the Delian and Pythian hymns into one poem, as now edited. Assuming them to have originally succeeded each other in the customary order of celebration, the one as the proœmium, descriptive of the birth and first establishment of the worship of Apollo, the other recording the spread of his influence, they might naturally, in the subsequent vicissitudes of their text, have been confounded by transcribers and editors into one. In support of this view it may further be remarked, that while the title Proœmium is familiarly applied in the extant citations to the Delian hymn, the Pythian hymn is nowhere similarly designated. The originally independent character of the regular epic hymn, is further vouched for by the authority of Homer himself in the Odyssey, where the song of Demodocus, while recited by the bard as an integral poem, is in all essential respects identical in character with the hymns of Homer's successors and imitators. Even consistently with this separate independence of character, such compositions might no doubt have been sung as

4. The six longer, more properly epic hymns of the collection, or the seven, including the song of Demodocus, all observe more or less strictly, within their narrow limits, the law of poetical unity enjoined by the standard models of the school from which they proceed. In each some one action or adventure of the deity is constituted a central point, around which his other claims to veneration or honour are distributed as accessory or episode. This principle of unity is but rarely or partially observed in the epic hymns of later poets, where various, often numerous incidents in the fabulous life of the same god are accumulated, without any common bond of unity, in one continuous narrative.

istics
of the longer Homeric
hymns.

In the mode of treating their respective subjects, especially in the moral and religious element of their text, the six standard Homeric hymns are marked by much variety of character. In none can be recognised any great amount of that reverential spirit which ought to pervade solemn addresses to the Deity, and by which many minor compositions in the collection are more or less distinguished. The hymn to Ceres is, upon the whole, characterised by the greatest degree of gravity and solemnity, verging upon the mystical, as befitted the mysterious attributes of the heroine. The praises of the Delian and Pythian god, while in a livelier more festive vein, are also not deficient in epic dignity. In the adventures of Dionysus these features are tempered by a certain admixture of comi-tragic humour; which in the hymn to Mercury degenerates into pure comedy, often of a very indecent description. In the hymn to Aphrodite, the amorous class of adventure is treated with freedom but elegance, and apparently without intentional levity or breach of propriety. The hymn to Vulcan, in the Odyssey, is a brilliant example of a plainly licentious subject treated in the purest spirit of comic satire, without any approach to grossness or indelicacy. The three latter compositions offer, each, a more or less pointed evidence, in addition to that supplied by the Iliad, how keenly the primitive Greeks were alive to the absurdities of the popular religion, and with what boldness they turned them to account in the indulgence of their innate propensity to select, by preference, the victims of their ungovernable spirit of satire from the highest quarters.

That the hymn to Apollo, which appears as one in the present editions, comprises two originally distinct compositions, one to the god in his character of Delian, the other in that of Pythian, is an opinion now generally, or even universally adopted. The evidence in its favour, both historical and internal, is conclusive. The chief argument of the latter kind is, that the existing combination of two distinct heads of subject in the same poem involves, not only a violation of the epic unity common to all the other compositions of the same class in the collection, but a complete sacrifice even of that ordinary degree of continuity in the treatment of those two heads, which is essential to constitute a single narrative. This internal evidence is supported by the indirect testimony of Thucydides and Aristides, who, in citing the concluding lines of what now forms the first or Delian subdivision of the hymn, describe them as the close of a separate work.¹ A similar inference results from the distinction above noticed, as drawn by the antients, in quoting the Delian subdivision by the title of proœmium, the Pythian under the ordinary designation of hymn or poem. The hypothesis therefore, of two originally separate hymns, may confidently be adopted as the basis of any critical remarks on their composition.

THE DELIAN HYMN TO APOLLO.

5. After an introductory tribute of praise to the god, describing the honours he enjoyed in the assembled court of Olympus, and a short congratulatory address to Latona, the poet enters on the main subject of the hymn, the birth of Apollo in Delos, and establishment of his favourite seat of worship in that island.

Latona, when pregnant by Jupiter of the infant deity, and persecuted by the jealousy of Juno, wanders from coast to coast and island to island, vainly seeking a resting-place where she may give birth to her divine progeny. All refuse her an asylum, dismayed by the prospect of so terrible a colonist settling on their shore. At length she arrives at the rugged islet of Delos, and tempts it to compliance, by contrasting in glowing colours, with its present dreary and deserted state, the honours and wealth to be lavished on its barren rocks, were they to become the chosen sanctuary of Apollo. The nymph of the island expresses alarm lest the deity, on entering the world, ashamed of his mean birthplace, should indignantly trample her under foot, overwhelm her in the sea, and transfer his residence to some more favoured spot. Reassured however by Latona, with an oath on the Styx; that all the fair prospects held out shall be realised, she joyfully consents.

Provided with a refuge, the goddess is seized by her pains, which are prolonged during nine days owing to the absence of Ilithyia, detained in Olympus by the invidious influence of Juno. At length, through the interference of the other female deities, who sympathise with their afflicted kinswoman, the celestial midwife, eluding the vigilance of Juno, affords her assistance, and the divine babe is brought forth amid the rejoicings of the assembled friendly goddesses.

On entering the world he selects the bow as his weapon, music and augury as his favourite arts, Delos as his terrestrial abode. This preference at once secures the island the promised affluence and honours. "But the period when the god views with greatest delight his chosen seat, is during the celebration of his festival by the Ionians, convened in solemn assembly with their wives and children, and listening to the daughters of the island chanting his hymns of praise."

The poem concludes with an apostrophe to the author, "as the blind old bard dwelling in Chios, whose songs were destined to a lasting preeminence in fame and popularity over those of all other poets;" with an appeal to the grateful remembrance of the Delian damsels; and a promise "to sing their praises in his wanderings among the cities of men."

The most interesting feature of this hymn, as bearing on the question of its origin, is the personification of the "blind bard" himself addressing the Delian damsels, which formed, in the days of Thucydides, an argument of the genuine character of the poem. It will be considered by the more discerning critic of the present day, for reasons already given, as it was probably by Aristotle and Aristarchus, equally strong evidence of imposture. Dismissing therefore the pretensions of the passage to emanate from the true Homer, various other conjectures offer themselves as to its real import or author. Some commentators have surmised, with more simplicity than sagacity, that the hymn actually was composed, not indeed by the "blind bard," but by a real blind bard of Chios, who thus, in genuine good faith, and in his own proper person, claims a precedence in merit and fame over all other mortal poets. This were certainly a very wonderful, scarcely credible, coincidence between the real history of the hymnographer and the fabulous history of the true Homer. It would also require a wide stretch of credulity to believe, that any successor and imitator of the genuine Homer would have ventured, in a solemn address to a great popular assembly, to boast himself superior to his master in glory and future fame; or that an Ionian public would have listened with indulgence to such absurd pretensions.¹ The only plausible or rational alternative that remains is, to assume that the author of the hymn, whether Cynæthus, to whom Hippostratus² ascribes it, or some other Chian rhapsodist, had pirated, together with the style, the person also of his chief as figured in the tradition of his own native town; and had passed off, or endeavoured to pass off, his work as a genuine production of Homer. The hymn would thus possess another source of interest, as being the earliest ascertained specimen of this species of literary fraud.

Its age and
style.

6. Upon a just critical estimate of the circumstances under which the counterfeit was produced, must mainly depend our judgement as to its antiquity. Its composition can hardly be carried back to the earlier flourishing period of the Ionian colonies, when Delos, under their protection and patronage, enjoyed, in addition to her sacred privileges, a full share of the common prosperity. Literary forgeries of this nature were little in keeping with the genius of that period, and still less likely to be successfully palmed on the ritual of a great national solemnity. A more probable date for the spurious production would be the age of Pisistratus; by whom the sanctuary, already shorn, it would seem, of its antient splendour, and comparatively neglected, was renovated and purified, and thenceforward remained a dependant of Athens.¹ A more favourable opportunity could hardly have been offered to an ingenious forger for promulgating his labours, than that of the reinauguration of a great national seat of worship, under the auspices of a family, whose literary ascendancy was proverbial for the successful exercise of such imposture.²

The geographical allusions afford few criteria for fixing the epoch of the poem, and those necessarily open to suspicion in the case of a supposititious work. The circumstance that, in v. 31., Ægina is passed over without epithet, while Eubœa is cele-

² To the difficulty made by Ruhnkenius, Welcker, and others, as to the citation by Thucydides of a hymn of so recent date as the genuine work of Homer, but slight importance can attach. There can be little doubt that compositions forged in the time of the Pisistratidæ were imputed not only to Homer, but to Orpheus, Musæus, and other purely fabulous bards, as early, and by as competent judges as Thucydides.

brated for its nautical enterprise, might seem to imply that the hymn was composed prior to the maritime power of the former island. Eubœa however was a dependant, Ægina a rival of Athens. An ingenious forger, writing under Attic auspices, would adapt his allusions accordingly. The language and versification, while Homeric in their general style, differ, in occasional points of idiom and phraseology, widely from the usage of the Iliad or Odyssey.¹ Although the text, like that of most other members of the collection, presents various gaps and incoherences, the result of corruptions accidental or wilful, they are not such as to interfere with the general connexion and unity of the narrative.²

The fable of the poem is well conceived, and upon the whole well managed in the execution. The general tone of the narrative is dignified and pleasing, and the dialogue between the nymph of Delos and Latona, in negotiating the god's settlement on the island, is both spirited and elegant. But the attempts to soar a higher poetical flight are not successful, and both sentiment and imagery betray an occasional lameness and poverty. The exaggerated description, in the exordium, of the humble and reverential honours paid by the assembled deities to Phœbus in the circle of Olympus; of their rising, inclusive of Jove himself, from their thrones at his entrance, and "trembling" when he strings his bow; is so extravagant a compliment to the poet's own hero, at the expense of Jupiter's acknowledged superiority in rank and power, as to produce a burlesque, rather than the impressive effect which was intended. The same remark extends to the servile performance by Latona of certain menial offices to her son. The description of Iris running her messages on foot¹, between Olympus and Delos, is also both unpoetical and un-Homeric. The figures of immortality and eternal youth², employed to illustrate the brilliant appearance of the Ionian assembly, (consisting, in great part, of persons of advanced age,) with their ships and cargoes, is an unmeaning hyperbole.

THE PYTHIAN HYMN TO APOLLO

Pythian
hymn to Apollo.

7. Celebrates the Pythian or Delphic sanctuary of the god, as the preceding poem had celebrated his Delian birthplace. After a preamble describing the joyful welcome of Phœbus by his fellow-deities, on his return to Olympus from his periodical visits to favoured seats on earth, and a brief allusion to some other less important events in the life of the god, the poet enters on the main subject of his song.

Phœbus, descending from Olympus in quest of a site for his prophetic shrine, and traversing Pieria and Thessaly, crosses the sea, first to Eubœa and thence to Bœotia. After passing the as yet uninhabited site of Thebes, his attention is attracted by the beauty of the fountain Tilphussa, near Haliartus, on the shore of the Cephissian lake. On his proposal to construct his temple by her side, the nymph, jealous of her own dignity, artfully dissuades him, urging the disturbance to which his rites and worshippers will be exposed, by the carriages and beasts of burthen which assemble to water from her stream. She suggests, as a more appropriate site, a spot in the vale of Crissa in Phocis, where he will be free from any such annoyance. Thither accordingly he repairs, and marks out the foundations of his sanctuary, which is constructed by the celebrated architects Trophonius and Agamedes. He finds however the neighbouring Castalian spring occupied by a fierce dragon, the terror of the surrounding country, the same monster to whom Juno had committed the guardianship of her own equally monstrous son Typhœus. An episode follows describing the birth of this unnatural offspring of the divine queen. Apollo destroys the dragon, and from the stench of its carcass the animal and the oracle receive the common name of Pytho, the god his title of Pythian. Indignant at the deceit practised on him by the Tilphussian nymph, in suppressing all mention of the dragon, he returns into Bœotia; and, after marring the beauty of her fountain by heaping rocks on the issue of its waters, he builds an altar to himself by its side. Hence his title of Tilphussian Apollo.

His next care is to provide ministers for his sanctuary. This honour he determines to confer on a crew of Cretan navigators, whose ship he descries afar off at sea on its voyage from Cnossus to Pylos. Assuming the form of a dolphin, he springs into the vessel, and by his supernatural agency propels her against the will of the pilot, past her previous destination, to the port of Crissa. Here, assuming his natural form, he reveals himself to the mariners, announces their own future lot, and accompanies them in festive procession from the shore to the sanctuary, which in honour of his late disguise acquires the surname of Delphian, the god that of Delphinian. On establishing his ministers in their sacred abode, he promises to make up its lack of fertility by a rich revenue of pious offerings, so long as their own conduct shall be such as to merit his favour and confidence. "But should ever the purity of life indispensable to his ministry be stained by vice or impiety, they will forfeit all claim to his protection, and be for ever subjected to the discipline of other severe and unrelenting taskmasters."

This concluding passage of the hymn sheds a ray Its age. of clear light on the date of its composition, or at least marks out the limits of the earliest period to which it can be assigned. The presidency of the Pythian oracle was originally held by the town of Cirrha or Crissa, situated about half-way between the port of the same name and the sanctuary. About the XLVth Olympiad¹ (595 B. C.), the Crissæans were accused and condemned by the Amphictyons of impiety and abuse of their functions, which, after a ten years' contest called the Sacred War, were transferred to Delphi, the town that had sprung up around the site of the temple. Crissa itself was destroyed, and its inhabitants reduced to slavery. To this fatality it is, there can be no doubt, that the prophetic warning alludes, so emphatically uttered by Apollo at the close of his address to the members of the infant Crissæan colony. The hymn cannot therefore be dated, unless credit be given to the author himself for a large share of Pythian inspiration, prior to the XLIXth Olympiad (585 B. C.). It may probably be an early commemoration of the above catastrophe.

Connexion
lian hymn.

8. While the want of connexion between the close of the Delian and the commencement of the Pythian hymn, affords one among other arguments against their having originally formed an entire work, there is a certain abruptness in the introductory lines of the latter, as it now stands, which seems equally incompatible with their having formed the exordium to an altogether independant poem. This anomaly is owing, probably, to the proper preamble of the Pythian hymn having been lopped off to facilitate the combination of the two. Upon the middle view however, above suggested, of two originally separate hymns habitually recited in succession, the incongruity would be less striking. The formula with which the Delian hymn concludes, a declaration by the poet that "he will not cease from celebrating Apollo," by announcing a continuation of the general subject, serves both as introduction to the following and epilogue to the previous composition. It has indeed been surmised that these two odes ought to be considered, in their original form, as rivals rather than sisters; composed, the one for the Delian, the other for the Pythian festival, in vindication of their respective claims to priority of honour and distinction. This opinion, however, need not interfere with that of the two poems having been habitually recited as a connected series. In whatever spirit of independence, or even of rivalry, they may have been originally composed, they illustrate, each distinctly and without any such collision as to detract from their combined effect, two separate stages in the life of their common hero. The outline and general conduct of the narrative in each are also marked by so close and curious a correspondence, as abundantly proves the one to have been composed with the model of the other before its author. In each the divine protagonist, who in the Delian hymn is properly Latona, in the Pythian hymn Apollo himself, wanders in quest of a permanent seat. In each the search is at first in vain, owing to the unfavourable or inhospitable nature of the countries visited. In each the action opens with a description of the court of Olympus, and the honours enjoyed by Phœbus in its halls; and concludes with an apostrophe from the mythical to the real history of the localities celebrated. In each ¹ the same figure of poetical rhetoric forms the transition from the introductory to the historical portion of the narrative. The dialogue between the god and Tilphussa in the Pythian hymn, however different in its results, is also closely analogous in general style and tendency to that between Latona and Delos; while the mode in which Apollo meets the expostulations of his Cretan ministers on the rugged sterility of their new residence, finds its close parallel in the promises of Latona to Delos, to make amends for the same natural disadvantage of her soil.

Style and
composition.

The fable of this poem offers a greater variety of adventure than that of the Delian hymn. The action is, upon the whole, well conceived and conducted. But the long episode of Typhœus, though not inconsistent with the Homeric standard of art in a regular epic poem, is too bulky an excrescence on so short a composition. An unreasonably large portion of the narrative is also devoted to geographical descriptions. Some of these are both spirited and correct, exhibiting a personal knowledge of the localities, with episodical notices of curious and interesting matters of local custom or mythology. Others are broadly inaccurate¹, with evident symptoms of servile

¹ Ocalea is placed between Onchestus and Haliartus (64.); its real site being between Haliartus and Delphi. The god is also made to cross the Cephissus at Ocalea, a town many miles distant from any part of the course of that river. The anomalies of Crissean or Delphic topography (vv. 91—104.), which are common to other authors, originate in the twofold confusion between the sacred town and the port of Crissa, and between Crissa and the actual site of the temple. The ship, in its course along the western shore of Peloponnesus, is also made to pass the inland towns of Æpy and Thryum, obviously from the author's anxiety to string together Homeric names. A glance at any good map will show how strangely the other sites are confounded. The notes of the modern commentators on v. 250. (ed. Frank.), afford good evidence how essential a knowledge of Greek topography is to the critic of Greek literature. The highest summit of Ithaca, supposed by them to overtop the neighbouring ridge of Cefalonia, is a mere hill in comparison with Mount Ænos of the latter island.

adoption and misapplication of parallel portions of Homer's topography. Another peculiarity of this hymn is its etymological tendency. Most of the principal occurrences have been made to supply punning interpretations of the titles of the god, or of his favourite sanctuaries. This is a species of pleasantry, which, partially countenanced by the example of Homer, has, as frequently happens, been carried to a vicious extreme by some of his copyists. The derivation of the name Pytho from the stench of the dragon, is as poetically mean as it is historically false. The illustrative and descriptive details of the poem consist in a great measure of Homeric commonplace. Several passages however are distinguished for originality as well as beauty. The opening picture of the joyous life of the gods in Olympus is brilliant and graphic, and the apostrophe to the comparatively low state of mortals on earth is in a happy spirit of contrast. The fable of the divine dolphin hurrying the unwilling navigators past their previous destination to the port of the god, is well conceived and well told; and derives additional interest from its connexion with the natural history of this coast¹, where the animal abounds, and is the hero of numerous other mythical adventures. But the figure of the mysterious fish actually springing out of the sea, and stretched like a bag of ballast in the hold, constraining the course of the ship, is less appropriate than if the god had been made to exercise his influence from his adopted element. The episode of Typhœus, though out of proportion to the main narrative, is in itself a spirited version of this obscure mythical allegory. The prevailing style of language and versification is more purely Homeric than that of the preceding hymn, and the non-Homeric phrases are comparatively rare. The whole in fact is marked, both as to expression and allusion, by a superior tone of epic antiquity. The few deficiencies or corruptions in the body of the text, whether owing to time or the license of transcribers, are not such as to interfere with the general continuity of the narrative.¹

HYMN TO HERMES.

Hymn to Hermes.

9. The poem opens with the usual homage of praise to the god, and a short account of the amour of Jupiter with the Cyllenian nymph Maia, to which Hermes owed his birth. The poet then passes on to the immediate subject of his song; the exploit by which the infant deity established his renown as God of Theft and Intrigue, and which led to his subsequent alliance and good-fellowship with his brother Apollo.

Within a few hours after his birth, the divine urchin plans an expedition to plunder a herd of the sacred cattle of Apollo on the slopes of Pieria, in order to stock his native pastures of Arcadia. Slipping slyly out of his cradle, he stumbles, at the threshold of his mother's cave, upon a tortoise. Struck with the valuable invention the materials for which had thus spontaneously offered themselves, and with the advantage to be derived from it in the sequel of his enterprise, he returns to the cave, scoops out the body of the tortoise, converts the shell into a lyre, and hides it in a corner of his cradle. He then resumes his journey. Reaching Pieria about sunset, he selects fifty head of oxen, and drives them off during the night, backwards, with their tails in the direction of their course, concealing his own footmarks by wrapping his feet in a thick coat of sedge and brushwood. Unobserved but by a vinedresser of Onchestus, on whom he enjoins secrecy, he arrives in Arcadia by daybreak, and houses his booty in a cave on the banks of the Alpheüs, after slaughtering a pair for immediate use. He then returns to his mother's cavern, glides through the keyhole of the door, and nestles himself in his cradle. His absence had not been unobserved by Maia, who chides him for his boldness, and predicts the trouble in which his roguery would involve her.

The bereaved god in the meanwhile discovers his loss, and proceeds in quest of his plundered stock. Guided by the information of the garrulous Onchestian peasant, and his own prophetic art, he speedily traces the offender to his hiding-place, where he is discovered enveloped in swaddling clothes, and in all the assumed graces of infantine innocence and unconsciousness. The offence is strenuously denied, and the accused party appeals to the tribunal of Jupiter. Both plaintiff and defendant proceed accordingly to Olympus, where the hearing of the cause creates great mirth in the divine circle. Jupiter pronounces that Hermes, as a test of the sincerity of his disclaimer, shall, laying aside all guile, aid Apollo in the search after his lost property. The order is complied with ; but, on reaching the receptacle of the stolen goods, Mercury produces his lyre, and so fascinates Apollo by its strains as to induce him at once, not only to cede all right to his cattle in return for so precious an acquisition, but to bestow other handsome presents on the inventor of the instrument, in earnest of reconciliation and future friendship. These gifts consist of a golden wand of office, and the services of three prophetic nymphs of Parnassus, by whose agency Hermes will be enabled, indirectly, to exercise the oracular functions of Phœbus, which the same decree of Jove that bestowed them on Apollo himself, had prohibited him from directly imparting to any other deity. But before finally concluding the bargain, Apollo exacts from his brother an oath by the river Styx, not only that he will not steal the Lyre back again, but that the entire property of the Pythian sanctuary and its owner shall, in all time coming, be exempt from Mercurial depredation.

This hymn, while a work of very different character from either of those above examined, and inferior to both in dignity of subject and treatment, surpasses them greatly in originality, and in ethic and dramatic spirit. Much of the humour of the poem consists in the same vein of contrast which runs through the religious, or, in other words, the whole primitive, comedy of Greece: between the abstract dignity of the celestial nature, and the anomalies consequent on its investment with human attributes; between the Herculean exploits of the divine urchin, and his baby form and habits; between his precocious boldness and ready wit, and his childish waywardness and simplicity. Such a combination of conflicting qualities, in a mere human hero, were incapable obviously of being worked up with any effect into the burlesque. It is the supernatural element of the subject which alone gives point and seasoning to an otherwise palpable extravagance. Hermes, in his capacity of god, is gifted from the first moment of his existence with divine power and energy. As the patron deity of cunning and intrigue, he is at once qualified to compete with and surpass even Apollo, hitherto considered as unrivalled in those arts. Still, as a member of the Hellenic pantheon, he is subjected to the natural drawbacks of humanity, and hence at his birth to those of infancy. The obligation therefore to perform, through the agency of his imbecile human-personality, the mighty deeds by which he is ambitious, on his appearance in the world, at once to assert his rank among his fellow-gods, is what forms the essential spirit of the jest.

10. The poem is in itself a very unequal composition. The first part of the narrative, allowance being made for corruptions of the text, is well connected, replete with dramatic effect, and with touches of drollery and repartee in a very characteristic vein of Hellenic humour. Among the passages of this kind may be quoted the address of the little god to the tortoise at their meeting, expressing his childish delight at her so readily offering herself as a victim to the success of his first enterprise. In the dialogue between Apollo and the vinedresser, the display of affected reserve and indifference, combined with garrulous self-importance, on the part of the latter, when divulging the secret intrusted to him, shadows forth in a very happy manner the shrewd genius of the Greek peasant. According to Hesiod the babbler was severely punished for his indiscretion.¹ In the first interview between the divine brothers, the ready effrontery with which the little culprit, from his cradle, repels the charge brought against him, is also in a lively vein of drollery; and the sequel of the scene in the cavern, from v. 296. downwards, though hardly defensible on the score of propriety, is in good keeping with the burlesque tendency of the whole fable. Throughout the scenes in the cave of Maia, the pastoral rudeness of the mountain nymph's abode is contrasted, in the same comic spirit, with the riches stored up in its treasure-house for the support of her divine dignity.² The nursery of the god, with its furniture and internal economy, is also brought home to the imagination with much truth and little effort. From the conclusion however, of the proceedings before the Olympian tribunal, which are also conducted with some spirit, both action and description flag. The long conversation between Hermes and Apollo concerning their respective functions, and the complimentary harangues to each other on the adjustment of their quarrel, are as deficient in interest of matter as liveliness of manner. The elegant figure employed by Hermes to illustrate the union between the sweetness of the lyre and the skilful touch of the artist¹, so closely parallel to a passage of Shakspeare's Hamlet, with the oath against future depredation², form almost the only relief to the general monotony.

This inequality of character in different parts of the poem, with a certain amount of incoherence in the details of the text, has afforded a more plausible opening perhaps than usual, to the customary speculations³ as to an original incongruity of component elements. Neither consideration however, can afford any solid ground for such conclusions. The incidental anomalies of structure are sufficiently explained by the corruptions of time or transcript, to which, in common with most others in the collection, this hymn has been subjected. It happens also that, as in the case of the Iliad, the condemned parts of the text, in the late schemes for its reconstruction, comprehend almost every one of the passages which really constitute the main pith and spirit of the action; the leaven, as it were, of the whole lump.⁴ The inferiority of the concluding portion of the hymn, may be more naturally laid to the

⁴ Such are, the adventure with the tortoise and invention of the lyre; the retrograde driving of the oxen; the conversation between Bacchus and the vinedresser; the burlesque scene in 294. sqq.; with 265. sqq., 273. sqq., and many other lively sallies of the comic humour of the little god or his poet. charge of a single author than of two. It consists chiefly, or solely, in the absence of those humorous scenes in which alone the genius of the poet qualified him to excel. The winding up of the subject, after the reconciliation of the two litigants, while in itself indispensable, offers materials of a comparatively grave or commonplace character, no way adapted to the genius which succeeded so much better in the first part of the hymn. All therefore that can reasonably be inferred is, that while the author had the art to enliven subjects in harmony with the peculiar bent of his own talent, he wanted, like other more distinguished writers, the judgement to abridge or abstain from such as were foreign to it. He has, accordingly, clogged the more spirited portion of his narrative with a tedious accumulation of concluding details, reconciliatory courtesies, and interchange of compliments between the two gods, of which a very small share would have sufficed for the required object.¹

The other objection urged to the original integrity of the hymn, that the story of the tortoise, with the invention of the lyre, stands in no just connexion with the robbery of the oxen, the real subject of the narrative, is altogether groundless. In no work of the kind is the action conceived in a more complete or more delicate spirit of unity. The scope, both poetical and mythical, of the narrative was obviously twofold. It was not merely to establish the credit of the infant god as patron of Intrigue and Theft, by the robbery of the shrewdest of his divine relatives, but to illustrate the origin of the joint sanctuary of the two deities at Delphi.¹ The mere detection of the theft, and restitution of the cattle, would have been but a lame or even a dishonourable winding up for the hero of the hymn. The cession of the plundered property, without an equivalent, would have been equally discreditable to Phœbus. It was therefore indispensable in the spirit of the piece, that means should be found of accommodating the dispute on terms honourable to each party. For this object, an elegant expedient suggested itself in another celebrated feat of Mercury, the invention of the lyre, the favourite instrument of Apollo, and the acquisition of which by the latter deity, could not fail to lay him under a heavy debt of gratitude to the donor.²

ities.

The style of this hymn, especially of its first and more spirited portion, is marked by greater originality than that of any other poem in the collection. Its humour is of a description peculiar to itself, quaint and sententious, often coarse, widely different from the genial pleasantry of the Odyssey. Nor indeed, with the usual amount of Homeric mannerism, is there any direct trace of an ambition either to imitate or emulate Homer. In order rightly to appreciate certain idiomatic peculiarities of this comic vein of expression, a greater insight would be necessary, than we possess, into the nursery and schoolboy vocabulary of Greece³, upon which much of the spirit

¹ Plainly hinted also, in 172, 173.

² The old commentators accordingly, with a better insight into the genius of their own literature, dwell pointedly on this transaction, as essential both to the spirit and the unity of the adventure. Bekk. Anecd. Gr. p. 752.

³ Verses 378. sqq., for example, have been condemned by some of the of the urchin deity's humour seems to depend. There are also various, properly dialectical peculiarities, which shed light on the origin of the work and the native country of its author. These are in great part Hesiodic idioms, betraying the usage of an Æolian, probably an Arcadian or Bœotian poet. The parallel passages in which those idioms occur, at intervals throughout the hymn, are in themselves strong arguments of its substantial integrity of authorship.¹ The familiar allusion to the seven commentators above cited, on account of the very peculiarities probably which really constitute the principal value of the passage; and in 385., νηλέα φωνήν, to all appearance a Greek baby phrase, stigmatising Apollo as a telltale, has been corrupted into ν. φώρην in some of the printed texts.

¹ Among the traces of Æolism, the more remarkable are ν. 106. ἀθρόας οὐσας, ν. 133. περὴν. The latter term modern commentators have corrupted into περᾶν, the former into ἀθρό' οὐσας. In ν. 172. the present reading, ἀμφι, was probably ἄμμε, restoring the now deficient sense and syntax of the passage (conf. 465., and Od. vii. 223.). Another Æolism would be φῆ in ν. 241., if Hermann's here very reasonable correction be admitted. As examples of Hesiodic phraseology may be cited, the title Λητοίδης for Apollo, unexampled in Homer or the remaining Homeric poems, but which occurs six times in this hymn, and twice in Hesiod; and the phrases ἀμαρύσσω, ἀμαρυγή, τετράς, κᾶλα, φιλότης, γηρύομαι, θανματὰ ἔργα; all common to the hymn and to Hesiod, unknown to Homer. Those of γέροντα κνώδαλον and θῆλυς αὐτμή are also in character, if not to the letter, purely Hesiodic (Theog. 696., Scut. Herc. 395.); and the homely proverb in 36. occurs in the "Works and Days" of Hesiod, 363. Other peculiarities of idiom are, the use of αἰών, singular and plural, in the sense of intestine or vital parts; of κραίνω and ἐπικραίνω (vv. 427. 531. 559.), in the sense of "celebrate;" ν. 28. σῦλλα ποσὶν βαίνουσα; 149. ἡκα ποσὶν προβιβῶν. Add the following non-Homeric contractions, 173. κᾶγῶ, 382. φιλω, 405. ιδύνω, &c. Among the apparent anomalies of syntax, some may be remedied by a change of punctuation. Thus in 80. read ἔφραστ' ἢ δ' ἀνύητα . . . In ν. 240. the punctuation

would give sense, though adding another peculiarity of idiom to those already chargeable on the author.

strings of the lyre¹, combines with other considerations to establish the date of the poem as posterior to the age of the Lesbian Terpander, who first brought this more improved form of the instrument into popular use, in the early part of the seventh century B. C.

HYMN TO APHRODITE.

Hymn to Aphrodite.

11. The opening lines of this poem celebrate the power and influence of

The goddess to whom all the inhabitants of earth and heaven bow submissive, with the exception of the three virgin deities, Pallas, Diana, and Vesta. The two former despise her authority, devoted, the one to martial adventure and elegant art, the other to the pleasures of the chase and of pastoral life. The latter resists her influence, as incompatible with her own chosen office of guarding the purity of the sanctuary and the domestic hearth.

Jupiter, indignant at the haughty manner in which Venus exercises her sway, in subjecting even himself to the trammels, not merely of heavenly but terrestrial love, resolves that she shall in her turn undergo a like humiliation. He accordingly inspires her with an ardent passion for the young Dardanian prince Anchises, then tending his flocks on Mount Ida. Arrayed in all her charms, she appears before the hero in his rustic dwelling, in the assumed character of a daughter of Otreus king of Phrygia, and describes how she had been impelled by the irresistible decree of Fate to present herself as his destined spouse. She entreats him therefore to conduct her unscathed to the dwelling of his parents, in order, that, if satisfied to accept her as their daughter-in-law, they may celebrate the marriage with the accustomed rites. Anchises joyfully accedes to the proffered alliance, but inflamed with love, insists on the consummation of the nuptials preceding the sacred function. To this proposal, with ill-disguised willingness, she consents. In the sequel she discloses herself; appeals, in proof of the ardour of her affection, to the shame that will attend her return to Olympus after having submitted to mortal embraces; and, apostrophising the unhappy fate of his kinsman Tithonus, laments the cruel destiny which prohibits her from gifting him with immortality and perpetual youth, and presenting him as her lawful spouse in the divine circle. At parting she dwells on the favour hitherto shown by the gods to the royal race to which he belongs, as an earnest of her constant attachment to himself, and predicts the fame and dominion which Æneas, the future issue of their love, is destined to enjoy.

This hymn is by far the best poem in the whole collection; unsurpassed, perhaps, by any similar production in any age or country. Although there may not be critical grounds for ascribing it to Homer, it were scarcely unworthy of his genius in general merit; while there is little in the details, either of language or historical allusion, seriously repugnant to its claims to such an honour. The author has treated a licentious subject, not merely with grace and elegance, but with an entire freedom from meretricious ornament. No where in the Greek mythology does the goddess of love appear under more pleasing colours than in this adventure, described by herself as the transaction of her life most derogatory to her divine honour. The reproach of capricious indulgence, by a deity of highest rank, in a degrading passion, is removed by an appropriate application of the usual expedient, the stern law of Fate as administered by Jupiter; and, apart from her actual submission to that law, her conduct is free from all taint of levity. The mixture of gallantry and amorous impetuosity in Anchises is admirably portrayed. The terms in which he announces his resolution to assert, at all hazards, his rights as lover in anticipation of those of husband, are perhaps more purely Homeric, in conception, style, and versification, than any extant passage beyond the margin of the Iliad or Odyssey. The episode of Tithonus and Aurora also embodies, in a singularly effective manner, both the moral and poetical features of that beautiful fable. The state of utter inanition to which the once vigorous hero was reduced, by the fatal neglect of Aurora to secure for him from Jove, together with the boon of immortality, an exemption from the evils of old age; his feeble attenuated voice and shrunken helpless frame; with the affectionate solicitude of his divine mistress to alleviate the wretchedness of his lot, are all described with inimitable grace and tenderness.¹

It has been justly remarked², that this composition, though classed by the custom of later ages under the title of hymn, really partakes more of the nature of a poem in honour of the Dardanian race of princes: of those personal graces especially, which obtained them so large a share of amorous attention on the part of the gods. The simple purity of its style, with the general tenor of its historical allusions, also vouch for its great antiquity. The conjecture therefore naturally arises, that the hymn may have been composed by an Æolian Homerid, as a tribute of respect to the accredited descendants of Æneas, who still held sway in the valleys of Mount Ida. This view is further justified by a comparison of the prophecy by Venus of future dominion to Æneas, with the like prediction by Neptune in the twentieth book of the Iliad, of which this passage of the hymn is an evident paraphrase. The author's deference to the genuine Homeric tradition, is further evinced by his making Tros father of Ganymede as in the Iliad, not Laomedon as in the Little Iliad; and the compensation for his loss a present of horses as in the former poem, not of gold ornaments as in the latter.¹

¹ The poet is here guilty of a very curious anachronism, in describing Tithonus as already, in the youth of Anchises, reduced by extreme old age to second infancy. Tithonus, as brother of Priam, was coeval with Anchises, and must therefore have been still in the vigour of manhood, or even of youth, at the epoch of this adventure. Homer accordingly, in the Iliad, makes Aurora, a generation later, "rise out of the bed of Tithonus," as her still vigorous husband.

The superiority of this hymn to its fellows consists not merely in its own excellence, but in its better state of preservation: a property indispensable, in some degree, to that ease and elegance of style and numbers by which it is distinguished.

HYMN TO CERES.

12. Jupiter having consented that Proserpine shall become the spouse of Pluto, and queen of the infernal regions, her destined husband, issuing with his chariot from a chasm in the earth, seizes her while sportively flower-gathering with other nymphs on the Nyseian plain, and carries her off to his subterranean kingdom. Ceres, in the distance, hears her cries, and, ignorant of her real fate, wanders distractedly over the face of the earth in search of her lost child. At length, through the good offices of Hecate, she discovers the author and the motive of the outrage.

Ceres.

Distressed and indignant, above all at the treacherous and heartless conduct of Jupiter, she absents herself from Olympus, preferring to indulge her affliction among the haunts of men. Sitting alone one day by the side of a well in the neighbourhood of Eleusis, disguised as a female of the middle class, she is accosted by the daughters of Celeus, a chief of that district, who sympathise with her sorrow, and offer her an asylum in their paternal dwelling. She is kindly received by Celeus and his wife Metanira, and her melancholy is relieved by the lively jests of Iambe, the humorous waiting-maid of the damsels. In return for the hospitality afforded her, she undertakes the office of nurse to Demophon the infant son of her host, and inspired by gratitude to her benefactors, determines to confer on the babe the gift of immortality. For this purpose she feeds him with ambrosia by day, and makes his bed in the vestal fire of the palace hall by night. Her intention however is frustrated by the imprudent curiosity of Metanira, who detecting her in the performance of the mysterious ceremony, and terrified for the safety of her infant, alarms the household with her screams, and dissolves the charm. The goddess then reveals herself, chides Metanira for her interference, but promises at least a full share of mortal prosperity to her young pupil. She then commands them to build her a place of worship, where her rites shall in future be solemnised according to a form to be prescribed by herself, and bids them farewell.

Her orders are devoutly obeyed by the Eleusinians, and she takes up her abode in her new sanctuary. In the meanwhile universal sterility pervades the earth. Jove, alarmed for the safety of the human species, sends Iris to invite the offended goddess to a conference in Olympus. But she steadfastly resists all conciliatory advances, until her daughter shall have been restored to her. Jupiter then despatches Hermes to Erebus, with a request that Pluto will permit his spouse to revisit the earth. The infernal god complies, and Proserpine returns to her mother. In the end it is agreed that she shall, in future, pass two thirds of the year above ground with her mother, the remainder with her husband in the lower regions. The earth then resumes its fertility, and Ceres institutes her sacred mysteries at Eleusis.

Although the form in which this hymn is embodied admits of its being ranked under the mythical head of composition, the subject partakes largely also of the mystical character. It exhibits in fact, under poetical disguise, the fundamental doctrine of the Eleusinian mysteries. Much of its allegory, as depending on a better knowledge than can now be hoped for, even of the less recondite portion of those rites, must remain a dead letter to the modern reader. The general outline however, of the adventure, the descent of the daughter of Ceres to the infernal region, the sterility of the earth during her absence, the renewal of vegetation on her return, and the decree that she shall dwell two thirds of the year above and the remainder below ground,—interprets itself very obviously of the vicissitudes of the natural year, of the consignment of the seed to the soil, and its reappearance as crop in its season, of the failure of the vegetation during the winter months, and its restoration in spring and summer.¹ Such materials, even under the most ingenious disguise of human persons or adventures, are but little adapted for poetical treatment. Hence, although the action is of a more tragic character than that of the other epic hymns, and the author is at some pains to heighten its pathetic effect, it fails to excite any warm sympathy. The woes of a disconsolate mother, type of an adverse harvest, mourning over the loss of a daughter, emblematic of a failure in the seed, or the outrages committed on such a heroine, by a ravisher representing the soil during the period of germination, however touchingly described, can but little affect the feelings even of the most tender-hearted audience.

13. This poem, preserved in a single manuscript, labours, to an equal or perhaps still greater degree than its predecessors of the collection, under the disadvantage of a corrupt text; teeming, not only with errors of transcript, but with gaps or mutilations, extending in some instances over a space of many lines. More than usual scope has thus been given to the efforts of modern commentators, to set aside its claim to original integrity of composition. That the existing poem differs in some essential particulars,

¹ In the more esoteric mysteries, there can be little doubt that under the same image was figured the immortality of the soul, in connexion perhaps with the metempsychosis, the successive growth, death, and renovation of created life. A similar figure is adopted in the New Testament: "That which thou sowest is not quickened except it die. . . . Thou sowest not the body that shall be, but bare grain. . . . So also is the resurrection of the dead." 1 Cor. xv. 35. sqq.

from the same or a similar composition current during the Roman empire, appears from several passages of Pausanias. That author, while quoting from a Homeric hymn to Ceres, popular in his own day, verses still read in that now extant¹, cites, as from the same work, a passage not only no longer to be found in the existing text, but at variance with its contents. The daughters of Celeus are described in that quotation as three in number, called Diogenia, Pammerope, and Sæsara²; while in this hymn four are enumerated, under the names of Callidice, Clisidice, Demo, and Callithoë.³ The discrepancy, however, can afford no reasonable ground for any further inference than that the text has been subjected to alteration; and this seems to be proved by the fact, that in the sequel of the narrative⁴ three damsels only are mentioned, as in the version of Pausanias. It seems indeed natural, that compositions of this class should be liable to changes in the proper names and other incidental details, to suit the taste or current tradition of different localities. While the actual deficiencies of the existing text extend but to matters of detail, which the imagination of the reader has little difficulty in supplying, the epic action of the hymn possesses not only a full historical continuity, but a poetical unity in close conformity with the Homeric standard. The main subject is the Anger of Ceres, its origin and consequences; and the narrative proceeds upon this basis, in its chain of cause and effect, from the commencement to the conclusion, with as much regularity as the action of the Iliad follows out the anger of Achilles. The indignation of the goddess at the treatment of her daughter, produces her resolution to suspend her functions until satisfaction be obtained. The calamities consequent on her sullen rejection of all offers of reconciliation, constrain Jove to give way and submit to a compromise. Nor is there any episodical excrescence liable to censure. Besides the poetical scope of the action, the restoration of Proserpine to her mother, there is also a historical scope, in the foundation of the Eleusinian sanctuary and mysteries. These two objects are blended in a very ingenious manner, by means of the asylum afforded the goddess in the family of Celeus.

³ 108. sqq.; Frank. ad loc.; conf. Matthiæ, Prolegg. p. 77. sqq. It appears from Pausanias locc. cit. (conf. IX. xxxi. 6., I. xxxix.), that in his time there were extant hymns ascribed both to Homer and Pamphos, in which this adventure of the goddess was treated in substantially the same manner, but with incidental diversities of detail. This might naturally lead both to confusion in his citations, and to varieties of reading in the text of the works.

The style of the narrative is unequal; sometimes ^{Style} dry, like the subject, even laboured and affected, sometimes rapid and spirited. The despair of the bereaved parent, and her morbid disconsolate state during the year of separation, are portrayed with a truth and feeling which would do justice to a more real calamity. Her first interview with the kind-hearted Eleusinian damsels, and the description of their sportive eagerness to serve the afflicted stranger, are well worked up, and, on the whole, perhaps the most agreeable part of the narrative. The dialogue is occasionally spirited, but the illustrative imagery labours under the same tone of mysticism common to the action. The attribute of the Golden Sword ascribed to Ceres, (with Homer proper to Apollo), is in its literal import either senseless or inappropriate, and can only be defended on the plea of some symbolic signification. The lively opening scene, where Proserpine is surprised sporting on the flowery meadow, is marred by the monstrous hyperbole of the hundred-headed narcissus, which the infernal ravisher causes to spring up in order to beguile his victim away from her companions, and which she is in the act of grasping "with both hands" at the moment of her seizure. The introduction of Styx and Pallas among the attendant nymphs of the heroine, who sport with her on the meadow, savours more of the mystical than the poetical. The refusal by Ceres of the ordinary cup of welcome¹, with the substitution in its stead of the mysterious potion administered to the initiated in the Eleusinian rites, also imparts an unnatural effect to the otherwise interesting account of her hospitable reception in the hall of Celeus. The charm of the pomegranate seed, on the swallowing of which the ultimate fate of Proserpine depends², and the allegorical virtue of which is lost to the modern reader, partakes, poetically considered, more of Oriental tale than of Greek epic legend. There can be little doubt from the mysterious and inexplicit tone of the allusion to this ceremony, that it formed part of the more recondite secrets of the sanctuary, on which the poet did not venture to enlarge.³ The episode of the infant Demophon, in spite of its essentially mystical character, is not deficient in poetical effect.

peculiarities and

On grounds of internal evidence this hymn may advance reasonable claims to antiquity. Its dialect and general phraseology are, with the exception of a few contracted forms, Homeric; and the story, though treating of a subject so nearly connected with Athens, contains no trace of later Athenian fable. Eleusis, as a town, can hardly have been of much importance till after Homer's time, not being mentioned even in the Catalogue of the Iliad; yet the antiquity of the rites there celebrated cannot be doubted, nor their extension at an early period, probably by the original emigrants, to the Ionian colonies. Still however, it is not likely that all the more subtle local details of the solemnity should have attained, prior to the rise of Athenian ascendancy about the time of Solon or the Pisistratidæ, so complete a maturity as that in which they appear in the action of this poem. This consideration, with the Attic tendency of the few non-Homeric idioms in the text¹, renders it probable that the author may have been an Attic Homerid of that period.

THE HYMN TO DIONYSUS.

14. The youthful deity is surprised asleep on the shore by Tyrrhenian navigators, who seize and carry him off in their vessel.

Dionysus.

¹ Such are ελεωός for ελεεινός, 284.; έρω for έρέα, 406.; κάρα for κάρατα 12.; άλφι for άλφιστα, 208.; φθής, 494.; and the Synizesis in τοκῆς· ἐμὲ δ' αἶτε, 137., common to Hesiod (Works, 261.; conf. 246.), but altered by Hermann and Franke into τοκῆς· ἐμ' αἶτε, contrary to both authority and syntax. Peculiar to this hymn is the epic idiom ὡς ἔφατο (316. 448.), subjoined to speeches of heroes or heroines reported in the poet's own words, not those of the speaker. These, with other parallel passages (93. sq. 363. 90. 306.), suffice in themselves to set aside the sceptical doctrine as to different authors for the first and last portions of the hymn. There is no reason to assume any hiatus after 37. The text is quite consistent, as well remarked by Voss and Ilgen. In 262. read γῆρας for κῆρας, by reference to familiar usage and to the parallel of 242. 260.; in 344, 345. ἡδ' ἐπὶ ἔργοις ἀτλήτοις θεῶν; in 428. ὑπέρμορον for ὥσπερ κρόκον; in 479. with Hermann, ἔγος for ἐχός.

They attempt to bind him, but the fetters refuse their office. The god, seating himself on the deck, smiles contemptuously at their efforts. The pilot, presaging the supernatural character of the prisoner, urges his immediate restoration to liberty; but the captain bids his wiser comrade mind his own business, expressing a determination to obtain either a good price abroad for his prize, or a high ransom at home. Suddenly the ship is filled with prodigies. Wine gushes up from the hold. A vine, teeming with clustering grapes, curls around the sail, and ivy encircles the masts. The god himself assumes the form of a lion, and conjures up a shaggy bear as his ally. The lion seizes the captain; the crew, leaping into the sea, are changed into dolphins. The pilot alone is spared, and assured of the divine blessing in reward of his piety.

The narrative of this hymn is conceived in a tragicomic spirit. The style, though correct and perspicuous, is concise and abrupt, sometimes even to laconism, as if the author were in a hurry to get through his subject. The versification and imagery are, however, simple and elegant. The action, though brief, is harmonious and connected, and the little dialogue introduced spirited and natural. Hence, as the text has escaped any serious mutilation, this hymn, within its own narrow limits, may rank as the most perfect work in the collection, next to the hymn to Venus.

The adventure here described is perhaps the most truly poetical in the mythical biography of Dionysus, being free from that wild semibarbarous mysticism, which renders his remaining exploits less favourable materials for epic treatment. That its merits were appreciated by the artists, as well as the poets, of the best ages, is evinced by the frieze of the elegant monument of Lysicrates, still existing at Athens; for the sculptures of which, now partly to be seen in the British Museum, it supplied the subject.

SHORTER HOMERIC HYMNS.

The remaining compositions classed under the common title of Homeric Hymns, in number twenty-seven, are, with trifling exception, so much alike in character, and so devoid of interest either in respect to matter or style, as to offer little inducement to critical commentary. The greater portion of them, comprising each but a few lines, are little more than detached specimens of those introductory or valedictory commonplaces, which form the prologue or epilogue of the more bulky members of the collection. The address to Mercury, occupying the whole of hymn XVII., is a nearly literal repetition of the exordium of the foregoing complete poem in honour of the same god. Others, of somewhat greater length, comprising desultory descriptions of the origin and attributes of the divinities invoked, may have been from the first independant compositions destined for individual recital, either in the public solemnities or the more familiar rites of private conviviality. On these latter occasions it appears, not only from the testimony of antient authors¹, but the internal evidence of the minor hymns, to have been customary to propitiate the deity by such short invocations, similar to the modern grace, both before and after the banquet. Many seem to have belonged to the class of procœmia prefixed by the rhapsodists to their extracts from Homer and other poets, in the public recitals. Two alone¹, one to Pan and another to Dionysus, partake each, in a small degree, of the epic character. The former, after the usual tribute of praise, offers a concise description of the birth of the cloven-footed god, and of the effect of his uncouth appearance, first on his own mother, and subsequently on Jove and the assembled deities, when presented at the court of Olympus. Pan is a god unknown apparently to either Homer or Hesiod; and of whose name or worship the first symptoms cannot be traced higher than the commencement of the 6th century B.C.² Of the remaining members of the collection, some are marked by a mystical or philosophical spirit, little compatible with their pretensions to Homeric origin, and which would better qualify them for a place among the works of the pseudo-Orpheus, or other poets of a later more artificial character. That to Mars³ is of the purely philosophical order. The god is invoked as the figurative type of fortitude, endurance, and other similar virtues, in the moral rather than the martial sense.

The style of these minor compositions is characterised generally by the same monotony as their subjects. Some consist of little more than strings of epithets. Among the more elegant may be quoted one to Artemis⁴, another to the Tyndaridæ⁵, as twin stars and patrons of navigation, and a third to Vulcan.⁶ That to Pan also contains some agreeable passages.

MISCELLANEOUS HOMERIC POEMS.

BATRACHOMYOMACHIA.

15. A mouse, while slaking his thirst on the margin of a pond after a hot pursuit by a weasel, enters into conversation with a frog on the merits of their respective modes of life. The frog invites the mouse to a nearer inspection of the abode and habits of his own nation, and for this purpose offers him a sail on his back. When the party are at some distance from land, the head of an otter suddenly appears on the surface. The terrified frog at once dives to the bottom, disengaging himself from his rider, who, with many a struggle and bitter imprecations on his betrayer, is engulfed in a watery grave. Another mouse, who from the shore had witnessed the fate of his unfortunate comrade, reports it to his fellow-citizens. A council is held, and war declared against the nation of the offender.

Batrachomyomachia.

Jupiter and the gods deliberate in Olympus on the issue of the contest. Mars and Minerva decline personal interference, as well from the awe inspired by such mighty combatants, as from previous ill will towards both contending powers, in consequence of injuries inflicted by each on their divine persons or properties. A band of mosquitoes sound the war alarum with their trumpets, and, after a bloody engagement, the frogs are defeated with great slaughter. Jupiter, sympathising with their fate, endeavours in vain by his thunders to intimidate the victors from further pursuit. But the rescue of the frogs however, is effected by an army of land-crabs, who appear as their allies, and before whom the mice, in their turn, are speedily put to flight.

The Battle of the Frogs and Mice, as it is the earliest, is still perhaps the most successful extant specimen of the "mock heroic." This style of poetical composition, so popular in modern times, and worked up to a high degree of perfection in many elaborate poems, seems to have been comparatively little in vogue among the ancients. The text of the poem has been preserved in its substantial integrity, with occasional corruptions or variations by editors and transcribers.¹

The plot, if the term be here admissible, is well conceived and conducted; the dialogue is occasionally spirited, and the language and tone of the Iliad have been travestied with happy effect. The text, in fact, consists in a great measure of Homeric passages, humorously, and often very ingeniously, adapted to each other, and to the order and spirit of the narrative. The martial descriptions, while the closest, are perhaps the least successful part of the parody. The vicissitudes of the fight are crowded and complicated, and, with the minuteness and repetition, have but little of the distinctness or variety of the genuine Homeric engagement. Much of the humour consists in the clever composition of the significant names of the contending heroes, especially of the mice; such as Lickdish, Cheesenibbler, Crumb-snatcher, Hamborer. These titles, together with the other allusions interspersed throughout the poem to the habits of the race, are the more interesting to the modern reader, from the light they throw on many petty details of social life in the age from which the poem has been transmitted. Among the choicer specimens of humour is the reply of Minerva to Jupiter, giving her reasons for declining interference in the combat, which are conceived in a very happy spirit of mixed Homeric and Aristophanic satire against the absurdities of the popular religion.

The Batrachomyomachia, while the work which, next to the Iliad and Odyssey, is most nearly associated with the name of Homer in the popular schools of classical literature, is yet perhaps the one, among those enjoying that honour, which bears the broadest traces of an age widely removed from that of the bard of Smyrna. The precise epoch of its composition can hardly, from internal evidence, be brought below the declining stages of Attic literature, or carried higher than the time of Æschylus; yet the earliest extant writers who allude to it are of a comparatively recent period of Roman antiquity.¹ According to Plutarch, followed by some inferior authorities, the real poet was Pigres ² of Halicarnassus, who flourished during the Persian war; the same who

C., lays stress, as evidence of no very high antiquity, on the familiar manner in which the art of writing is noticed; also on the mention of the cock as the harbinger of morning, an animal not alluded to by the early Greek writers. More to the purpose are the dialectical peculiarities. Such are the habitual employment of δ, ή, τό, as an ordinary article, in cases repugnant to primitive epic usage: 129. 131. 163. 227. 280. alibi; also the shortening of the vowel before mute and liquid, as the rule, wherever convenient, rather than the exception, even in cases where such license were scarcely admissible in the later Attic usage. interlarded the Iliad with pentameter verses, and to whom some also ascribed the Margites. That the Batrachomyomachia however is the work of an Attic Homerid, may be inferred from the peculiarities of its style, which, in so far as broadly varying from the Homeric standard, have all an Attic tendency. Nor is there any trace of the poetical mannerism of the Alexandrian era.

Address to Cuma.

In the life of Homer vulgarly ascribed to Herodotus, are introduced a number of fugitive compositions, assumed to have been incidentally composed by the poet on appropriate occasions: epigrams on various subjects; brief descriptions of objects which fell under his notice during his wanderings; complaints of the hardship of his lot; invocations of the gods; addresses of gratitude to cities or persons by whom he had been hospitably treated, and of remonstrance or reproach where his reception had been different.

Some of these poems date, there is reason to believe, from an early period of Græco-Asiatic antiquity. Several embody in a poetical form, often in very agreeable style, the current traditions relative to the poet's age and country. More especially deserving of notice on this ground is his address to the inhospitable Cuma¹, couched in a pleasing tone of mournful complaint, and in good epic phraseology. Several of these pieces have been cited entire, or in parts, by respectable antient authors; among others, the enigmatical epigram on the tomb of Midas², by Plato¹, Longinus², and Simonides³; by the two former anonymously, while the latter ascribes it to Cleobulus of Lindus, a contemporary of Solon. The indignant address to the priestess of Samos⁴ is said to have been quoted and applied by Sophocles, to a mistress who had spurned his attentions on account of his advanced age.

The most remarkable of these poems is the “Cam-minus,” or “Potter’s oven,”⁵ a form of poetical benediction on the batch of earthenware, when submitted to the furnace. Minerva, as the patroness of handicraftsmen, is invoked for a prosperous issue, and exorcisms are uttered against unfavourable influences. The bestowal of the blessing is made conditional on a continuance by the master-workman, of fair dealing with his customers in the disposal of the manufactured ware. In the contrary case, curses are substituted for blessings. These passages throw some curious light on the household mythology of the potter’s profession. From a parallel passage of Hesiod⁶ it appears, that the practice of consecrating domestic earthenware was of great antiquity in Greece. The Bell Song of Schiller is conceived in a spirit closely akin to this pretty poem.

Somewhat similar in character is the Iresione⁷, a congratulatory ode addressed during the Feast of Apollo, by the youth of the lower class, to their patrons or employers. The choristers, bearing the propitiatory staff and chaplet of the god, appear in festive procession in front of the gate, and, eulogising the wealth and munificence of the mansion and its inmates, supplicate a blessing on it from heaven, and a donation from its owner to themselves. The latter part of this poem is mutilated. It appears however, like the Margites, another more celebrated apocryphal work of Homer, to have combined the iambic with the hexameter measure.

MISCELLANEOUS HOMERIC POEMS NOW LOST.

THE MARGITES.

The Margites.

16. Among the minor compositions ascribed to the author of the Iliad and Odyssey, the most remarkable, on numerous accounts, was the Margites, a work of a purely humorous character, satirising, it would seem in a very broad vein of burlesque, the vices or frivolities of the wealthier class in the early stages of Græco-Asiatic society. These failings were portrayed chiefly in the habits and adventures of the hero of the piece, a silly conceited pedant and coxcomb, as his name Margites denotes. The circumstances which impart to this poem a stronger claim on attention than belongs to any other apocryphal work of the Homeric school, and render its loss the more to be lamented, are, first the distinct manner in which it is ascribed, on several occasions, to Homer himself, the Homer of the Iliad and Odyssey, by the same Aristotle¹ who denies that honour to the Cypria and the Little Iliad; and secondly, the mixture of hexameter and iambic measure in its text. There can be no reasonable question as to the literal acceptance of the name Homer in these passages of Aristotle. Apart from the evidence which his denial to those distinguished Homeric poems, of all claim to genuine

Homeric honours, affords of the trifling limits allowed by him in such cases to mere conventional usage, the specific object and tenor of his allusion to this work exclude any doubt on the subject. The Margites is cited by him as the earliest extant specimen of pure comic composition; and as entitling Homer, by consequence, to the same honour of original invention in the comic branch of the Attic drama, which appertained to him as author of the Iliad and Odyssey in its more noble tragic department.

The great and general esteem and popularity which the Margites enjoyed in every age of Greek literature, and by which it is also distinguished from other secondary works of the Homeric school, are further evinced, not only by the frequency of the ordinary appeals to its text, but by its having been eulogised, imitated, and commented, by other critics only second in taste and authority to Aristotle himself.¹ As no place, however, appears to have been assigned to it by the side of the Iliad and Odyssey in the commentaries of the Alexandrian grammarians, it may be presumed that in this instance they had not subscribed to the authority of the Stagirite critic. This may also be inferred from the circumstance, that the leading grammarians of a lower period, who may be considered as representing the opinions of the Alexandrian masters, in their notices of the Margites, class it for the most part, like so many other works, merely under the head of compositions "ascribed to Homer."² Several of them assign it a real author in the person of Pigres¹, the poet of Halicarnassus above alluded to as reputed author of the Batrachomyomachia, and as having interlined the Iliad and Odyssey with pentameter verses alternately with the poet's hexameters. If however the scholiast on Aristotle² may be trusted, the original Margites was known to, and quoted by Archilochus; which would guarantee it an antiquity of at least 700 B. C. The analogy between the Halicarnassian poet's mode of combination and that followed in the Margites, was also but partial. In the latter poem, the iambics were not subjoined in alternate courses, but interspersed here and there, as the occasion or the spirit of the subject might suggest, to impart epigrammatic point to the narrative or dialogue. The seven extant verses³ comprise but one iambic, a regular trimeter, the third line from the opening of the poem.

That the opinion of Aristotle as to the Homeric character of the poem was, as in other similar cases, based on critical grounds, may safely be assumed. Had he been used to defer to mere popular tradition in such questions, he would undoubtedly have considered its evidence equally or still more valid in respect to the Cyclic poems, where he has so unceremoniously set it aside. His view is certainly little in unison with the general impression which the modern critic derives from the Iliad and Odyssey, either of the art or the age of the original Homer. But caution and diffidence, at least, are due to the authority of Aristotle, especially where the loss of the work itself deprives us of any near insight into the data on which his judgement was founded. The weight of the negative argument derived from the use of the iambic measure, as inconsistent with the genius or practice of Homer's age, has perhaps been overrated. The received tradition of the recent origin of that measure, can hardly be said to rest on historical evidence, more valid than the internal evidence which led Aristotle, in the face of the iambic element, whether considered by him as genuine or spurious, to ascribe the poem to Homer. The existing fragments are marked, in other respects, by a genuine archaic style and phraseology. The scene of action appears, from the tenor of these remains, and the incidental allusions of antient authors, to have been Colophon, which must, consequently, have then been a long-settled and flourishing community. This consideration, as referred to the views expressed in a former chapter relative to the age, life, and habits of the genuine Homer, militates seriously against the opinion of Aristotle.

Of the details of the action no information has been transmitted. The hero is described in some of the extant lines, as "neither fit for the plough, the spade, nor any other useful occupation;" as "a pretender to universal knowledge, but ignorant of every thing worth knowing;" and as resorting by preference to the most absurdly far-fetched expedients, for the attainment of the easiest and simplest objects. The recorded specimens of his experimental ingenuity display a genius nearly akin to that of the philosophers of Laputa, who devoted their talents to the extraction of sunbeams from cucumbers, and to the softening of marble as a substitute for cotton or down, in the manufacture of pillows and pincushions. Some of these descriptions appear to have been conceived, to say the least, in a very licentious style of Aristophanic humour.¹

CERCOPES.

Cercopes.

17. Another specimen of the humorous order of Homeric poetry was the "Cercopes,"² so called after a pair of twin brothers, whose exploits it celebrated. The name signifies, literally, apes, or baboons, and its two proprietors rank among the most distinguished members of the burlesque pandemonium of the Greeks. They appear in the local mythology of various districts as roguish sprites, haunting the country thoroughfares, ready to accost, and where opportunity offered, by flattery, fraud, or force, to cheat or rob the passing traveller. The extant notices of the poem, of which scarcely an authenticated fragment³ has been preserved, afford but slender criteria for judging of the details of its action. The leading adventure however, or at least one of the most prominent episodes, was a rencontre between the two knavish dæmons and Hercules; a hero whose affairs, from an early period, furnished a favourite theme for the inspirations of the mock-heroic Muse. The story, according to the more antient and popular sources, appears to have been nearly as follows.¹

The Cercopes had been warned by their mother Thia, a daughter of Ocean, to beware, in the course of their pranks, of meddling with Melampyrgus, or "the man of the black posteriors." This was a property by which Hercules was distinguished, and which in those days was considered honourable, as a sign of manly strength and vigour. One day, fatigued with his labours and sitting down to repose on a stone by the wayside, beneath the shade of a tree in a defile on the frontiers of Locris and Bœotia², the Theban hero was overtaken by slumber. The place happened to be a haunt of the Cercopes, whom Hercules, suddenly awakening, detects in the act of plundering his wallet and arms. Seizing the culprits and tethering them by the heels, he slung them head downwards, as water-carriers do their buckets, one at each end of a pole resting on his shoulders, and bore them off prisoners. This position, however irksome, had the advantage of affording them a closer inspection of the lower parts of their captor's body beneath his tunic, and an interpretation of the oracle concerning Melampyrgus. The discovery was readily turned to account as a means of procuring their release. By broad sallies of humour, and burlesque compliments to the hero on the more secret beauties of his person, they succeed in cajoling him out of his previous sternness of purpose, and in throwing him into a fit of laughter, in the midst of which he good-naturedly allows them to disengage themselves and escape.

In some varieties of the legend Lydia was the scene of this adventure, in others Libya. The surnames of the two hobgoblins, in addition to their familiar appellation of Cercopes, were as numerous as the regions they frequented. In Bœotia they are called by some, Olus (the Mischievous) and Eurybatus (the Trampler); by others, Sillus (the Wag) and Triballus (the Mountebank). Elsewhere they bore the names of Andulas and Atlantes, Passalus and Acmon, with others, all more or less significant, either of the personal qualities of the owners, or of the locality they frequented. By some authorities they are described as chiefs of a numerous tribe of similar characters. The Bœotian Cercopes, in their adventure with Hercules, have also the familiar epithet of Œchaliens. This has been held to imply that their encounter with that hero took place in the course of his expedition against the city of Œchalia, which formed the subject of a distinguished poem of the Homeric Cycle; and it has even been further conjectured, but without reason, that the "Cercopes" was originally but an episode of that poem.¹ There can however be little doubt that their surname of Œchaliens is, like those above enumerated, a mere significant epithet, equivalent to Vagabond or Trampler, travestied by a punning etymology from the title of the Bœotian hero's other more tragic adventure. The fable of the Cercopes was a favourite subject, not only with poets but artists, from an early period. A group of Hercules bearing the two delinquent heroes on his shoulders, sculptured on the metope of a temple at Selinus, and now in the British Museum, is one of the most antient extant monuments of its class. While it proves the antiquity of the fable, it also vouches indirectly for that of the poem.²

Phocaïs.

Among the works attributed to Homer, on the sole authority of the pseudo-Herodotus, is a Phocaïs. It was one of the poems described by that biographer as composed during the poet's residence in the Ionian city of Phocæa, and presented to his host Thestorides. In no other quarter does allusion occur to the existence of such a poem, nor does our single authority throw any light on its character or subject. It has been attempted to clear up this obscurity by identifying the Phocaïs with another antient poem of greater notoriety, called the *Minyas*¹, ascribed in some quarters to a Phocæan author; and on the strength of this new title, and of the properly epic character with which the work would thus be invested, a place has even been assigned to it in the Homeric Cycle. But the reasons adduced are far from sufficient to warrant its admission, even hypothetically, among the members of that compilation. The title of the Phocaïs, which affords the only gleam of light, and but a very faint one, on its subject, must be presumed, from the analogy of other names similarly formed, such as Ilias or Thebais, to indicate an action connected with a Phocian locality, whether the colony Phocæa or the mother country Phocis. Beyond this fact, the existing data afford no room for speculation, either as to the materials or the style of the poem, whether it may have been a humorous piece like the Cercopes, or a serious epopee on some subject of Phocian history. In the latter case however, it were strange that so important an authority should have been passed over unnoticed by authors on Phocian antiquity or topography.

¹ Welck. Ep. Cycl. pt. I. p. 248. sqq. The only ostensible ground for this theory is the circumstance, that while this obscure poem is entitled Phocaïs, Prodicus, the reputed author of the Minyas, is called by Pausanias a Phocæan. Even this coincidence virtually disappears by reference to the fact, that the reputed Phocæan author of the Phocaïs is named, by the only authority from whom we learn its existence, not Prodicus, but Thestorides; and that Prodicus is himself elsewhere called a Samian or a Perinthian. The Minyas, on the other hand, is never alluded to as a Homeric or Cyclic poem, in any of the frequent appeals by antient authors to its text. That a poem should be entitled Phocaïs merely because its author was a Phocæan, is also repugnant to analogy. The cases of the Cypria, Naupactica, and others, cited as parallel by Welcker, are not in point. In these the word ἥρω is understood, often expressed, indicating, amid the doubt as to the real author, a poem of Cyprian or Naupactic origin. Titles formed like Phocaïs, Ilias, Thebais, Danaïs, invariably refer, not to the country of the author, but to the subject of the work.

Epicichlides, &c.

The other petty "Homeric" poems cited by ancient bibliographers¹; the Epicichlides, Heptapectos Aix, Kenoi, Psaromachia (Battle of Starlings), Arachnomachia (Battle of Spiders), Geranomachia (Battle of Cranes), were also in great part of a ludicrous tendency. Little is known of their contents, and but few of them seem to have enjoyed any great popularity. The Epicichlides, or Song of the Fieldfares, was a congratulatory ode similar to the Iresione, addressed to the youth of the day, and dwelling in complimentary, or even impassioned terms, on their personal graces and accomplishments. The poet in return received a present of fieldfares, the produce, it may be presumed, of their juvenile skill in the chase.² The titles of the last three compositions in the above list bespeak their subjects. The subjects of the other two are unknown, and their names have been transmitted in but a mutilated or doubtful state. In the former of the two the iambic measure is said to have been employed, combined perhaps, as in the Margites, with hexameters. A collection of Homeric Epithalamia seems also to have been current in later times.³

1. THE chapter of poetical history for which this celebrated name supplies materials, presents several features of analogy to that devoted to the still more celebrated name of Homer. Each title is to be considered as denoting a twofold personality: first, an individual poet, originator of a certain style of composition, and author of its standard models; secondly, the eponyme patriarch of a race or school of authors, by whom that style was cultivated. In every age of classical criticism, the leading works of each poet or school supplied a favourite and fertile field of commentary to the most distinguished grammarians.¹ In each case, among the numerous poems with which either name was vulgarly connected, two, the Iliad and Odyssey of Homer, the “Works” and Theogony of Hesiod, were respectively held to possess more immediate claims to emanate from the founder of the school. In each case, by more subtle critics, any such community of origin was denied even to these two; while in our own days the individual integrity even of the single poems has been impugned, and their text pronounced an artificial compilation of once unconnected elements.¹ While in each case the original poet, admitting the existence of such a person, flourished before the rise of authentic history, the only trustworthy data relative to his birth, destinies, or age, are derived from the internal evidence, direct or indirect, of his own works. In the last-mentioned particular however, Hesiod possesses the advantage over Homer, that the light reflected from this more genuine source, on the history of the former poet, is comparatively copious and distinct; while the very scanty pittance, if any there be, contained in the Iliad or Odyssey, can only be elicited by dint of divination and conjecture.

According to the notices supplied by the poet himself:

His autobiography.

The father of Hesiod was a citizen of the Æolian Cuma, who, straitened in circumstances at home, crossed the Ægean, and settled at Ascra, a village in a rugged wintry region of the Boeotian Mount Helicon.² At an early age, while tending his father's flocks on his native mountain, the youthful bard was honoured by a personal interview with the Muses³, the patron divinities of the district, who presented him with a laurel wand, as a symbol of the genius for poetry and song with which, at the same time, they inspired him. His taste for these more elegant pursuits was also combined with skill in agriculture, and other branches of rural economy. He did not however inherit his father's turn for nautical enterprise. His only maritime expedition was a sail across the narrow strait of the Euripus¹, to attend the funeral solemnities of Amphidamas of Chalcis. Here he was the successful competitor in a contest of rival poets, and dedicated the tripod², awarded as the prize of his victory, to the Heliconian goddesses, on the spot where they first inspired him with a taste for their arts. He had a brother called Perses, whom he charges with having, in concert with unrighteous judges bribed to his interest, extorted an undue share in the division of their common heritage.³ Afterwards, falling into low circumstances, Perses was reduced to the humiliation of applying to his injured brother for relief, and to the same Perses the greater part of Hesiod's didactic poem, the "Works and Days," is addressed.

Thus far Hesiod concerning himself. In the legend⁴:

Hesiod, like Homer, was descended from Apollo, through a line of succession comprising Orpheus, Linus, and other bards of mythical celebrity⁵, and terminating in a family of Æolo-Bœotian colonists of Cuma. From one branch of this family sprang Homer, from another Hesiod. The father of Hesiod was called Dins⁶, his mother Pycimede. The two poets were contemporaneous, in some accounts first cousins⁷, and rival competitors in the funeral games at Chalcis⁸, where the prize was awarded to Hesiod. His victory however was less a tribute to the superior excellence of his Muse, than a result of the preference given by the judges to the doctrines of peace and industry which he inculcated, over the wars and wandering adventures celebrated by Homer. On the termination of the festival Hesiod journeyed to Delphi, to consult the oracle as to his future lot, and was warned by the Pythoness to beware of the Grove of the Nemean Jupiter, as the destined scene of his death. Supposing this response to indicate the great Argive sanctuary of Nemea, he continued to travel at his ease in the countries north of the Isthmus. Arriving at Cenoe, in the Ozolian Locris, he partakes of the hospitality of two brothers, by name Amphiphanes and Ganyctor, whose dwelling, unknown to him, was situated within the limits of a district sacred to the Nemean god.¹ His hosts, suspecting him² of having corrupted the virtue of their sister Clymene, who had in fact been seduced by a fellow-lodger, assassinate him secretly, and cast his body into the sea. Borne on the back of dolphins³, his remains were deposited on the strand near the town of Molycria, in the territory of Naupactus. Here they were discovered and recognised by the citizens when engaged in a festival by the sea-side, and were interred with due honours in the same Nemean sanctuary where he met his fate. The murder was investigated, and, partly through the instinct of a faithful dog⁴ of the poet, brought home to the perpetrators, who were put to death.⁵ The body of Hesiod was afterwards, in obedience to an oracle, removed from its first resting-place to the Bœotian Orchomenus, the sanctuary of the Graces. A sumptuous tomb was there erected to his memory, still extant in the days of Pausanias, and the epitaph on which, attributed by some to Pindar, by others to Chersias a Bœotian poet, is cited by Aristotle.⁶

The portion of this biography which rests on Hesiod's own testimony, tends to illustrate and confirm the tradition which connects the age and birth-place of Homer with the early Æolian colonies in Asia Minor. Among other symptoms of Æolian predilection in the Iliad, the precedence awarded in the Catalogue to the Bœotian territory has been explained above, as a tribute of respect both to the ascendancy of that district among the Æolian provinces of Hellas, and to her acknowledged claims as mother country of the Æolian settlements in Asia. Hence, in the autobiography of Hesiod, his parents, described as citizens of Cuma, the same colony to which Homer's ancestors also belonged, when discontented with their Asiatic abode, recross the Ægæan, and select as their residence a dreary village of Helicon. This preference of Bœotia, and more particularly of so inhospitable a locality, in the choice of their new dwelling-place, could only be owing to its having been the native seat of their race, possibly their own, whither, in spite of its unattractive character, they would, on failure of their foreign prospects, be most readily disposed to return. Apart therefore from the imputed kinsmanship of the two poets, the legend of their common Æolian origin assumes broad features of probability. The dialect of Hesiod differs from that of Homer but in a few idiomatic peculiarities, betraying a ruder state of the epic idiom in his own less cultivated region, than in the more refined schools of Asia.¹ Homer's language therefore may be characterised as the Æolo-Asiatic, Hesiod's as the Æolo-Bœotic branch of the antient epic dialect.

Welcker infers from the citation of Aristotle by Proclus, that in the older tradition the poet's bones were removed, not from Cœnoe, but from his own birthplace, Askra. The words of Proclus are, that "in consequence of the hospitality afforded by Orchomenus to the Ascraean refugees, on the destruction of their town by the Thespians, the Pythoness had decreed to that state the honour of being the future receptacle of the poet's remains;" nothing is said as to the spot whence they were removed. Welck. Opp. misc. de Stesich. p. 155. The same Proclus however, in his life of the poet, seems to quote Aristotle as his authority for the popular account.

teristics
of the Hesiodic
poetry.

2. The customary definition of the Hesiodic poetry as "didactic," in contradistinction to the "heroic" Muse of Homer, is only correct in so far as limited to the pair of standard compositions by which the genius of each author is more properly represented, the Works and Days and Theogony of the one, the Iliad and Odyssey of the other. The distinction cannot extend to the great mass of the imputed compositions of the Bœotian poet, which while they seem to have exceeded, both in number and volume, those possessing stronger claims to authenticity, partook perhaps on the whole, more of the heroic than the didactic character. Such is the still extant Shield of Hercules; such was the poem or collection of poems entitled Catalogue of Women, which seems to have far exceeded in bulk both Works and Days and Theogony united. Such were the Descent of Theseus to Hades, and others, now lost. The characteristic feature of distinction therefore, between the Bœotic and Homeric schools, in addition to the dialectical peculiarities already noticed, is to be sought, not so much in the special devotion of the former to any one class of subjects, as in the variety which it preferred, and in the

H. 302.) $\alpha\varsigma$ for $\alpha\upsilon\varsigma$ or $\alpha\omega\varsigma$ in the same case of the second declension; $\alpha\upsilon$ for $\alpha\omega$ in the genitive plural of the first. desultory mode of their treatment. With Homer and his Cyclic successors, an extensive series of adventures was followed out with such a degree of epic unity as each poet had talent to impart to it. With Hesiod on the other hand, either a comparatively brief subject, extending to little more than an ordinary episode of a regular epopee, was preferred; or a number of originally distinct though cognate subjects were combined into one narrative, with but a slender thread of historical connexion, and little or no bond of poetical unity. The Catalogue of Women, for example, was a collection of mythical histories, of which the connecting link was a genealogy of the females from whom the principal heroes celebrated were descended. Its plan may be illustrated by the analogy of Ovid's Metamorphoses, a work constructed to all appearance after the Hesiodic model; and where the more remarkable cases of human transformation supplied the same rivet to the chain of events, as did the succession of heroines in the Catalogue. The Hesiodic Melampodia, in like manner, celebrated a series of prophets or prophetic families, concentrated around Melampus, the most illustrious of mortal seers. These works indeed, although composed of epic materials, may, contrasted with the Homeric poems on the same class of subjects, in so far rank as of the didactic order, that they certainly communicate in a more distinct and methodical form than the Homeric epopee, the records of early mythical history.

Of the lost poems ascribed to Hesiod¹, three, the Astronomy, the Maxims of Chiron, and the Treatise on Omens, may be defined in the stricter sense as didactic. The only work pretending to a certain

Homeric unity of plan, which obtained a place in the list, was the Ægimius. Its claim however to Hesiodic honours was but slender; Cercops of Miletus, reputed a contemporary of the Bœotian bard, being also in some quarters quoted by preference as its author. The un-Hesiodic peculiarity above noticed in the character of the work, may probably have formed an argument on the negative side.

With this exception therefore, if such it can be called, there may, amid a wide variety of subject, be traced a pervading common character in the numerous Hesiodic poems, which, as in the parallel case of Homer, led them to be classed under the name of a single author. The fundamental feature of the Homeric school is an absorption of the author in his subject. He is the secret mover of the dramatic mechanism by which his heroes are exhibited, himself remaining invisible. The genius of "Hesiod," on the other hand, is essentially personal, or "subjective." This is peculiarly the case with his two chief productions; and the more it is so, the more Hesiodic they are. In the Works, not only is the author never out of sight, but it is the author, at least as much as the subject, which imparts interest to the whole. Instead of an inspired being, transported beyond self into the regions of heroism and glory, a gifted rustic, impelled by his private feelings and necessities, dresses up his own affairs and opinions in that poetical garb, which the taste of his age and country enjoined as the best passport to notice and popularity. His sketch consequently of Æolo-Bœotic life, of its rural economy, habits, and superstitions, is drawn with a vivacity and truth which render it the most valuable extant picture of its kind. In the Theogony, the same characteristic individuality, though from the nature of the subject less prominent, is still observable. The remains of the other compositions of the school scarcely afford means of judging to what extent the author's personality, real or assumed, may have been there also in the ascendant. But there can be little doubt that all, or most of them, were partially marked by the same feature.

These distinctive properties of the two schools are interesting in an ethic and historical, as well as a poetical, point of view, from the difference which they appear to reflect, between the more imaginative development of Æolian character on the eastern shore of the Ægæan, and the graver more phlegmatic temperament which it assumed in the region of Central Greece. A question has been raised among modern commentators, as to the degree in which the two schools of art may have been originally connected with, or dependant on, each other. By some the Æolo-Bæotic school has been assumed to be a separate branch of the primeval epic minstrelsy, matured in its native seats by local cultivation, unaided and uninfluenced by the higher models produced in the Asiatic colonies.¹ To this view there might, in so far as respects the Works and Days alone, be little objection; but in the other less genial productions attributed to the same author, the proofs of Homeric imitation are so palpable, as to exclude all pretension to any such separate originality. One other curious distinction between the two schools must be noticed, that while the names of numerous disciples or imitators of "Homer" have been preserved, "Hesiod" bears the sole responsibility of the entire body of poems accumulated on his name. Most of the works to which, besides the Iliad and Odyssey, the title of Homer familiarly attached, possessed, as we have seen, in the more authentic tradition, each a claim to some separate author or authors; the Cypria to Stasinus, the Æthiopis to Arctinus, the Little Iliad to Lesches. But in no single instance, (with the partial exception of the doubtful Ægimius,) is any such claim recorded as having been advanced by a "Hesiodic" poem to independant origin. There is no alternative between Hesiod himself and a purely anonymous author. That all notice of a race of poets, enjoying doubtless, during their lifetime, a large share of popularity, should so entirely have perished, is a phenomenon in the history of literature not very easy to explain.

Of the three still existing specimens of Hesiodic minstrelsy, two, the Works and Days and the Theogony, have been considered in the popular opinion of every age as the more immediate and genuine representatives of the genius of Hesiod. The Shield of Hercules may more properly rank among the secondary productions of the school, and as indebted for its preservation rather to the favour of fortune, than to any acknowledged preference which it enjoyed among the antients, either as to merit or general popularity, over its fellows. The common origin however, even of the two former standard compositions was disputed, and the local tradition of the poet's Heliconian fellow-citizens admitted the Works and Days alone as his genuine production.¹ The scepticism of the antients, here as in other similar cases comparatively cautious, has been greatly extended in the bolder theories of modern commentators; and the existing text of Hesiod, within its narrower sphere of extent or interest, has been subjected to the same rigid tests of critical alchymy as that of Homer. The first step therefore, towards an impartial estimate of the poems, either in their existing separate integrity, or in their relation to each other and to Greek literature at large, will be, by a process of analysis somewhat similar to that adopted in the case of Homer, to test by internal evidence the unity or anomaly of their structure, and the general merits or defects of their composition.

THE WORKS AND DAYS.

3. The Muses and Father Jove are invoked to inspire the poet with the spirit of truth, and impart conviction to the words of advice or reproof which he is about to address to his brother Perses. “Works and Days.”

The Goddess of Strife is described as embodying two distinct personalities ¹, the one destructive and pernicious, the promoter of broils and bloodshed, the other an incentive to emulation and honourable enterprise. The poet exhorts Perses to propitiate and court the one class of influences, and to shun or resist the other; condemns his litigious spirit, and the iniquity of his late conduct, in conspiring with corrupt judges ² to defraud a brother of his birthright; and counsels him for the future rather to seek wealth by the exercise of honest industry. He enlarges on the fatal necessity to which the human race have been subjected, of earning their subsistence by hard labour, instead of living, as formerly, on the spontaneous bounty of the gods. This deterioration of their lot is traced to the anger of Jupiter ³, at the impious attempts of Prometheus and his confederate mortals to render themselves, by their own intellectual devices, independent of the divine power. Hence the fatal gift of Pandora ⁴ to shortsighted man, with its consequences, the spread of vice, disease, and sorrow upon the earth, as a judgement on the sin of its inhabitants. The origin of evil, with the gradual corruption of human manners, is further illustrated by the fable of the Five Ages of the world ¹; and the poet feelingly laments his own misfortune in having his lot cast with the lowest and worst, condemned both to witness and experience its daily increasing depravity. He then addresses himself in terms of keen but friendly remonstrance to the judges ², of whose iniquitous conduct he had lately been the victim; and exhorts both them and their confederate Perses to quit their evil ways, and by following those of prudence and equity to secure the divine favour, the only true source of prosperity or happiness to nations or to men.

These general rules of conduct are followed up in a series of instructions to his brother, inculcating the duties and virtues of social life. Agriculture ³ is commended as the best and surest road to honest wealth, and its principles are explained, together with those of the subsidiary arts, navigation ⁴ more especially, as necessary to dispose of the produce of the farm. Marriage ⁵ is commended, and rules are given for the choice of a wife. Lounging in the tavern or smithy ⁶ is deprecated, as an antidote to all habits of industry. The virtues of charity and hospitality are especially enjoined, with numerous other pious duties and observances, essential to secure the good-will of men, or avert the judgements of Heaven. The poem concludes with a religious calendar of the month, and remarks on its fortunate or unpropitious days, in their adaptation to the duties and occupations of life.⁷

its composition.

The materials of this poem are certainly of a somewhat heterogeneous description. Nor, perhaps, is their arrangement altogether in conformity with the Aristotelian law of poetical unity. Modern critics accordingly have discovered in these anomalies, if such they be, an opening for the customary speculations as to the patchwork origin of the poem, or its entire perversion at least, by interpolation or corruption, from its genuine Hesiodic integrity of form and matter. Such speculations, whatever plausibility they may possess in regard to productions of the regular epic order, become comparatively nugatory in their extension to a poet of Hesiod's homely school of art; and to a composition such as the Works and Days, where there was neither obligation nor inducement to the observance of any abstract law of unity.¹ The design of the work here placed the execution completely at the discretion of the author. That design was, simply to communicate to his brother, in emphatic language, and in the order, or it might be the disorder, which his excited feelings suggested, his opinions or councils on a variety of matters of deep interest to both, and to the social circle in which they moved. But in fact, if impartially considered, the Works and Days will not be found more deficient in that connexion of parts which

¹ Twisten, the originator of the late theory, or rather theories, on this subject, assumed the poem to be a digest of five other shorter Works and Days, the limits of each of which he prescribes; but each of which, according to him, is itself a compound of a number of more minute elements, partly genuine, partly interpolations of different periods. Comm. Crit. de Hes. Opp. et D. p. 64. sq.

Thiersch's doctrine is, that an original rhapsody of the Bæotian didactic school had been swelled, in its passage to posterity, by successive interpolations, to a bulk greatly exceeding that of the existing poem; and that this heterogeneous mass of materials had been again broken up, and finally redigested, during the lower ages of the Roman empire, into the epitome of its contents which now passes current as the genuine Works and Days of Hesiod. Yet the same critic, by a process of reasoning not very easy to comprehend, discovers in this condensed cento of Græco-Roman corruptions a pervading native peculiarity of matter and manner, sufficient to constitute it his standard representative (see note to p. 381. supra) of a primitive Æolo-Bæotic school of poetry, broadly distinguished in style, sentiment, and dialect, from the rival Homeric school on the other side of the Ægæan. Ueb. die Gedichte des Hes. p. 30. sq., conf. 9. sqq.

Göttling, while subscribing generally to Thiersch's view, modifies it by another no less curious doctrine, that the final redaction, and a large portion of the contents of the poem, are due to the same Ionian or Homeric authors to whose genuine productions the two critics agree in setting it up, both as to style and materials, in the broadest light of contrast. Præf. p. xix., conf. nott. ad 504. sqq.; alibi.

constitutes unity in a literary production, less so probably, than most treatises of a like nature in refined ages of literature. The authors of such manuals for the moral conduct of life, usually address themselves, vaguely and generally, to the reader or the public, as it may happen. Here the instructions are ranged distinctly around certain prominent events in the life of the poet. The Works and Days, as somewhat inappropriately entitled, might more correctly be described, "A letter of Remonstrance and Advice" to a brother; of remonstrance on the folly of his past conduct, of advice as to the future. Upon these two fundamental data every fact, doctrine, and illustration of the poem depends, as essentially as the plot of the Iliad on the anger of Achilles.¹ The ill-treatment of Hesiod by Perses; the iniquity of the judges who had lent themselves to his fraud; the subsequent folly, misfortunes, and present low condition of the culprit; the friendly anxiety of Hesiod for the amendment of his character and lot, and the means proposed for that object,—are heads of subject so closely connected in the general spirit, if not in the actual order of the narrative, as to exclude all reasonable suspicion of any one of them having been destined for any other place than that which it now occupies. Attention may be more especially directed to the marked, but easy and spontaneous references made from time to time, throughout the poem, to the moral relations of brother and brother², duties certainly not wont to be so pointedly enforced in ordinary cases, or to which a number of authors of desultory didactic poems would have been likely to give prominence. What can be more obvious, for example, than that by the mysterious pair of brothers, Prometheus and Epimetheus (Forethought and Afterthought), in the fable of Pandora, the poet has typified himself and his foolish brother Perses? Yet among the passages to which objection has been taken, is this same episode of Pandora, with the parallel one of the Five Ages.¹ Both have been condemned as superfluous, out of place, and inconsistent with each other. Both must here be ranked, as they were by the best native critics of old, among the passages of the poem most distinguished by genuine Hesiodic originality. It has been urged that the two episodes contradict each other, and could not consequently have proceeded from the same author. The inherent value, or rather worthlessness, of such arguments has been considered elsewhere.² With reference to the case more immediately in point, the previous question arises: how far the two lines of illustration were ever meant to agree; whether variety, and, in so far, incongruity, may not have been precisely the object of the poet. That such was his object is, in fact, intimated in the terms of transition from one to the other, where the latter of the two is expressly described as a "different tale,"³ or it may rather be said, a different version of the same. These episodes, like the work itself, are not historical but didactic. They do not belong to that class of mythical tradition which professes to record facts. Neither Hesiod, nor any probably but the very simplest of his countrymen, believed in the actual existence of such a man as Prometheus, or such a woman as Pandora, nor in any actual succession of ages, in the first two of which gold and silver were the only metals, and in the third of which men's houses were built of brass. Both fables are cosmogonical allegories, types of certain stages or vicissitudes of human destiny, which those fables do not the less appropriately illustrate, that they do not illustrate them precisely in the same manner. Were Nestor, in his historical comments on his youthful days of chivalry, to introduce side by side two narratives of facts in plain contradiction to each other, the objection of incongruity might have its weight. But it were absurd to deny the common authorship of two of Æsop's fables, because in the one the ant is represented as the symbol of industry, and in the other the bee. Several of the other passages chiefly exposed to this sort of objection, are not only among those most characteristic of the author's style, but the most essential to the harmony and continuity of his narrative.¹

Passages of doubtful authenticity.

4. Among the few texts the genuine character of which is open to reasonable question, the most important is the exordium, comprising the first ten verses of the poem. These lines were wanting in several well-accredited editions, among others in that preserved in the Heliconian sanctuary of the Muses, and which Pausanias appears to have considered the oldest extant in his time. The authority of this copy was also supported by the tradition of the district, and the judgement of distinguished professional critics.¹ The passage belongs in fact to that class of movable procœmia which, as more fully illustrated in our analysis of the Homeric hymns, it was usual to prefix to popular poems for the convenience of public rehearsal, and which seem, even when emanating from a different author, to have been frequently retained in the current editions as the production of the original poet. It is certain however, that while these ten lines are marked by the same characteristic features of style as the remainder of the poem, its exordium would, without some such preamble, be singularly abrupt and incoherent. Another passage, the genuine character of which has been impugned with a certain plausibility, and which is one of some little importance as bearing on the personal history of Hesiod, is that where he describes himself as averse to maritime enterprise. The only occasion, he adds, on which he had ever ventured on shipboard, was when he crossed the ferry from Aulis to Chalcis of Eubœa, to attend a festival in the latter town²; a voyage scarcely requiring the aid of a vessel, the channel being nearly dry at low water, and now crossed by a bridge. This statement, it has been urged, is little consistent with the specific instructions on maritime affairs delivered by the poet to his brother in previous and subsequent passages, implying that he had paid considerable attention to certain branches of the art of navigation. It will be remarked however, that these passages relate in no degree to the practical or mechanical part of the nautical profession, of which Hesiod, in the course of the same instructions, distinctly states himself to be ignorant. They refer chiefly to matters on which a landsman, in a country where maritime enterprise was confined to little more than coasting voyages, might be as well qualified to offer advice as a sailor: such are the signs or vicissitudes of the weather, and the seasons propitious or unfavourable to sea voyages. Upon these points the poet certainly dwells in terms indicating him to have been at least no very adventurous navigator. The passage in question offers no cause of offence in respect to dialect or style.¹

¹ Götting, in his Essay on the Life of Hesiod (præf. init.), adduces 648. sqq. of the "Works" as conclusive internal evidence of the poet's Ascræan nativity. But, in his commentary on the poem (633. 646.), he rejects the same passage and others contiguous, as interpolations of sophists who upheld the pretensions of Ascra against Cuma. This and other similar inconsistencies of Götting have been noticed and condemned even by Hermann (Opp. Misc. vol. vi. p. 245. alibi), usually a very indulgent critic in the case of such zealous coadjutors in his own favourite schemes of dissecting and subdividing the productions of Greek epic minstrelsy.

of the text.

Stress has also been laid, as evidence of the present, if not the original nonintegrity of the poem, on texts or opinions of Hesiod, quoted by writers of the Roman period, by Manilius and Pliny for example, relative to certain branches of rural husbandry, such as the culture of the vine and olive, of which no notice is to be found in the existing Works and Days. But in no instance have these passages been quoted as having formed part of that poem; and in most cases they may be preferably assigned to other lost works of the Hesiodic school. The assumption common among modern commentators, that the Works and Days was the only poem of that school in which agricultural subjects were treated, even incidentally, is altogether groundless. There can be no doubt that various others, the "Astronomy" for example, or the "Maxims of Chiron," comprehended portions of such matter. Several also of the citations of Hesiod by extant classics, as an authority on points of rural husbandry not treated in the existing poems, may be better explained by reference to the practice common, especially among Latin authors, of connecting the name of the "Ascræan poet," as the patriarch or eponyme of rural life and habits, with every branch of agriculture, whether treated or omitted in his works.¹

5. In passing on from the structure to the style of the poem, the first feature which demands attention is its distinct and genuine originality, a property possessed by the Works and Days alone, among the productions of the primitive epic muse, in common with the Iliad and Odyssey, and supplying in itself conclusive evidence of substantial unity of authorship. Not a vestige can be discerned of that spirit of Homeric imitation, which pervades all the secondary poems of the early epic school, including the other accredited compositions of Hesiod. The Works and Days, it is true, contains expressions, or even verses, common to the Iliad or Odyssey², but of such a nature, or introduced in such a manner, as scarcely to warrant the assumption of their being the original property of the one rather than the other poet. They belong to the common stock of popular Greek proverbs, which Homer may as well be supposed to have borrowed from Thamyris or Demodocus, as Hesiod from Homer. The poetical dialect of the Works and Days is also essentially the same as the dialect of the Iliad; that, namely, common to the whole national epic minstrelsy in primitive ages, with occasional interspersions, in the former poem, of idiomatic or rustic forms, peculiar to the genius or to the native district of Hesiod.¹ In all other vital respects, not only the subject, but the sentiment, imagery, expression, and versification of the Works are as purely and exclusively Hesiodic, as those of the Iliad and Odyssey are purely Homeric. While in Homer every faculty of the intellect or imagination is developed in its broadest and noblest forms, in Hesiod the fancy appears subservient to the judgement, the imaginative to the moral faculty. Had prose composition been already popular in his time, the Works and Days might probably have been embodied in that form. His aim was, rather pointedly to express his feelings and enforce his doctrines, than elegantly to arrange and adorn the terms in which they were embodied. Hence his abrupt opening of his subject, by an apostrophe to the Genius of Discord, through whose influence he had been led to embark on it. Hence that sudden transition from head to head of argument which marks almost every stage of the poem, and where any want of elegance is amply made up by the impressive earnestness of each recurring sally of reproach, advice, or warning. Hence that repetition, sometimes to a faulty excess, of certain more pithy phrases, remarks, or sarcasms on persons or subjects of more immediate interest.¹ These are features which, while the peculiarity as well as sameness of their occurrence, bespeaks a corresponding eccentricity of genius in the original author, are singularly incompatible with the art of the professional interpolator, whose efforts would rather be directed to smooth down all such jarring inequalities in the surface of his compilation.

The sentiment of the poem is throughout marked by the same homely hearty simplicity, so finely characteristic of the personal habits, as well as of the muse, of the rustic Bæotian minstrel; by the same easy suavity of numbers, the same earnestness of feeling and mild placidity of expression, the same dry epigrammatic terseness, degenerating at times into the enigmatic or obscure, where the subject assumes a more sententious turn. In the more imaginative attributes of poetry, Hesiod, as judiciously remarked by antient critics of high authority, seldom rises even to dignity. He rarely approaches the pathetic or aspires to the sublime.² Studied figures of speech are as foreign to his taste as to his powers. No simile, in the technical sense of the term, is to be found in the Works and Days. The ordinary vein of illustration consists of familiar proverbs, or of the simpler kind of metaphor, borrowed from every-day life, and so generally popular with a primitive audience.

² Quintil. x. i. 52.; conf. Dion. Hal. Jud. vet. de Hes.

Among these illustrative passages, the dialogue between the hawk and the nightingale¹ deserves to be more especially noticed, as the earliest example of that homely mode of conveying moral instruction, which became in later times a distinct order of composition under the name of the Æsopic fable. The poet likens his own lot to that of the nightingale, borne aloft in the talons of the hawk, and lamenting her sad fate; while the overbearing and arbitrary conduct of the corrupt judges in the suit between himself and Perses, is figured in the reply of the hawk, who consoles the unfortunate songster by reminding her of the honour conferred on her, in being made the victim of so powerful and dignified an oppressor. To the same quaint parabolic vein of expression, belongs a peculiarity of usage, which constitutes a prominent feature both of Hesiod's style and of his Æolo-Bæotic idiom, consisting in a certain indirect mode of designating objects, not by their actual names, but by terms significant of their qualities or influences. Sometimes familiar adjectives or epithets are employed in a substantive form; sometimes compound terms of the same familiar class are invented for the purpose. Of the former description are such phrases as "The provident,"² for the ant; "The Dry,"³ for the extremity of the nail, as distinguished from "the Green"⁴ or quick; "The Immovable,"⁵ for tombs or other sacred structures. To the latter class belong "The Boneless,"⁶ for the centipede or caterpillar; "The House-bearer,"⁷ for the snail; "The Five-branched,"⁸ for the human hand;

"Wood-sleepers,"¹ for wild beasts. Sometimes a similar effect is produced by a periphrasis; as, "The day-sleeping man,"² for the thief who rests during the daylight, and prowls in the dark; the "Three-footed man,"³ the old and decrepit, requiring a staff; "The servant of Minerva,"⁴ ("the artist") for the blacksmith. This mode of expression, which amounts to a sort of homely wit or conversational slang, may also be recognised in the popular Attic dialect, as in that indeed of most other countries.⁵ It has, however, rarely been transferred to classical style, never to the same degree or in the same naked simplicity as by this author. It is also worthy of remark, that the only cultivated idiom, if such it can be called, where the same phraseology appears in a closely similar form, is the early mystic dialect of the Delphic oracle, abolished by authority in later times. The correspondence between the language of Hesiod and that of the Pythoness is observable in other cases, where familiar phrases, or even entire verses, are found common to each; which might warrant the suspicion that she had borrowed from the poet rather than the poet from her.⁶ The same or a very similar mode of figurative expression, is occasionally extended to whole sentences, indicating in the same parabolic style, not merely single objects, but complex ideas, by allusions to the signs or concomitant circumstances of facts or things, rather than by descriptions of the facts or things themselves. Thus the husbandman is counselled to "sow naked and reap naked,"¹ signifying that both operations should be carried on in warm weather. The superiority of good neighbours to blood-relatives is figured by the maxim, that "in the hour of need the former will come to your aid unbelted, the latter belted;"² meaning that the neighbour will be the more alert of the two, will not stop to gird himself. A squalid unwholesome habit of body is indicated by "a swollen foot and skinny hand."³ The boy who breaks the clods and covers up the furrows in seed-time, is said to "cause labour to the birds," namely, difficulty in getting at the grain.⁴ Most of these idioms of sentiment or language are so marked in themselves, so peculiar to this single work, and so generally distributed over its text, that had that work been the production of a historical epoch of literature, and as such placed beyond the arena of modern controversy, there are few probably which by their own internal evidence would have so completely excluded, even in the most fanciful quarter, the remotest doubt of their emanating from a single author.⁵

Among other characteristic peculiarities of idiom (observable like the above in the Works alone, even among the Hesiodic poems) may be mentioned the frequent recurrence of the exhortation ἄρδεν, 35. 360. 380. 758.; and of the epithets ῥπαῖος and ῥπιος, amounting almost to tautology, 32. 305. 615. 628. 640. 663. 693.; 390. 392. 420. 490. 541. 695.

A preference is given to religious fables or parables of a grave or even mystical character, illustrative of the origin or influence of those moral agencies, virtues, vices, passions, by the author's experience of which his work had been suggested. It is in these passages that the more attractive features of his art are displayed. As if inspired by the superior dignity and solemnity of his subject, his numbers become more flowing and harmonious, the sentiment and imagery more chaste, and marked, according to the spirit of the occasion, alternately by deep moral feeling, or a gentle soothing melancholy. This is peculiarly the case in the episode of the Five Ages or Eras of Human Destiny. Nowhere is this chapter of primeval tradition conceived in a more pure and graceful spirit of allegory. The successive stages of degeneracy in the lot and habits of our race, are worked up through the corresponding subdivisions of the narrative, with much of the same power of poetical rhetoric as the details of Homer's Shield of Achilles, or the adventures of Ulysses in Hades; while the apostrophe at the close, to the poet's own sad fate in Here again the fallacy has been refuted and condemned by Hermann (Op. Misc. vi. p. 239.), who warmly vindicates the genuine character of this "höchst malerische Beschreibung der Winterkälte." It is to be regretted that this, and other rash theories of Götting, should have been adopted and inculcated in the article "Hesiod" of Dr. Smith's valuable Dictionary of Classical Biography. A repertory of that nature ought surely to embrace but the fundamental and established truths of classical science, to the exclusion of all such random conjectures.

having his lot cast in the latest and worst condition of degraded humanity, is singularly touching and effective. Equally happy in its kind is the briefer more condensed narrative, of the same pernicious change in the once happy lot of mankind by the opening of the Box of Pandora. The description of the Demons of Disease, when released from their prison, stalking to and fro in gloomy silence among the haunts of men, and that of the good Spirits hovering around the earth, and taking account of the righteous or evil ways of its inhabitants, are among the images offering the nearest approach to the sublime to be found in the poem.

Hesiod's pictures of nature are among his most effective passages. That of winter¹ is the most graphic, and upon the whole, the most elaborate specimen of descriptive eloquence in which he has indulged. It offers an apt commentary on his own most uncourteous stigma on the climate of his native place², evincing both how sensitive he was to inclement weather, and how lively the experience with which his mountain residence supplied him. With this exception, his descriptions are rather spirited sketches than highly coloured drawings. Such are, for example, the few rapid touches with which he brings home to the apprehension of those who have experienced them, the discomforts and the enjoyments of the midsummer heat on the shores of the Mediterranean.³

and point, often by a purity of sentiment and a knowledge of human nature, as creditable to the head as to the heart of the author. Many have been adopted as texts for special commentary by the most distinguished philosophers of later ages.¹ Some embody, almost word for word, fundamental dogmas of the Christian moral code. "The road to Vice," we are told in one place, "may easily be travelled by crowds; for it is smooth, and her dwelling is nigh. But the path of Virtue is long, and steep, and rugged."² With this more judicious element of Hesiodic ethics are intermingled various superstitious maxims³, such as appear trifling or even ludicrous to the modern reader. But to several even of these, a more serious importance must have attached in the primitive schools of philosophy, as appears from their having been embodied among the esoteric doctrines of the Pythagorean sect.⁴ Hesiod's religious views however, in the higher sense are, as referred to the Pagan standard, of a singularly pure and practical tendency. The gods are represented, not as arbitrary despots, themselves the slaves of personal caprice and passion, or of a blind necessity: but as wise and just rulers and arbiters of the affairs of men. The doctrine of an all-seeing Providence, whose scrutiny and retributive justice no human crime can escape, is throughout as distinctly and solemnly, as often beautifully, inculcated.⁵

Rural
economy.

Hesiod's system of rural economy, like Homer's art of war, belongs to the historical rather than the literary antiquities of Greece. A few remarks will here suffice, on one or two points more immediately illustrative of the age or habits of the author. The instructions relative to his favourite art of agriculture are few and simple, and so blended with others bearing on moral duties, as nowhere to assume the form of a methodical system. Nor, as already observed, was this work ever intended as a regular Georgic, or treatise on rural husbandry. Its object was to reform the character and condition in life of a disreputable brother, by impressing on him the value of the virtues and pursuits of the respectable citizen. Among these the poet dwells first on industry, as indispensable to all the others; secondly, on agriculture, as the kind of industry best adapted to his brother's circumstances; thirdly, on those elementary branches of the art more immediately open to a needy man. Hence may be explained the absence of any notice of olive-husbandry, proverbially the most expensive and precarious of all. That it was so considered by the poet himself, or his disciples, is evinced by a passage cited by Pliny from one of the lost poems which passed current under Hesiod's name.¹ The imputed anomaly also, that in a treatise on agriculture no allusion should be made to manure, with various other similar omissions, likewise disappears upon a more accurate estimate of the real scope of the poem.

Age of the author.

7. The inquiry into the age of Hesiod, as represented by the author of the Works, is identified with the question of the comparative antiquity of Hesiod and Homer. Any analysis of the trite varieties of opinion current among the antients on this question may be dispensed with, as all confessedly devoid of historical basis, and resting on conjectural data which the modern scholar may claim an equal privilege of appreciating for himself.¹ The whole brunt of the inquiry centres in the internal evidence of the poems, as to the state of manners, arts, and political government familiar to their respective authors. The balance of argument is, upon the whole, on the side of Homer, as has also been the award of the critical public. Much however of the evidence on which that award proceeds, is essentially fallacious, being derived from peculiarities of matter and style, resulting from a diversity in the genius of the two poets rather than of the periods at which they flourished.

The era of Hesiod is defined, on his own authority, as at least a generation subsequent to the foundation of the Æolian Cuma, dated in the received chronology about 1000 B. C. The age of Homer is, in the legend, similarly restricted, and there may be no absolute obligation to carry it farther back; although, on grounds already stated, it has here been allowed to range conjecturally over a more remote period of antiquity.

Stress has been laid, as argument of Hesiod's juniority, on his use of the terms Hellas and Panhelene ², in their later familiar application to the whole Greek land and nation. A more subtle argument of this kind, though not without its value, has been founded¹ on the substitution of Nomos by Hesiod for the Themis of Homer, as the familiar term for law or justice.² Reasonable weight also attaches to Hesiod's habitual employment of the term Basileus in its later republican sense of civil magistrate, rather than in that of chief, or king.³ Herein may fairly be surmised a substitution, partial or complete, of constitutional for monarchical forms of government. The use of fixed names for the months of the year, with the nice tripartite or quadripartite subdivisions of their days, seems also to imply an advance in this elementary branch of science.⁴ But although the astronomical notices, as naturally suggested by his subject, are more numerous in Hesiod, there is no trace in his poem of any substantial advance either in the theory or practice of the science itself. The subtle attempts to extract specific dates from the Bœotian

² Works, 274. 386. If verses 374. sqq. can be considered as alluding to the law of succession established in Thebes by Philolaus in 728 B. C. (Göttl. ad l.), the result must be fatal to Hesiod's hitherto recognised claims to high antiquity.

³ See Appendix F. Far less to the purpose is K. O. Müller's attempt, (Hist. of Greek Lit. vol. i. p. 77.) to derive from Hesiod's stigma on the conduct of those functionaries, or from his quarrel with his brother, proof of an unsettled and anarchical state of society in Bœotia in the poet's time, or of the "lasting state of confusion and strife, sometimes extending into the bosom of private families," which the imagination of Müller has contrasted with the flourishing condition of affairs on the Asiatic side of the Ægean. A family quarrel about a right of heritage, and a complaint by the losing party against the court which decided the case, were in any case but slender grounds for so sweeping a conclusion. The distressed condition however of the poet's own parents in Cuma, as described by himself, with their migration, in order to better their lot, to a rugged inhospitable village of the Bœotian mountains, is in itself a conclusive and obvious antidote to any internal evidence derivable from the same poem in favour of Müller's theory.

poet's incidental allusions to the phenomena of the fixed stars, or from his mythical catalogue of human generations, though once sanctioned by illustrious authority, are now universally acknowledged to be fallacious in principle and nugatory in their results.¹

Argument of the recent age of Hesiod has also been discovered² in his allusion to the generation who fought at Troy as a race of demigods, beatified heroes, dwelling in the "happy isles," free from care or sorrow; whereas, with Homer, these personages are merely illustrious mortals, subject to the same passions and sufferings as their descendants, and condemned at their death to the same dismal after-life of Hades, so gloomily depicted in the Odyssey. Hence it has been inferred that the popular hero-worship, as a distinct element of the Pagan Pantheon, was first fully matured between the ages of the two poets; that Hesiod was therefore much the younger of the two. This reasoning is founded on a misapprehension of their respective styles of composition. It was inherent in the very essence of the action of the Iliad, and indispensable to the spirit of its human characters, in themselves or in their contrast to the divine mechanism of the poem, that they should appear as brilliant realities, not as dim reflexions of a mystical demonology; should live, fight, and die as mortal heroes, subjected in death, as in life, to the ordinary course of mortal destiny. The doctrine of their apotheosis and worship, even if fully developed in Homer's time, could not with any propriety have been brought prominently into play. Very different was the case with the author of the Works, who appropriately avails himself of the shadowy disguise in which popular superstition enveloped the glories of his ancestors, to impart heroic interest and awe to the mythology of his didactic poem.

Nor can any great weight be attached to the traces of a more advanced state of commerce and trade, which some allege to be perceptible in Hesiod. The subject of the Works and Days obviously supplied more frequent and favourable opportunity for such allusions, than that of either Iliad or Odyssey. Yet passages might perhaps be cited from the latter poems, tending even here to counterbalance any argument that could fairly be urged on the other side. Homer's mention of manure for example, to which Hesiod, in a poem offering so much more favourable opening for such notices, has never alluded, would, if such reasoning were of any weight at all, tell heavily in the opposite scale.¹

THE THEOGONY.

Theogony. 8. After a long proœmium, or succession of proœmia, addressed to the Muses, and propitiating their favour with that of the other deities in aid of his undertaking, the poet enters on the immediate subject of his work.

I. In the beginning was Chaos², next appeared Terra, Tartarus, and Eros.

Chaos generates Erebus and Night; from Night spring Æther and Day. Terra produces Uranus and Pontus, the former of whom she espouses.

² 116. In this epitome the list of names has been limited to those of the more distinguished members of the divine family, or to such as were more or less essential to a full understanding of the spirit and continuity of the Hesiodic system.

II. From Terra and Uranus¹ are born Ocean, Hyperion, Iapetus; Thia, Rhea, Themis, Cronus; the Cyclopes, Briareus, and the rest of the Titans, male and female.

Uranus, dreading encroachments by his children on his supreme power, confines them in the bowels of their mother Terra, who, oppressed by the burthen, conspires with them against the authority of their father. Cronus, from the recesses of her body, assaults and emasculates Uranus² as he approaches to embrace her, and casts the mutilated parts into the sea. The foam which they create, when tossed in the waves, generates Venus³; the blood-drops from the wound the Erinnyes and Giants.⁴

Night⁵ produces the Fates, Death, Sleep, Dreams, Strife. Strife generates a race of kindred evils and vices.

From Pontus⁶ springs Nereus, who begets of Terra the marine deities Thaumās, Phorcys, and Ceto. From Nereus and the Oceanid Doris are born the fifty Nereids or sea-nymphs.

Electra, daughter of Ocean, bears to Thaumās, Iris and the Harpies.⁷

Phorcys begets of Ceto, Enyo and the Gorgons. From the body of the gorgon Medusa, when slain by Perseus, spring Chrysaor and Pegasus. From Chrysaor and Calliroe, daughter of Ocean, are born the giant Geryoneus slain by Hercules, and the dragon Echidna.

Echidna and Typhaon⁸ procreate Orthus and Cerberus, the Hydra and the Chimæra. From Orthus and the Chimæra issue the Sphinx and Nemean lion.

From Ocean and his sister Tethys⁹ spring the rivers and fountains.

Thia bears to Hyperion, the Sun¹⁰, the Moon, and Aurora.

The Titan Crius begets of his sister Eurybia, Astræus, Pallas, and Perses. From Astræus and Aurora issue Zephyrus, Boreas, and Notus; from the same father and Erigenia, Hesperus and the other stars.

From Pallas and Styx¹¹ issue Zelus, Nicē, Kratos, and Biē, who with their mother, first among the gods declared for the cause of Jupiter in his contest with Cronus and the Titans. In reward of this service Styx is ordained the solemn oath of the gods, and her sons are honoured with precedence in the household, and attendance on the person of Jove. The Titans Cœus and Phœbe procreate Latona and Asteria. Perses and Asteria give birth to Hecate, whose varied attributes are described.

III. Rhea¹ bears to Cronus, Vesta, Ceres, Juno, Pluto, and Neptune, whom their father successively swallows up, warned by a prophecy of his own parents Uranus and Terra, that he should be dethroned by one of his children. Rhea, at the birth of Jove, by the advice and connivance of her father and mother, presents Cronus with a stone wrapped in swaddling clothes, which he devours in place of the infant. Jove is nourished secretly in Crete. The stone acts as a vomit upon Cronus, who throws up his other children.²

Jove liberates his uncles the Titans, enchained by Uranus, who provide him with thunder and lightning, the arms by which he secures his dominion over gods and men.³

Iapetus espouses the Oceanid Clymene, who bears him Atlas, Menœtius, Prometheus, and Epimetheus. Menœtius is banished by Jupiter to Erebus for impiety. Atlas is charged with the support of the heavens.

Prometheus, guilty of scoffing at Jove's divine rite of sacrifice⁴, of robbing heaven of its fire, and of imparting the use of that element to mankind, is chained to a rock, and tortured by a vulture, in Mount Caucasus. To punish the impiety of his accomplice mortals Jupiter sends upon earth the fatal gift of Pandora⁵, mother of the race of women, who is received and harboured by Epimetheus, the youngest of the four ill-starred Iapetids.

Jove releases Briareus, Cottus, and Gyges⁶, from the durance to which they had been condemned by their father Uranus. With their aid, after a desperate conflict, he conquers his father Cronus and the rest of the Titans, whom he banishes to the infernal regions.⁷ His own three allies are rewarded with dwellings on the neighbouring shore of Ocean, where they guard the gates of the Titanian prison.

Tartarus and Terra beget the monster Typhœus, from whom⁸ spring the noxious winds and vapours, and whom Jupiter destroys with his thunderbolts.

IV. Jupiter is chosen King of Heaven¹ by his brothers and comrades in arms. He first espouses Metis, whom, when pregnant with Pallas, he swallows up, apprised by Uranus and Terra, through the same prophetic warning formerly vouchsafed by them to his own father, that the infant, if allowed to come to the birth, would prove more powerful than himself. From Themis his second wife², Jove procreates the Hours, Dicē, Irene, and Eunomia; from the Oceanid Eurynome, the three Graces; from Ceres, Proserpine, who espouses Pluto; from the Titaness Mnemosyne, the Muses; from Latona, Apollo and Artemis; from Juno, Hebe Mars and Ilithyia. From his own head he produces Pallas. Juno in her turn spontaneously gives birth to Vulcan.

Mars and Venus generate Terror, Panic, and Harmonia, who espouses Cadmus.

Jupiter begets Mercury of Maja, Bacchus of Semele, Hercules of Alcmena.

Vulcan espouses the Grace Aglaia; Bacchus, Ariadne; Hercules, Hebe. From the Oceanid Perseis and the Sun are born Æetes and Circe. The Oceanid Idyia bears Medea to Æetes.

The offspring of goddesses by mortals³ are: Plutus by Iasius of Ceres; Ino and Semele by Cadmus of Harmonia; Memnon and Emathion of Aurora by Tithonus; Phaëton of the same goddess by Cephalus; Medeu's of Medea by Jason; Phocus of the Nereid Psamathe by Æacus. Thetis bears Achilles to Peleus; Venus, Æneas to Anchises; from Circe are born Agrius, Latinus, and Telegonus to Ulysses; from Calypso, Nausithoüs and Nausinoüs to the same hero.

9. The Theogony, though devoted to a higher order of subject, and aspiring to a more dignified style, is a poem of greatly inferior merit to the Works and Days. To the genuine originality of the latter poem it can advance no pretension. As the earliest complete standard of the Greek system of cosmogony, it is, no doubt, a valuable relic. But the elements of that system, amid the variety which popular tradition placed at the author's disposal, are selected with little judgment, and arranged with as little taste or propriety.

Those charges of inconsistency, of alternate diffuseness and abruptness, dryness and tautology, which have been so lavishly heaped upon both poems by modern commentators, if unmerited or exaggerated in the case of the Works, are amply justified in that of the Theogony. How far these defects are to be laid at the door of the original author, how far they may have been engrafted on the genuine text in its progress to posterity, is a question which, while affording a fairer field for conjectural criticism than in some other similar cases, must yet, in the absence of historical data, remain essentially barren of practical results. The more critical view however, even in the present case, appears to be the reverse of that generally popular in the modern schools. It is certainly more probable in itself, that such anomalies in a national text-book of religious dogma, should have originated in the excitement of a single fervid and wayward genius of a semibarbarous age, and have been transmitted to posterity in the form in which they were first promulgated, than that they should have been deliberately introduced by the studied artifice of the bookmakers of a later age of literary culture.¹

The bond of unity which the Hellenic system of divine genealogy supplied for the composition of a didactic epopee, was the succession of dynasties in the celestial royal family. It is one which, lax and ineffective as it appears in this poem, was capable, under more genial treatment, of being turned to better account. These vicissitudes of divine dynasty, also, though more obscurely, referred to by Homer², were evidently meant to shadow forth, through the rude veil of enigma in which they are shrouded, the early progress, not only of physical creation, but of human society; the gradual ascendancy of mind over matter, of intellect and order over confusion and barbarism. The stages of the progress, which have been indicated by corresponding numbers in the above epitome, are grotesquely symbolised by the different expedients, or varieties of the same expedient, to which the successive generations of rulers resort for arresting, or impeding, the course of revolutionary developement, as figured in the birth and enterprising character of their respective offspring. The inert mass Chaos resolves itself into two more active material agencies, personified as Uranus (Heaven) and Gaia (Earth). From their uncouth embraces proceed the Titans, a race of livelier more animated abstractions. These their father, as a summary check to their interference with his divine power, relodges, as successively brought to light, in the bowels of their mother. He is, however, discomfited by Cronus (Time), the youngest and most vigorous among them, to whom he abandons his throne. The policy of the new ruler in regard to the rising generation, while substantially the same, is in so far an improvement upon that of his father, that, warned by its ill success, he adopts the safer mode of embowelling his progeny in his own entrails instead of those of their mother. This device is overmatched in its turn by the more advanced intelligence of those with whom he has to deal, and he too is defeated and deposed. The next and last stage of divine revolution reflects still more clearly the spirit of the legend. In the person of Jupiter, the intellectual organisation of the world was to be finally consummated. He espouses accordingly Metis, or Wisdom. His offspring by her is also preordained by Destiny, if brought to the birth, to inflict on him the same fate as had successively overtaken his father and grandfather. To avoid this danger, following up and improving upon their abortive series of devices, he takes the more certain precaution of swallowing both mother and child; thus consolidating absolute wisdom with absolute power, and leaving neither opportunity nor ability in any other quarter for successful interference with his supreme authority.

To this theory of progressive intellectual development as shadowed forth in the Theogony, might perhaps be objected, that it is not so much by their own more advanced wisdom, as through the subtle devices of their mothers, Terra and Rhea respectively ¹, that Saturn and Jupiter are each represented in the poet's description as dethroning their fathers. Jupiter, it might further be urged, even in his last decisive measure of cosmogonical policy, acts under the advice of his grandfather and grandmother.² That the apparent anomaly however, lies not in the original system, but with the author of the poem, who has failed to appreciate the finer spirit of his subject, may be inferred from the parallel of other later, but no less authoritative Greek theological standards. With Æschylus ³ for example, Prometheus (Forethought), and his mother Themis ⁴ (Order), appear as principal agents in the last stage of divine revolution, and as cognisant, and probably promoters and counsellors, of those which preceded. Prometheus, in the same series of mythical history, is the acknowledged type of intellectual advancement. The functions assigned him in the system of Æschylus are, therefore, in close harmony with the interpretation above proposed, of the primitive symbolic import of the legend of physical progress. But in the Hesiodic fable Prometheus is not brought on the scene at all, until after the establishment of Jupiter's dynasty. In the Theogony again, Terra¹ administers the vomit which forces Saturn to disgorge the elder branches of his family. In other versions of the legend the same medicinal function is assigned, in equally apt conformity with the view here taken of the genuine spirit of that legend, to Metis, or Wisdom², whom Jove afterwards espouses.

10. That amid a certain unity of substance, a considerable latitude was permitted to poetical discretion in the details of the Hellenic system of cosmogony, is further evinced by a comparison of the different versions given by Homer of several of the most important of those details, versions displaying, for the most part, a great superiority of taste and judgement. In the Theogony, Ocean, in palpable repugnance to the received principle, not only of the Greek but of all Pagan cosmogony, is a being of secondary order, one of the common herd of Titans, produce of the incestuous connexion of Uranus and Terra. He is even made younger brother of Pontus or the Sea, who in every other system appears but as one of his own subordinate members. With Homer, who is here unquestionably the organ of the most popular and primitive doctrine, the same Ocean is the progenitor, not only of the whole liquid creation, but of the whole divine race, the father, not the offspring, of Uranus and Terra; the vivified chaos in fact, or common parent of all matter.¹ Homer consequently knows no separate Chaos, its functions being merged in those of Ocean. That the disgusting fable of the mutilation of Uranus was unknown to, or repudiated by Homer, may also be inferred from the different account given by him of the birth of Venus. With him the Goddess of Love is daughter of Jupiter and Dione²; with Hesiod she is the spontaneous fruit of the filthy parricidal act of Saturn. According to Hesiod, Jupiter is the youngest son of Saturn and Rhea, preserved from his father's gullet as the instrument of deliverance to his brethren, and of vengeance on their devourer. By Homer he is described as the first-born of his father.³ Homer's version therefore of the revolution which placed Jupiter on the throne of Saturn, must have differed from that of Hesiod. Both systems have the defect of exhibiting mind as subordinate to matter in the order of mundane developement. Of creation in the higher sense, or the calling into existence of habitable animated worlds, by the fiat of a supreme eternal spirit, out of chaos or nonentity, as in the Mosaic system, neither Hesiod nor Homer manifests any conception. The Titans, or properly animated race of gods, appear but in the second stage of cosmogonical succession, merging slowly out of the inert masses of Chaos and Earth. With Hesiod, even Heaven, the familiar poetical type of divine abstraction, is the offspring of Terra, the equally familiar type of gross matter. The antiquity assigned by Hesiod to Eros, or Love, in the order of creation, seems to contain the germ of a fine image, which might, with a more genial poet, have aided in idealising the dry materialism of his cosmogony, but which the Bæotian minstrel has allowed to remain completely in the background.

In addition to the didactic mysticism of the subject, the Hesiodic narrative, poetically considered, labours under a monotonous sameness in the succession of the three principal events. To relieve this monotony required a skilful application of the more delicate resources of epic art, tact and variety of arrangement, appropriate interspersions of episodes, and a spirited management of the genealogical and illustrative details. These however were expedients foreign to the genius of the author, who may rather be charged with exaggerating the natural drawbacks of his subject, by his desultory and incoherent mode of treatment. Not only do the leading heads of narrative stand in slender epic connexion with each other, floating as insulated masses in the sea of genealogical commonplace, but even in their individual capacity, are mutilated and disjointed. Sometimes a commencement, sometimes a conclusion, sometimes an important incident fails altogether, is left to the conjecture of the reader, or must be sought in some widely separate portion of the text. From the commencement down to the mutilation of Uranus the narrative pursues a tolerably coherent course. Here however it abruptly breaks off, leaving the first revolution of the series incomplete. The only specified results of the parricidal act of Cronus are, the birth of Venus and some inferior deities, with a punning application by the outraged old sovereign, of the name "Titans" to his children, because they had "stretched out" their hands against their father.¹ The narrative then quietly resumes its ordinary genealogical course. allusion whatever is made to the deposition of Uranus, or the usurpation of Cronus. It is only after an interval of about two hundred and fifty lines, in the course of which too, Jupiter is repeatedly put forward, episodically indeed, but prominently and therefore inappropriately, in the light of supreme ruler¹, that Saturn and Rhea are abruptly introduced as reigning in the stead of their father and mother², and the new king as engaged in a similar set of expedients to deliver himself from the encumbrance of his own increasing family.

The conclusion of this head of the subject is equally lame. Cronus, outwitted in his turn by the artifices of his wife and youngest son, disgorges his elder progeny, and there we leave him.³ Jupiter then releases his uncles⁴, the sons of Uranus, from the captivity to which they had been condemned by their father; and they, in gratitude for this benefit, supply their nephew with the arms by which he obtained and secured his royal authority. This, according to the natural interpretation of the context, would imply that Jupiter, by the aid of his uncles, usurped the supreme dignity immediately after the successful intrigue of his mother against his father. In the sequel however, after another long series of genealogical commonplace or episodical illustration, we are told, that he did not obtain possession of his empire until after an exterminating war against those very uncles, previously described as his friends.⁵

Upon every sound principle of epic composition, the narrative of this Titanic war and victory of Jupiter, ought to have formed the immediate sequel of the successful conspiracy of Rhea against her husband. The two subjects however, are separated by an interval of upwards of a hundred lines¹ devoted to the episodes of Prometheus and Pandora, and to other matters standing in no sort of connexion with either of the above two principal heads of subject, but throughout which the same Jupiter, who, we are told in the ensuing narrative of the war, was not elected king until after its conclusion², appears, without explanation or apology, as supreme ruler of the universe. In the same strange spirit of incoherence, the main object and grand result of the war, the instalment of Jupiter in the royal authority, is separated from the conclusion of the combat itself by an interval of another hundred and fifty lines³ of unimportant or altogether extraneous matter. Such are the birth and adventures of Typhöeus, where Jove again, before occupying his father's throne, appears, as in the affair of Prometheus, in full exercise of the royal authority.⁴

11. The Proœmium of the Theogony is characterised by anomalies of structure no less obvious than those in the body of the work. While its length exceeds all just proportion to that of the poem which it ushers in, it exhibits, with the incoherence common to the rest of the narrative, a diffuseness proper to itself, offering, in fact, little more than a disjointed repetition of the same or closely similar images. There is therefore much plausibility in the Numerous other minor inconsistencies or redundancies occur throughout the details of the text, of which it may be difficult to say how far they are to be ascribed to the author of the poem, how far to the license of transcribers and interpolators. opinion of Hermann, now generally adopted by critical commentators, that these hundred lines of introduction comprise, not one, but several, of those proœmia habitually prefixed to the epic compositions of this early period in the public rehearsals, and afterwards embodied in the editions of the poems as portions of the genuine text. It might naturally happen that in different manuscripts, current, during the earlier ages of writing, simultaneously with the more popular mode of oral promulgation, different proœmia, containing perhaps certain passages or verses in common, might be preferred. These again the editors of later times, unable to decide between their respective claims to priority, might naturally, in their efforts to distribute equal justice to all, have abridged or condensed into one.¹ the poem.

The essentially desultory character of the Hesiodic school of poetry, not only held out great temptation to the addition of such spurious proœmia, but might, where a certain congeniality of subject existed, suggest the connexion with each other in recitation or even in publication, of works originally destined by their authors to be altogether distinct. Traces of this process are observable in the last two lines of the Theogony, where the poet, after "having sung the progeny of goddesses," is made to invite his hearers to listen to his "song concerning the race of women." This seems a plain allusion to another Hesiodic poem, the Catalogue of Women, as having formed a subsequent link in a chain of recital. Unless therefore the same author be assumed to have composed both works, and to have been in the habit of reciting them in continuous order, the latter portion of the Theogony must have been tampered with, for the convenience of such recital, by some Hesiodic rhapsodist.

12. The style of the Theogony is marked by the same anomaly and incongruity as its materials. The procœmium, comprising the first hundred and fifteen lines, apart from a few Æolo-Bœotic idioms, is very similar in character to the parallel portions of the Homeric hymns. The basis of the main text of the work is little more than a series of names or dry genealogical details, strung together by the customary mechanism of epic commonplace. In the episodes or illustrative portions of the narrative, where greater scope existed for the display of individual taste, the style may be described as a mixture of the Hesiodic and Homeric. Where the tenor of the subject was favourable to the more homely and familiar manner of the Works and Days, as, for example, in the episodes of Pandora and Hecate, an occasional correspondence, sometimes to the letter, of whole verses and passages, affords evidence that, whether the same or a different poet, the author of the one work borrowed from, or was influenced by, the contents of the other. There may also frequently be recognised in these portions of the Theogony, a tendency to the same quaint brevity of expression, homely simplicity of narrative, and placid tone of versification, which form the pervading characteristics of the sister poem; but with little or none of its genuine originality, terse and vigorous phraseology, or deep vein of moral sentiment.¹ Where, on the other hand, the subject assumes a more dignified character, as in the description of the wars in heaven, and other more exciting parts of the narrative, the homely style of the Works disappears, and gives place to the more ambitious tone of language and sentiment proper to the secondary heroic or Homeric school. The features of Homeric correspondence are now no longer confined to the common stock of epic mannerism: they extend to whole verses or passages¹, betraying, in the mode and occasion of their introduction, the imitative genius of the author; and wherever the ambition displays itself to soar into the higher regions of the martial or terrible, the result is a confused crowding or nauseous repetition² of bombastic phrases and overdrawn images. A certain tautology, both in sound and expression, is indeed characteristic of the whole illustrative element of the poem, and recurs under so great a similarity of form in the parallel passages³, as to baffle all attempts to explain

These several sets of verses are but so many series of repetitions of the same stale hyperboles. With the last seven lines, descriptive of the earth groaning, burning, boiling, melting, &c., over and over again, amid thunder, crash, flash, &c. &c., may be collated 690—707., which are in so very similar a style of extravagance, that, in perusing the two passages, it away upon the modern principle, of shifting the responsibility of every defect or eccentricity in an antient work, from the original author to its transcribers or editors.

13. In applying the results of the above analysis to the question concerning the age and authorship of the Theogony, in its relation to the Works and Days, it will be proper, in the first place, to have distinctly before us the historical data on the subject, in so far as popular tradition, or the opinion of the leading antient critics, may deserve to rank as historical authority. Although the principal Hesiodic poems furnished a more or less fertile theme for critical speculation to the Alexandrian grammarians, there remains no trace of scepticism on their part, or on that of their predecessors of the early Attic school, as to the common origin of these two works. The first extant notice of difference of opinion is from Pausanias, who, while himself designating the Theogony as the "imputed" work of Hesiod, describes the local tradition of the poet's fellow-citizens as denying its title to that honour.¹ The authority of the Heliconian critics, whatever may be its value in other respects, certainly possesses that of impartiality. As the Theogony was the standard national work on a subject of highest national importance, they would, but for some strong evidence to the contrary, have been more likely to assert than repudiate the claims one is scarcely conscious which is which. It is certainly less likely that this strange and glaring tautology should, as Hermann and others suppose, have been deliberately introduced by the compilers of a refined period of literature, than that it should spontaneously have proceeded from a single wayward or eccentric poet. The business of the professional bookmaker was to smooth down all such irregularities.

of their native bard to its production. The internal evidence of the poems tends also to bear out their opinion. The fundamental property of the Works and Days is a genuine unaffected simplicity, pervading, under such natural varieties of tone as the subject itself involved, every portion of the text. The Theogony, on the other hand, betrays, wherever it emerges from the routine of epic mannerism, an effort to imitate, combined in most cases with a zeal to exaggerate, a style not natural to its author, whether the ingenuous placidity of the Æolo-Bæotic, or the martial dignity of the Homeric muse.

The cautious critic will yet be disposed to hesitate before adopting these points of internal difference, strong as they may appear, as conclusive argument on the negative side, in opposition to the acquiescence of Aristarchus or Apollonius in the popular view, and to other partially redeeming features of correspondence already adverted to, in dialect, numbers, versification, and idiomatic expression. There may also perhaps be observed, wherever the Theogony pursues a natural and equable tone of narrative, indications that the homely spirit of the genuine Hesiod was upon the whole more congenial to the talent of its author, than the heroic vein to which he often aspires. Might it not therefore be a fair question, whether the anomalies of the poem may not be the natural consequence of an ambition to excel in a style of composition to which the author's genius was not adapted? Could we figure to ourselves the poet of the Works a candidate for fame in the heroic department of his art, we might imagine the result not altogether dissimilar to a Theogony. It must however be admitted, that some of the passages of the latter poem, marked by glaring exaggeration of parallel texts of the Works, savour more of the plagiarist than of the same author.¹ Was it likely, it might also be asked, that a poet of so much native simplicity, both of personal character and style, as beams forth in the Works and Days, should be infected with this ambition to shine in a department of art so foreign to his genius?

Upon the whole, the balance of argument must, with modern critics, appear favourable to the Heliconian doctrine. Were the supporters of that doctrine disposed to subtilise on the point of internal evidence, it might perhaps be open to question, not merely whether the author of the Theogony, though evidently a disciple of the Æolo-Bœotic school, was the genuine Ascræan Hesiod, but whether he was a native Bœotian. Among the characteristics of the primitive Hesiod of the Works, is a marked spirit of local nationality. Every allusion, historical or topogra-

¹ Compare, for example, in the fable of Pandora, as narrated in each work, the passages describing the withholding of fire by Jupiter, and its robbery by Prometheus:

That the second of these passages is a servile copy or paraphrase of the first cannot admit of a doubt. Every idea, so simply expressed in the one, is expanded or diluted in the other by superfluous epithets or diffuse periphrasis. This criticism might be extended to other portions of each poem.

phical, connects him, directly or indirectly, with Bæotia and Mount Helicon. In the Theogony on the other hand, with the exception of the opening address to the Muses, the apocryphal character of which is admitted, there is nothing tending to identify the author with those regions. Several passages may even be adduced in an opposite sense. Among the twenty-five principal rivers, who figure as sons of Ocean, no Bæotian stream is included. As little trace is there of similar honour conferred on any Bæotian lake, fountain, or other poetical locality, in the various catalogues of Nereïds, Oceanids, and other figurative personages of the same class.

Apart from the copious traces above referred to of imitation or plagiarism, there is little in the style and diction of the Theogony, indicating a more recent age than that of the Works and Days. The arguments derived from the greater apparent extent of geographical knowledge in the former poem, prove comparatively little. The subject of the Works offered no similar opening for geographical allusions; while of the kindred class of evidence, from contemporary arts, manners, or events, the text of the Theogony, in its turn, is equally barren.

SHIELD OF HERCULES.

Shield of Hercules.

14. Amphitryon, constrained to retire from Argos for a season, in atonement of an involuntary fratricide, takes refuge in Thebes, where he is honourably received. He is accompanied in his banishment by his newly wedded spouse Alcmena, daughter of his slain kinsman Electryon. The heroine however refuses to admit him to her bed, until he shall have fulfilled the condition on which she married him, by avenging the death of her brothers, slain in a war against the Taphians and Teleboans. On the night of the hero's return from the performance of this duty, Jupiter, having selected the Argive princess as the mother of an illustrious hero and benefactor of the human race, visits her secretly and begets Hercules. By Amphitryon, later on the same night, she conceives Iphicles.

Hercules, on attaining man's estate, among other warlike expeditions, undertakes one¹ against Cynus son of Mars, a notorious brigand, who, supported by his divine father, infests the passes between Thessaly and Bœotia, despoiling not only ordinary travellers, but the pilgrims bearing gifts to the Pythian sanctuary.

On approaching the robber's haunt, the Theban hero, with his charioteer Iolaus, prepares for battle. His armour, the workmanship of Vulcan and gift of the gods, especially the richly adorned shield, is described in much detail.² Minerva³ appears as patroness of Hercules, and encourages him to the combat.

On the approach of Cynus, backed by his father and ally Mars, to dispute the passage, Hercules requests, in conciliatory terms, permission to proceed unmolested on a visit to Ceÿx king of Iolchos, father-in-law of Cynus. Negotiation however proves vain. Hercules and Cynus then engage on foot, and Cynus is slain. Mars, rushing on to avenge the death of his son, is wounded by Hercules, and borne off the field by his attendants Terror and Panic. The obsequies of Cynus are performed by Ceÿx at Iolchos; but the tumulus raised over his grave is swept away by Apollo, in revenge of his outrageous treatment of the pilgrims to the Delphic shrine.

This poem partakes in no degree of the didactic character, usually held to be the distinctive feature of the Æolo-Bœotic school of minstrelsy. It treats a purely heroic subject in a purely heroic manner. It is, in fact, the only remaining entire specimen of early heroic poetry, except the Iliad and Odyssey, and, if taken as a sample of the voluminous library of lost compositions of the same class, would certainly convey no favourable impression of their merits. To unity of action it has as little pretension as the Theogony. The preliminary notice of the adventures of Amphitryon and birth of Hercules, has no

epic connexion with the encounter between the latter hero and Cynus. There would be less ground for the charge of incoherence, had that encounter been the first exploit of Hercules. It might then, as an illustration of the greatness to which he had just been described as predestined, have formed a sort of sequel to the narrative in which that announcement is made. But in the subsequent text, the combat with Cynus is stated to have been one of the later exploits of the hero¹, leaving a wide gap between it and his birth and childhood. This anomaly is explained by the fact transmitted on trustworthy authority, that the first fifty-six lines, descriptive of the amour of Jupiter and Alcmena, are borrowed from another Hesiodic poem, the Catalogue of Women, and prefixed as exordium to the main action of the Shield.²

It were fruitless to speculate, in the absence of all historical data, how far this combination may be due to the original poet of the Shield, assuming, as would in that case be a reasonable inference, that the Catalogue and the Shield were by the same author. It is perhaps more probable, that the popular rhapsodists, in their public recitations of the main text of the Shield, have, in place of one of their usual inaugural proœmia to Jove, preferred a passage of another accredited poem of Hesiod, describing the hero's nativity, of his own share in which important event the god did not disdain to be proud.

The main narrative, commencing with verse 57., is open to no objection on the score of epic consistency. It is in fact but a fugitive ballad, descriptive of a single quarrel and victory of Hercules, the causes and results of which are detailed in their natural order. The poem, however, forfeits all claim to propriety of structure by the undue proportion of the episodical element, two thirds of the whole being devoted to an elaborate description of the hero's arms, especially his shield. This digression accordingly has usurped, in familiar usage, the title and honours of principal subject.

15. The composition and style are marked, as in the Theogony, by broad features of difference in different parts of the text. The introductory and concluding portions, where the narrative pursues a somewhat more equable course, are of a comparatively simple and pleasing tenor. But no sooner does the subject become more excited, or the author himself aspire to the pathetic or sublime, than the defects already noted in the Theogony appear in still more extravagant forms. They are chiefly observable in the description of the Shield itself, from verse 139. downwards. The style here suddenly becomes wild and fantastic without originality, and turgid without dignity. These blemishes are rendered the more offensive, by an evident ambition to emulate or surpass other higher standards of epic excellence. The imitation of Homer might indeed be characterised as servile, were it not for the clumsy efforts of the copyist, by gross exaggeration, to impart novelty to his borrowed materials. While the whole design of the episode is modelled on that of the Shield of Achilles, there is scarcely an individual image with which the reader is familiar in Homer's brilliant description, but has here been reproduced to the letter, or in substance, under the tasteless modifications above noticed. But of that orderly succession of parts, that happy apportioning of the masses of text to the corresponding heads of subject, that mixture of simplicity and variety in the illustrative details, that elegance of structure and harmony of versification, which in the episode of the Iliad constitute each descriptive group a miniature epic poem, not a trace is here to be found. The author of the Hesiodic Shield seems rather to have sought to enhance the effect of his borrowed materials by the wild disorder of their distribution; sometimes crowded together, sometimes scattered at random in broken fragments, among the equally ill-digested heads of new matter supplied from his own resources. Not only is the poetical law against rude collisions of heterogeneous elements completely set at nought, but the text is often, to all appearance, purposely so disposed, that the same line contains the conclusion of one and the commencement of another image of the most offensively opposite character. The joyous is suddenly converted into the pathetic, the tender into the terrible, with an almost burlesque effect. Attention may be more especially directed to the transition, from the adventure of Perseus and Medusa to the paraphrase of Homer's description of the "two cities," which by a most preposterous fancy, are here made the head ornaments of the two surviving Gorgons.¹ Equally incongruous is the change from the warlike to the peaceful community, where the same line transports us from the horrible description of the demon Achlys, to the golden gates² and festive choirs of the happy community. In the sequel are hurried forward, in breathless succession, a crowd of images³, each of which supplies, or might have supplied, Homer with a distinct chapter of descriptive episode: arable land and ploughmen, growing crop, reaping, threshing, vineyards with grapes ripening and ripe, wine-gathering, wine-making; all heaped in promiscuous disorder upon each other, and upon groups of hunters of hare and boar, wrestlers, boxers, and chariot-racers. From the prize tripod of the chariot-race we abruptly return to the river Ocean¹, running, according to the apparent order of the text, round the basin of the tripod, rather than, as in the sequel we are told, and as Homer's authority and common sense required, round the circumference of the whole shield.

The examples of this strange confusion are so frequent, and recur with so similar and so systematic a method, as to imply, not so much carelessness or want of tact, as an actual intention on the author's part to surprise and bewilder, both by the disorder in which his pictures are exhibited, and by their glaring colours and extravagant forms. The impressive features which the few graphic touches of the great master of the Iliad impart to his images of death or terror, are here distorted into the ghastly grin or ferocious grimace. The eight pithy lines, for example, descriptive of the battle in the Homeric shield², are swelled into three times that number³ by an accumulation of extravagant horrors, enhanced even to the disgusting in the persons of the Parcæ, most preposterously introduced as military goddesses. Among their comrades is another demon, Achlys, or Mist, also peculiar to this poet's martial pantheon, who surpasses even her sister monsters in the number and brutality of her attributes, contributing not only eyes, teeth, claws, and blood (of Mist), but dust, filth, even defluxion from the nose, to make up the fulness of the odious picture. While the efforts of the copyist to emulate the brilliancy of Homer's scenes of festive joy, result but in their distension into vapid insipidity, the elegant hyperboles in which the one describes the wonders of the forge of Vulcan, are strained into impossibilities so palpable as to destroy every illusion of imitative art. Such is the description of the sculptured figure of Perseus on the shield, hovering in the air above it, without touching any part of it¹; an image obviously absurd, even as a miraculous effect, in a work of relief. The figure of the two Gorgons making, not the earth or pavement, but the actual metal of the shield resound with their vehement tramping², is another strange compound of art and reality equally destructive of all poetical illusion.

In the midst of this profusion of matter, the real poverty of the author's imagination is evinced by the nauseous reiteration of the same, or closely similar, turgid phrases or far-fetched ideas³; sometimes verbally repeated, sometimes under unimportant variations, often within a few lines of each other. That he was, however, himself diffident of the success of his efforts to enforce the reality of his pictures, may be inferred from the frequent and earnest renewal of his personal assurance of their astonishing effect and striking resemblance to the originals.¹ The perpetual recurrence of the quaint commonplace in which this assurance is conveyed, forms indeed a prominent characteristic of his style; and, like the mottoes appended to figures in the early rude productions of graphic art, tends but to destroy the illusion which it is meant to favour.

16. The authenticated fact above noticed, of the first fifty-six lines of this poem being an extract from another work ascribed to the same author, affords a reasonable opening for the doubt, whether the present connexion even of the integral parts of the remaining text is coeval with their first composition, or may not also be the result of a similar patchwork. The great disproportion between the episode of the Shield and the main narrative of the combat, may seem to render their existing combination the less likely to have suggested itself to the original poet. It might, however, be urged in favour of unity of authorship, that this stringing together of desultory narratives by a slender thread of main action, as exemplified especially in the Catalogue of Women, was itself a familiar characteristic of the Hesiodic school of poetry. The probability therefore becomes the greater, that a single poet of that school, who had brought to maturity such an effusion as that comprised in the hundred and eighty verses of the Shield proper, may have been at pains to construct, out of the martial legends of his native district, a heroic framework in which to exhibit his gaudy picture, very similar to that in which it is now encased.

Although the claims of this poem, or of any part of it, to the honours of a genuine work of Hesiod, of the author that is of either the Works or Theogony, were rejected by various antient critics, the balance of opinion seems yet to have leaned to the popular belief¹, in so far at least as regards the Theogony. By modern commentators these claims have been very generally set aside. Here again internal evidence certainly favours the Separatist view; for although the same defects of exaggeration, bombast, and tautology, above pointed out in the Shield, are common to the parallel descriptions of the Theogony, there is a considerable difference in the forms, both of imagery and phraseology, in which they are exhibited. It is also worthy of remark, that the general idiom of this poem, in spite of its pervading leaven of Homeric imitation, differs more widely from the familiar heroic or Homeric dialect, than that of either Works and Days, or perhaps of any other existing specimen of epic minstrelsy.²

² In the extensive use, for example, of the verb έχω with an auxiliary power, as μάχην, δῆριν, πόνον, &c., έχον, for έμάχοντο, έπόνοντο, &c. (vv. 241.

Considering the many and glaring defects of this work, and the very small amount of poetical merit by which they are counterbalanced, it may seem strange that it should alone have survived the wreck of the remaining mass of Hesiodic poems, many of which may be presumed to have been better specimens of the same school of composition. It can boast however at least the charm of a boundless eccentricity. With all its servility of Homeric imitation, it possesses in its own peculiar vein of exaggeration and extravagance, a kind of wild originality, more likely to obtain a hold on the popular public of every age, than the mediocrity or commonplace of other more correct and elegant compositions of the later school of epic minstrelsy.

Certain other titles occasionally comprised in the list have here been omitted, either as resting on no sufficient authority, as variations of others above enumerated, or as proper merely to particular parts or episodes of poems, the separate existence of which is better ascertained. On the other hand, several of the above number, rejected by modern commentators chiefly on the last-mentioned ground, have been retained, in respect of their citation as independant poems not being in any degree qualified by the antients, while no other reasonable motive exists for setting them aside.¹

THE CATALOGUE OF WOMEN. ΕΟÆ (GENEALOGY OF HEROES).

It has been a much agitated question among modern scholars, whether the above titles are to be considered as representing the same poem under different names, or different poems.² On the whole, the balance of argument is in favour of the former opinion; the few passages of antient commentators where the three titles appear to be cited as distinct, being neutralised by others where they are no less plainly used as synonymous.¹ The best mode of reconciling this apparent anomaly, is to assume that certain of the three varieties, while common in a general sense to the whole poem or series of poems, attached more immediately to particular cantos or books, by a custom similar to that formerly cited in the case of the Cyclic Thebais. The work comprised, according to the only distinct enumeration extant, five books² or Catalogues. It happens however, that four books only are quoted by their separate numbers in the extant citations. It is further remarkable, that, in the only citations where any clear distinction seems to be drawn between the two titles Eoæ and Catalogues, that of Eoæ is accompanied by the special epithet of Great. Such a distinction evidently³ implies, in the portion of the series so honoured, some superiority to the others, either in respect of bulk or quality. If this peculiarity of usage be taken in connexion with the fact above noticed, that no citation occurs of the fifth book or Catalogue by its own number, the probability naturally suggests itself, that the same fifth book may be the portion especially designated as Great, the greatest of the Eoæ or Catalogues, and hence cited in its individual capacity under that more honourable title alone. Some modern commentators however, would reject the somewhat doubtful authority on which the existence of a fifth Catalogue rests, and, restricting the number to four, would assume the fourth to be the one honoured by the epithet of Great.¹ The question is a subtle one, and not likely to be brought to any positive issue by the aid of existing data.

The phrase Eoæ, or Eoiæ, is understood to be derived, by no very elegant course of etymology, from the first two words of a certain formula or commonplace, by which the birth and adventures of each succeeding heroine, were connected with those of her predecessors in the series.²

The whole poem or compilation of poems, was the most voluminous, and next to the Works and Days and Theogony, the most celebrated production ascribed to Hesiod. In general popularity indeed, it would seem, from the frequency of the appeals to its text by classical authors of all ages, to have fallen little short of either of those standard works of the school. The number of extant verses directly cited from it, under its various denominations, inclusive of the fifty-six prefixed to the Shield, amounts to about a hundred and thirty; while perhaps half that number may be added for passages which, though not specifically so quoted, may on internal evidence be assigned to the Catalogue. This forms a sum total greatly exceeding what can be identified as having belonged to any other lost poem of this period, and furnishing conclusive evidence, both of the bulk and the popularity of the Catalogue, and of its authority as a text-book of national tradition. It seems to have contained a complete repertory of heroic genealogy from the days of Prometheus and Deucalion, or rather of Pandora and Pyrrha, downwards³; especial reference being had to the lives and amours of distinguished females, from whom the more illustrious families or races derived their origin. The leading exploits of the offspring of the heroines were also episodically treated, often in considerable detail. The series appears, from the existing citations, to have commenced with the renewal of the human race after the deluge, by the agency of the mystical patriarchs above mentioned, and to have been continued down to the extinction of the race of Ulysses, in the second or third generation after the Trojan war.

As no general epitome of the poem, or specific notice of its contents, has been transmitted, but slender means exist for judging of its plan or structure. To epic unity, according to the Homeric standard, it could have had no pretension. There could have been no principal actor or protagonist; nor can even such a central basis of action be detected, as would have resulted from any special prominence given to the history of some favourite race of heroes. The principal title of the work, Catalogue (or Catalogues), seems in itself to vouch for its desultory character. The extant passages consist in a great measure of genealogical commonplace, and, even where in a more lively vein of narrative or description, exhibit but little trace of an ambition to tread the higher paths of heroic poetry. The style is upon the whole pleasing, the versification harmonious, and the general

p. 478. Müller's description of the Hesiodic or Æolo-Bæotic mythology, as "meagre and scanty compared with that of the Ionian tribes," is abundantly disproved by the contents of this poem, not to mention the Theogony, Melampodia, and others of the same school. It is also curiously inconsistent with his own subsequent notice, of Hesiod's efforts "to reduce the bewildering and endless variety of stories concerning the gods to a connected system." (Hist. of Gr. Lit. p. 78, 79) tone of sentiment and language, without marked features either of peculiarity or merit, is simple and inoffensive; as distinct from the genial originality of the Works, as from the affectation or extravagance of the Theogony or Shield.

The claims of the Catalogue, or parts of it, to genuine Hesiodic origin, seem to have been recognised by Crates¹, Apollonius Rhodius², and Aristarchus³; nor is any trace of opposition to those claims observable prior to the time of Pausanias.⁴

Modern commentators, in the case of this poem as of all the other productions of the primitive Epic Muse, would ascribe different portions of the text to different authors, chiefly from the circumstance of its containing conflicting versions of the same fable.⁵ The argument itself is worth little, although the inference may very probably be correct. Traces of the same dialectic peculiarities which tend to establish the Æolo-Bæotic origin of the three other poems, are also observable, though more rarely, in the remains of the Catalogue.⁶ Many of the fragments betray a comparatively recent origin; among others, those celebrating the heroes Belus, Arabus, Macedon, and the Satyrs⁷, a race of sylvan deities as little familiar to the Hesiod of the Theogony as to Homer.

of its text, supply the only data for judging of its contents. The name Melampodia is derived from that of Melampus, a distinguished Argive seer, progenitor of a race of similarly gifted descendants. Among these were Amphiaraus, the most celebrated hero of the Theban war, and Theoclymenus, to whom a prominent part is assigned in the action of the Odyssey. It may be presumed therefore, that the adventures of Melampus and his family formed the basis of the principal subject, which was enlarged, as may be collected from the remnants of the text, by numerous episodes concerning other leading professors of the arts of divination. Of those remnants, one alone relates immediately to the hero; to his adventure namely with Iphiclus, recorded in the Odyssey.¹ Two are devoted to the affairs of the Theban seer Tiresias, which appear to have been treated in some detail. Other seven verses, where the Melampodia is not expressly cited, but which from internal evidence may reasonably be referred to the poem, allude to the last adventure and decease of the prophet Calchas, at Clarus in Ionia, on his journey homewards from Troy, in company with Amphilochous son of Amphiaraus. The author seems to have followed, concerning this event, a trivial variety of an equally trivial fable concerning the death of Homer. The prophet, like the poet, is described as having fallen a victim to mortification, on being surpassed by a rival Œdipus in successfully divining the number of growing fruits on a plentifully stocked figtree.² The subsequent adventures and death of Amphilochous by the hand of Apollo, were also narrated.

The whole number of verses referable on certain or plausible grounds to the Melampodia, amount to twenty-four. They convey no very favourable impression either of the materials or the style of the work. The incidents are for the most part trivial, or treated in a trivial tone; and the versification is little distinguished either for spirit or harmony. The poem was divided into books, of which three are mentioned. The ancients quote Hesiod unreservedly as the author.¹

THE ASTRONOMY.

nomy.

This poem², also cited under the title of Astrology, appears from the frequency and copiousness of the appeals to its authority, to have been a highly popular text-book of the science to which it was devoted, and to have treated its subject in considerable detail. It is usually cited as the acknowledged production of Hesiod³; sometimes, more doubtfully, as his imputed work.⁴

The preserved quotations or extracts describe the genealogy and influences of the Sun, Atlas, the Pleiads and Hyads, Arcturus, Orion, and others of the celestial heroes or heroines, who supply the favourite subjects of commentary to the primitive poetical astrologers. The history of Phaëton and his fall was treated at length, much as in the later popular repertories. The promotion of Eridanus to the honour of a celestial constellation, on account of his share in Phaëton's disaster, was also described, as was the like distinction conferred on the golden-fleeced ram of Phryxus. It is probable, as formerly remarked, that certain citations of Hesiod relating to field husbandry, which some would refer to another more bulky or more genuine Works and Days, were from this poem. The sciences of astronomy and agriculture, as evinced by the contents of the existing Works, were in primitive times so closely connected, that the one could hardly be treated in a popular manner without the other.

THE MAXIMS OF CHIRON.

This poem was a summary of the instructions delivered by the philosophic Centaur to his pupil Achilles. It was known to Pindar, and passages of its text were paraphrased by him.¹ Its genuine Hesiodic origin seems to have been recognised by the earlier quoters and commentators. Appeal is made to its authority in favour of a popular doctrine of the primitive ages of literature, that children should not be taught letters until after seven years of age.² The justice of this doctrine was admitted by other high authorities, inclusive of Eratosthenes. The grammarian Aristophanes³ first called in question the claim of the Maxims to emanate from the original Hesiod, but the work continues to be quoted under its popular title in the subsequent appeals to its text.⁴ Its three opening verses are

THE ÆGIMIUS

was ascribed ¹ by some to Hesiod, by others to Cercops of Miletus. The poem appears to have presented a more or less continuous epic narrative, of some bulk, being described as divided into two books. Ægimius, from whom it derives its title, was a patriarchal chief of the Dorian tribes who afterwards conquered Peloponnesus. The most celebrated adventure of this hero was a war against the Thessalian Lapithæ ², in which he prevailed, chiefly through the alliance of Hercules. Hard pressed by his warlike neighbours, he engaged the services of the Theban hero by a promise to bestow on him one third of the Dorian territory, should their united arms be crowned with success. The Lapithæ were defeated, but Hercules generously refused to accept the stipulated reward, in lieu of which it was agreed that Ægimius should undertake the duties of guardian to his benefactor's children. Hence the subsequent alliance of the Heraclid and Dorian races, and virtual identity of the two, on the final success of their assault on the empire of the Pelopidæ. This transaction offered certainly a noble subject for an epic poem, both by its own simplicity and martial dignity, and by reference to the mighty consequences with which the alliance it records was pregnant to the destinies of Hellas.

² Apollod. II. vii. 7., viii. 3.; Diod. Sic. IV. xxxvii.; conf. Müll. Dor. vol. I. p. 28.; Welck. Ep. C. p. 263. sqq.; Marcksch. sup. cit.

It appears however doubtful, whether the value of this kernel of poetical history was rightly appreciated by the author of the poem. Modern commentators have supposed, with apparent reason, that the narrative comprised also a large portion of the other subsequent adventures of the hero and his friend Hercules, or even of their immediate descendants, inclusive of the earlier abortive invasions of Peloponnesus by the Dorians.¹ Upon the opinion which may be formed as to such greater or less extension of the subject, must mainly depend how far the work is to be considered as an epic poem in the Aristotelian sense, how far as a mere metrical chronicle of events, on the more methodical but less poetical Hesiodic plan. This question connects itself with a peculiarity already pointed out in the extant notices of the work, where it is described as the only poem claiming a Hesiodic origin, with which any other name is associated besides that of Hesiod. A not improbable explanation of this peculiarity might suggest itself in the supposition, that while the general tone and dialect of the poem were Hesiodic, a superior degree of epic integrity, observable in its action, may have seemed incompatible with any positive title to rank among the compositions of the Æolo-Bæotic school.

The existing fragments of the poem throw but little light either on the subject or mode of treatment.

¹ It has even been conjectured by some commentators, (ap. Marcksch. p. 167.) that the poem may have comprised the conquests and settlements of the Dorians in Peloponnesus and other parts of Greece. This hypothesis, apart from other reasons, is completely set aside, by the absence of all appeal, by Pausanias and other popular historians of those events, to a work which would otherwise have formed their earliest and weightiest authority.

The passages expressly cited from the Ægimius appear all to have belonged to the episodical element of the work. No allusion, at least, there occurs either to Ægimius himself or to the Dorians. Two of the fragments enter at some length into the history of Io and her wanderings. One is devoted to the adventure of Phryxus and his Golden Fleece. A fourth, from the second book, narrated the proceedings of Thetis in regard to her children by Peleus, whom at their birth she committed, some to the fire, others to the water, as a test of their immortal nature. From the result of these experiments Achilles alone was preserved, through the interposition of his father, after the destruction of sundry brothers and sisters. This interference on the part of Peleus caused the quarrel and separation between him and his divine consort. Among the Hesiodic fragments not distinctly cited from the Ægimius, but assigned by modern commentators to that poem on conjectural grounds, there is one containing allusion to Dorian history; but even here no special reference is made to Ægimius himself or his adventures. Further speculation therefore, as to the precise subject or character of the poem, can little avail until some new light be shed on its contents. The ten remaining verses are in good and apparently genuine archaic style.

Cercops of Miletus, the other accredited author of the Ægimius, is described by the antients as a contemporary and rival of the Bœotian bard.¹ Several modern commentators would identify him, and perhaps on plausible grounds, with the later Orphic or

Pythagorean poet Cercops, of the time of the Pisistratidæ; if not as original author, as editor at least or enlarger of the antient poem.¹

THE NUPTIALS OF CEÿX.

The event here celebrated was, there can be little doubt, the marriage of Ceÿx and Alcyone²; an alliance which had the singular fatality of being attended by so large an amount of matrimonial happiness, as to cause the ruin of the affectionate couple. So greatly were they elated by their prosperous lot, as to boast that it equalled or surpassed even that of Jupiter and Juno, and were presumptuous enough to call each other accordingly by the names of the divine king and queen. Their impiety was punished by the conversion of both into sea-birds. This adventure, usually narrated of an older Ceÿx son of Hesperus, and Alcyone daughter of Æolus, seems to have been transferred by Hesiod to the father-in-law of Cynus, celebrated in the Shield of Hercules. Some commentators³ would further assume a difference in the subject, as well as the hero and heroine of the poem. But the marriage of Ceÿx, recorded in the above elegant though fantastic fable, is the only one which enjoys any celebrity in the popular mythology; and one of the extant citations⁴ of the poem seems to allude plainly, though figuratively, to the amorous self-destruction of the ill-fated pair.

but its genuine antiquity was defended by Athenæus¹ and other authorities.

Of the other titles on the Hesiodic list, two, the Elegy on the death of Batrachus and the Treatise on the Idæi Dactyli, occur but in the somewhat apocryphal summary of Suidas. Batrachus, the hero of the former production, is characterised by the same compiler as a "lover of Hesiod." The latter work may perhaps be alluded to by Pliny², where he quotes Hesiod concerning the discovery of iron in Crete, by the mysterious personages celebrated in the poem.

The three remaining works, the Ornithomantia³ or Book of Auguries, the Descent of Theseus to Hades⁴, and the Epithalamium of Peleus⁵ and Thetis, have each been held by modern commentators⁶, on more or less plausible grounds, to be but portions, episodes or cantos, of the Catalogue, or of other longer and more celebrated Hesiodic poems. They are, however, all mentioned with sufficient distinctness in their separate capacity, to admit of their being classed, conjecturally at least, and in the absence of evidence to the contrary, as desultory independant poems similar to the Shield. Of their contents little is known but what their titles imply. The Ornithomantia and Descent of Theseus passed current as Hesiodic works at a comparatively early period.⁷ The Epithalamium, ⁷ The claims of both were rejected by Pausanias, ix. xxxi. 4.; those of the Ornithomantia by Apollonius Rhod. ap. Procl. ad Opp. et D. 824. By some the latter poem was held to have been composed as a supplement to the works. Procl. loc. cit.

on the other hand, is first mentioned by the later Byzantine grammarians, one of whom cites two verses of it in good epic style, and in the usual congratulatory tone of such compositions.¹

From whatever number or variety of authors the miscellaneous poems in the foregoing list may have proceeded, it seems probable that the whole, or the greater part of them, were composed in the same district of Central Greece, comprising Bœotia, Phocis, and the Ozolian Locris. The legend of the poet's last sojourn and death at Naupactus, and sepulchre at Cæneon, both of which towns are situated in the Ozolian territory, represents, there can be little doubt, a secondary Locrian school of Hesiodic poetry. This school seems to have been afterwards transferred by colonists from the same region to the Italian or Epizephyrian Locris, and thence, as will be seen in the sequel, to Sicily, under the figure of a blood relationship between Hesiod and the celebrated Sicilian poet Stesichorus.

1. THE third and last subdivision of the primitive epic literature, comprises all those poems which were not sufficiently characterised by the proper dialect and manner of either Homer or Hesiod, to admit of their being ranked, even in vulgar usage, as the productions of one or other of those authors. Some of these works appear to have aimed at a certain amount of Homeric unity of structure; others were but metrical chronicles, embodied in the same spirit of methodical continuity as the Hesiodic compilations examined in the previous chapter. Their authors appear, for the most part, both in the selection of their subjects and in general style and phraseology, to have conformed to the old conventional standards of epic mannerism. But towards the close of this period, efforts are observable on the part of Pisander, Epimenides, and other poetically gifted disciples of the popular schools of religious mysticism, who availed themselves of the Epic Muse in promulgating their doctrines, to enliven the prevailing monotony, partly by the introduction of new materials, partly by bolder methods of working up those transmitted by their predecessors. Few of these works enjoyed any great celebrity or popularity with the later Hellenic public. Several had perished even during the flourishing ages of Greek literature, or were no longer familiar in the original text to the authors by whom they are cited; and, with the exception of a limited stock of fragments, the whole are now entirely lost. They supply, consequently, but slender materials for critical analysis. The lives and characters however, of several of their authors, are replete with curiosity and interest.

In the subjoined list the poems have been arranged according to the age, historical or conjectural, of their authors, in so far as the names of the latter have been recorded. Where titles of works have been transmitted unconnected with the name of any poet, they have been ranked in the chronological order of the subjects. The list also contains one or two names of poets which have been recorded unconnected with any particular work. Several of the authors in the earlier portion of the series, have already been under consideration as contributors to the Epic Cycle, and have been classed, to that extent, as disciples of the Homeric school.

2. CINÆTHON of Lacedæmon (765 B. C.), has already been noticed in connexion with the Epic Cycle¹, as claiming, on more or less valid grounds, no fewer than four of its members: the Œdipodia, Œchalia or Heraclea, Little Iliad, and Telegonia. His genealogical poems are classed by Pausanias² in the same category as the Eoæ of Hesiod. The extant citations³ possess little poetical or historical interest. They relate chiefly to the line of succession in the royal families of Lacedæmon and Crete.⁴ Special allusion also occurs to the descendants of Medea and Jason.

(CORINTHIACA, BUGONIA, DELIAN PROSODIUM).

To Eumelus of Corinth (761—744 B. C.), his age, and character, attention has also been directed, as accredited author of several Cyclic poems. The other works ascribed to him are, the Corinthiaca, Bugonia, Delian Prosodium, and the verses on the Chest of Cypselus.

The Corinthiaca, a genealogical poem of some celebrity, described the origin and early destinies of the city from which it derived its name. The following, by reference to the principal fragments or citations of its text¹, appears to have been the main line of narrative, with which other genealogical notices of a miscellaneous character², incidentally quoted from Eumelus by classical authors, were also, it may be presumed, interwoven.

In the distribution of honours and possessions by the god Helios among his sons, the land of Asopia in Northern Peloponnesus fell to the lot of Alœus; the city of Ephyra on the Isthmus, with its territory, was bequeathed to Æetes. The latter hero, preferring a settlement at Colchis on the Euxine Sea, made over the sovereignty of his Isthmian territory to a friend called Bunus, a son of Mercury, on condition of the heritage being restored to himself or his descendants, should they ever appear to claim it. On the death of Bunus, Epopeus, son of Alœus, succeeds to the throne of Ephyra, and thus reunites the divided dominions under his own sovereignty. Marathon, a son of this king, driven from home by the harsh treatment of his father, settles in Attica, where he founds a city, and calls it by his name.³ On the death of Epopeus he revisits Ephyra, and taking possession of his Peloponnesian inheritance, divides it anew between his two sons Sicyon and Corinthus, allotting Asopia to the former, Ephyra to the latter. He then returns to Attica. Asopia henceforward is called by the name of its new sovereign, Sicyon. The name Ephyra, originally derived from a daughter of Ocean and Tethys, former proprietrix of the district, is exchanged, in like manner, for that of the new ruler Corinthus. In the sequel, Jason and the Argonauts invade the Asiatic dominions of Æetes; whose daughter Medea, after assisting Jason by her own enchantments to baffle those of her father, elopes with the Thessalian hero. On reaching her lover's paternal territory of Iolcos, she is invited to Corinth, and invested with the sovereignty of that state, in terms of the compact under which the heritage had been alienated by Æetes; the intermediate line of princes having also become extinct by the death of Corinthus. Medea and Jason assume accordingly the reins of government. In order to render her children immortal, Medea, overrating her magic powers, buries them alive in the temple of Juno, where they perish. Jason, indignant at her treatment of his offspring, separates himself from her, and retires to Iolcos. Medea, distressed and mortified, also soon after abandons Corinth¹, making over the sovereignty to Sisyphus, whose death and funeral rites are described. Glaucus, son of Sisyphus, when on a visit to Lacedæmon in search of some missing horses of his stock, engages in an amour with Pantidyia, a Spartan princess. The offspring of this connexion was Leda, mother of the Tyndaridæ; who on the subsequent marriage of her own mother to Thestius, passed as the daughter of that hero.

This poem may be inferred, from the frequent citations of its text by the antients, to have been a work of standard authority in its own department of mythical history. It is also the one among the primitive lost poems of the same genealogical order, the extant notices of which appear to shed the greatest light on the sort of imperfect epic mechanism on which such compilations were made to hinge. The Corinthiaça seems, owing perhaps to the author's Homeric predilections, to have had greater pretensions to unity of plan than most others of its class, such, for example, as the Eoæ of Hesiod. Of the remaining verses, eight ¹, describing the origin of the city of Corinth, form a continuous text, marked by much archaic simplicity and purity of style. Five others ², now read in the Argonautica of Apollonius, are stated by the antient commentators of that poem to have been pirated by its author from Eumelus. That the original poem of Eumelus was no longer extant in the time of Pausanias, or at least no longer accessible to him, appears from his limitation of the genuine remains of the Corinthian poet to the Delian Prosodium. The only other work cited ³ by the same critic, as attributed in his day to this author, was a prose composition which passed current under the same title of Corinthiaca. The passages therefore of the metrical Corinthiaca, cited by writers of later date than Pausanias, and the genuine character of which there seems no ground to dispute, must, if weight be attached to his authority, be understood to be borrowed from older secondary sources.⁴ That the substance however of the prose work was, in a great measure, the same as that of the poem, appears from the close correspondence between the account given by Pausanias of the early history of Corinth on the authority of the former, and the notices on the same subject supplied by the longest extant passage of the latter.⁵

Bugonia.

The Bugonia is ascribed to Eumelus but in a single passage of Eusebius.¹ No remains of the text have been preserved, nor any distinct notice of the subject of the poem. The title has been supposed, with some plausibility, to allude to the adventures of a son of Apollo and Cyrene², named Aristæus, a hero distinguished as a promoter of agriculture, and whose stock of bees, on which he set great value, was destroyed by the gods, in punishment of his attempt to violate Eurydice, wife of Orpheus. By advice of his mother, he procured from the sea-god Proteus, through the same stratagem employed by Ulysses in the Odyssey, the knowledge of an expedient for reinstating himself in his former opulence. This was effected by a sacrifice of oxen, from whose carcasses swarms of bees were generated, as numerous as those which he had lost. The story possesses little poetical interest, and is perhaps less likely to have suggested itself for treatment to Eumelus than to Virgil, by whom it has been worked up into a long episode of the fourth Georgic.³

² It has been assumed by various commentators (Müll. Orchom. 2d ed. p. 340. sqq., Marckscheff. Fragm. Hes. p. 136., Boeckh. Explic. ad Pind. p. 324.), with reference both to the fable of Aristæus and to other similar legends in which Cyrene is introduced, that the mention of that nymph must necessarily imply the work in which such mention occurs, to date from a lower period than the foundation of the Spartan colony of Cyrene in Africa. This however seems, in the present case at least, to be a reversal of the just order of historical inference. It was probably the antient and great celebrity of a nymph Cyrene, in connexion with the worship of the Dorian Apollo, which caused the Sparto-Libyan colony to be called by her name. It can hardly be supposed that the name of an African city would have been selected, a few years after its foundation, as that of a goddess of Northern Thessaly and a daughter of the river Peneus; in which capacities Cyrene appears as mother of Aristæus.

The Prosodium, or Processional Hymn, composed for the sacred mission of the Messenians to the Delian god, and considered by Pausanias¹ the only genuine extant work of Eumelus, while ranking under the same general head as the hymns in the Homeric collection, is distinguished from them by some broad and interesting features of peculiarity. The Homeric hymns are characterised by much of that abstract generality of subject and tone, which forms the common attribute of the old epic minstrelsy. They neither possess nor advance any claim to local or real interest, beyond what may attach to the connexion of the deity celebrated, with some one or other of the great national sanctuaries in the festivities of which they were habitually performed. The spirit and object of the Delian hymn, on the other hand, were essentially local and political. The work was composed for the Messenians, to propitiate the favour of a mighty deity, during a dispute between themselves and the powerful neighbouring state of Sparta, relative to a matter connected with the worship of the god to whom the hymn was addressed. The importance of this crisis in their national annals was afterwards abundantly proved, by the series of calamities, and ultimate ruin and national degradation, in which it involved them. The two opening lines accordingly, which alone have been preserved², bear pointedly on the peculiar occasion and object of the composition of the poem. They are a joint invocation of the patron Jupiter and the patron Muses of Ithome, the metropolis and stronghold of the Messenian commonwealth, as guardians of the cause of national liberty for which its citizens were contending. Hence too the preference of the native Doric to the epic dialect, a preference of which these two lines offer the first example in Greek literature, and which, as will be further seen in the sequel, forms one of the chief characteristics of the individuality and personality of the Lyric, as compared with the abstraction and ideality of the Epic Muse. Of the specific character or contents of the composition, no distinct notices have been transmitted.

Cypselus.

The same Doric idioms which distinguish this poem, are also partially observable in the verses inscribed on the chest of Cypselus, the celebrated Corinthian offering at Olympia. Hence Pausanias conjectures those inscriptions, from a comparison of their style with that of the Prosodium, to be the composition of Eumelus.¹ The thirteen lines however, transcribed by the historian², can hardly be said to exhibit any such resemblance to the remaining specimens of the art, either of Eumelus or any other professional poet of his age, as to bear out this opinion. The extreme simplicity and quaint mannerism both of their expression and versification, while bespeaking an antiquity at least equal to the age of Eumelus, savour rather of the genius of some humbler minstrel, perhaps of the artist of the reliefs which the lines illustrate.³

³ Pausanias has been very generally taxed by modern critics with inconsistency, in attributing to a poet whose latest recorded epoch is the ninth Olympiad, the verses inscribed on a monument dedicated by a prince who flourished in the thirtieth. The charge is groundless. The tradition followed by Pausanias, as to the circumstances which led to the dedication of this monument, distinctly bears that the work itself was in the possession of the family of Cypselus before Cypselus himself

3. ANTIMACHUS of Teos, an epic poet of great antiquity but little celebrity, is cited by Plutarch as having mentioned, contemporaneously it must be understood, the eclipse which happened on the twentieth of April, in the third year of the sixth Olympiad, B. C. 753, the date assigned to the foundation of Rome. The title of no work by this poet has been preserved, and but a single verse is quoted, in condemnation of bribery.¹

Antimachus of Teos.

ASIUS of Samos, son of Amphiptolemus, ranks among the more antient epic poets of the genealogical order², but no specific date is connected with his name; nor are his works mentioned under any other titles than the general one of Genealogies. He seems however to have treated a variety of subjects, as episodes, it may be presumed, illustrative of local and family history. The longest extant passage expatiates on the brilliant appearance of the Samian ladies advancing in procession to the Temple of Juno, and is distinguished by a festive pomp of diction in good keeping with the subject. He describes "the flowing trains of their snow-white robes; their arms and wrists glittering with massive jewels; and their hair, partly bound up and adorned with the Ionian cricket-formed diadem, partly floating in gold-bound tresses over their shoulders." Among the eighteen remaining verses ascribed to this poet, are four in elegiac measure, alluding to the Smyrnæan nativity of Homer, to which further reference will be made in treating of the lyric art of this period.

tica.

The NAUPACTICA, like the Eoæ of Hesiod, was a genealogical history of remarkable females and their families. It ranked among the more antient works of its class, being quoted by historians prior to Herodotus¹; but no definite epoch is assigned to its reputed authors. The poet whose claims seem to have been preferred was Carcinus of Naupactus, capital of the Ozolian Locris: some however ascribe it to a Milesian, whose name is not recorded²; others to one Neoptolemus³, who may perhaps be himself the Milesian. The little celebrity of the town of Naupactus in heroic legend is a good argument, as Pausanias has remarked, in favour of the claim of Carcinus, after whose native place, in the absence of any prominent or central head of subject, the work might naturally be called. With the exception however, of a single passage concerning the mother of Ajax Oileus⁴, there is no trace in the extant remains or citations, of any special preference of Locrian heroes or adventures. The Argonautic expedition, as in so many other works of this kind, appears to have occupied a large share of attention. The stratagem by which Venus secured the escape of Medea and Jason was particularly described⁵, with their subsequent settlement, not at Corinth or Iolcos as in the ordinary accounts, but

The MINYAD, a poem of some celebrity, and with apparently reasonable pretensions to high antiquity, is ascribed by Pausanias¹, though doubtfully, to Prodicus of Phocæa, an author of uncertain age.

nyad.
Prodicus
of Phocæa

Although frequent appeals are made by the ancients to the text of this poem, its subject is involved in great obscurity.² The name implies that it treated the history either of the Bœotian Orchomenus, or of the Argonautic expedition. The city and people of Orchomenus bore the surname of Minyan, after their founder and ancestor Minyas; and the heroes who took part in the enterprise of Jason also obtained the title, from the connexion of their leaders with the line of the same Bœotian patriarch. The adventure however which, from its strictly Minyan character, might seem most likely to have formed the action of a poem entitled Minyad, was the war between the Orchomenians and the Thebans, in which the former were at first victorious, and Thebes became tributary to the Minyan king. From this degradation she was released by her native hero Hercules, who assaulted, took, and sacked Orchomenus, and slew the reigning sovereign, Erginus. It happens however, that of the six or seven extant passages or citations, not a single one alludes, even remotely, to any such adventure. With the exception of one in which Meleager³ is mentioned, the whole bear reference to the Infernal region and its objects of wonder or terror.⁴ Pausanias accordingly describes a Descent to Hades as forming a part of the action, but not the principal subject of the poem. The heroes of this "Descent" appear from a citation by the same author to have been Theseus and Pirithoüs. Special allusion occurred to the punishments inflicted on Amphion and Thamyris: on the former, on account of his boastful impiety towards Latona, an impiety already chastised on earth by the destruction of his twelve children; on the latter, for a similar offence against the Muses. Two verses alone have been preserved, alluding to the voyage of Theseus and Pirithoüs in the boat of Charon.¹

PISANDER (HERACLEA).

Pisander
(Heraclea).

4. Pisander of Camirus, a distinguished Dorian colony of the Isle of Rhodes, is the most celebrated epic poet of this period next to Homer and Hesiod, and ranks accordingly next to them in the epic canon of Alexandria.² His credit and popularity as a votary of the Heroic Muse obtained him also the honour, with some of his more enthusiastic admirers, of an antiquity equal to that of those poets, or even of Eumolpus³, who however flourished, according to the same system of mythical chronology, before Pisander's leading hero Hercules was born. With more critical authorities, the highest epoch of Pisander reaches but

¹ Paus. x. xxxviii. 1. The name Prodicus, assigned by Pausanias to the poet of the Minyas, is also given by Clemens Alex. to the author of a poem entitled, "Descent to Hell." Clemens, it is true, makes his Prodicus a Samian, while the Prodicus of Pausanias is a Phocæan. But the coincidence certainly favours O. Müller's view, that the two poems and authors are the same, and that both works are identical with a similar Descent, ascribed by some to a Prodicus of the Samian colony of Parinthus, by others to Orpheus or Cercops. to the earlier part of the seventh century B.C.¹ Less creditable to him than the report which classed him as coeval with Homer, and not probably better founded, is that in which he is accused of having pirated the substance of his great poem, the Heraclea, from one *Pisinus of Lindus*², of whom or his labours no further notice is extant. The other works ascribed to Pisander were but little esteemed, and are attributed preferably, by the only author who mentions them³, to Aristeas, a contemporary poet of some celebrity. That the traditional name of Pisander's father was Pison, that of his mother *Aristæchma*⁴, may illustrate, but certainly does not tend to corroborate, his supposed literary relations to a Pis-inus and an Arist-eas.

The popularity of the Heraclea, the work on which alone his fame was grounded, seems to have been due less to any higher excellence of its composition, than to a certain novelty of invention and peculiarity of style and treatment, imparting a fresh and pungent interest to its text. Pisander flourished at an epoch of transition from the minstrelsy of genius to the minstrelsy of art, when the old epic school was sunk in decay, and some new stimulus was required to excite or relieve its languid mannerism. The tact accordingly, with which he adapted his muse to the altered spirit of the age, engrafting on the old routine of conventional commonplace a new order of sentiments or images, constituted apparently his chief hold on the sympathies of his public. It may also be presumed, that these novel features participated in some degree of the peculiar spirit of mysticism, with which not only the popular religion, but the infant science and philosophy of the age were impregnated, and which it became the fashion to promulgate as emanations from the inspired genius of Orpheus, and other sages of the olden time. One of the chapters of mythology most favourable to such treatment was the history of Pisander's hero and his twelve labours, so fertile a theme in every age for the speculations of the symbolic school of interpreters. Yet the existing remains of the Heraclea supply comparatively little evidence of the hero's adventures having been there embodied in a mystical form. The boldness and eccentricity of the author's genius seem to have been more extensively displayed in the properly heroic element of his subject, whether in the creation of new materials for his muse, or in moulding those transmitted by his predecessors into new and dazzling forms. His conceptions savour indeed, more of the extravagant than of the sublime; but even this defect would be a better passport to general popularity or notoriety, than the dry formality of the superannuated Homeric school. The subject he had selected was in itself singularly fitted, both to awaken the powers of a Dorian poet and work on the sympathies of a Dorian audience, at a period when the Heraclid dynasty of Sparta was acquiring a marked ascendant throughout the confederacy, not only in political power, but in the more elegant arts of peace, especially in music and lyric song, just then rapidly advancing to perfection. Pisander himself was connected with the hero of his work by a double tie. Rhodes, his native island, was a distinguished Sparto-Dorian colony, founded on the basis of an earlier fabulous settlement formed by a son of Hercules himself. The subject seems also to have had in so far the advantage of novelty, that the poetical biography of the Theban hero had never yet been treated in a similarly wide and comprehensive form.

Existing data afford but little insight into the plan of the poem ; but, consistently with the character and limits of its subject as above described, it could have had little pretension to Homeric unity. Aristotle accordingly, in the contrast drawn between Homer and those poets who narrated the lives or adventures of their heroes in continuous order, after the fashion of prose biographers, specially mentions the "authors of Heracleids." This text obviously admits a prior application to Pisander's poem, as the most celebrated work devoted to the affairs of Hercules. The merit of its composition must consequently be sought in those other more novel and striking features of detail, some of which have been pointedly noticed by the commentators. With Homer and Hesiod, Hercules, in all but his superiority to the rest of mankind, is an ordinary hero, armed in the usual manner, his favourite weapon being the bow. With Pisander his valour is that of the giant or savage, rather than of the Hellenic warrior. His exploits are performed more by dint of muscular strength than of military prowess, and his personal equipment is marked by features of rudeness and ferocity, corresponding to those of his character. His favourite weapon is a club of solid brass ; his coat of mail a lion's hide : the body forms the tunic ; the head, drawn over that of the wearer, serves as his helmet.¹ The character of the foes he conquers is similarly varied and exaggerated. The hydra, in the old tradition but an ordinary water snake of vast dimensions, is invested with numerous heads¹, and the expedients resorted to for its destruction are proportionally magnified or multiplied. Of his bow, for expertness in which he was celebrated by Homer, Alcides was deprived by Pisander altogether. Such a weapon was inconsistent with the sturdy hand to hand ferocity for which the hero was now to be distinguished. Hence, instead of shooting the Stymphalian birds with arrows, as in the older tradition, he frightens them away with the sound of gongs or cymbals.² Such antagonists were too mean to be appropriately assailed by the Pisandrian Hercules with the ordinary weapons of war. Other adventures and exploits first imagined by Pisander, or to which prominence was first assigned by him, were, the hero's Hyperborean expedition and capture of the stag with the golden horns; the destruction of the dragon which kept the gate of the garden of the Hesperidæ; and the victory over the giant Antæus, and his mother and ally Terra. Pisander may also be considered as having originated the legend of the tepid springs miraculously produced by Minerva, on the shore of Trachinia celebrated in later times as the Straits of Thermopylæ, to refresh her favourite hero with a warm bath during his labours. The only existing traces of astrological mysticism are, the hero's voyage across ocean in the drinking-bowl of the Sun, and the promotion of the Nemean lion to the honours of a celestial constellation.³

³ See the fragments ap. Düntzer, p. 88. sqq., Müll. Dor. vol. II. p. 475., and Clint. Fast. Hell. p. 366., who however confounds the remains of this author, in several instances, with those of the later Pisander of Laranda. The distinction between the two poets was first carefully drawn by Heyne (Exc. I. ad Æn. II.), and has been kept in view by Düntzer and Müller.

The poem was divided into two books.¹ Three verses alone have been preserved, and afford no unfavourable impression of the style. One of them contains a maxim, boldly conceived and vigorously expressed, though not of the purest moral tendency, that "falsehood is no crime where a man's life is at stake."² the Cretan sage and poet, enjoys a high celebrity in the political as well as literary annals of Greece. His biography also combines, more perhaps than any other of this period, the apparently incongruous features, of being no less palpably connected with the realities of history than deeply enveloped in the mists of fable. Gnossus, the capital of his native island, has been assigned as his birthplace, and was probably his habitual abode. In other, equally or more authoritative notices, the former honour is awarded to the town of Phæstus.³ His father is variously designated Agesarchus, Dosiades, or Phæstius. His mother, under the title of Blaste or Balte, is allotted a share of her son's marvellous attributes, in the popular legend, of which the following is an outline.⁴

EPIMENIDES,

Epimenides.

In early youth, when tending his father's flocks in the neighbourhood of his native city, and reposing during the noonday heat in a cave, he was overtaken by a sleep, which lasted during a period varying, in the different versions of the story, from forty to fifty-seven years. On awakening, under the impression of having enjoyed but an afternoon's slumber, he proceeded to look after his cattle. Seeing no signs of them, and struck with the altered aspect of his paternal farm, to all appearance in the hands of other occupants, he walked into the town to inquire what had happened. Calling at the door of the family residence, he found himself an entire stranger to its inmates, who demanded who he was, and the object of his visit. At length he succeeded in identifying the person of a younger brother whom he had left a boy, now an aged man, which recognition furnished a clue to the mystery.

That during his miraculous trance he had been favoured, as he himself asserted, by the personal converse and tuition of the gods, soon became manifest, in the divine wisdom, prophetic inspiration, and other superhuman faculties, physical and moral, with which he was endowed. The duration of his life¹, according to the lowest estimate, was, including his sleep, 157 years. The Cretans, however, declared that he survived to the age of 299, maintaining the full vigour of both mental and bodily faculties till within a short period of his death, his actual old age being limited to the same number of days as that of the years which he had slept in the cavern. He also professed to have already lived several lives; that his soul had formerly animated the body of Æacus; and that, in its present state of existence, it had the power of quitting and reentering its earthly tenement at pleasure.² His favourite objects of worship were the Nymphs, by whom he was presented with a drug, which had the virtue of relieving him of the necessity of taking food, and of the burthen of all bodily secretions.³ This treasure he carried concealed about his person in the hoof of an ox, swallowing a small portion of it from time to time, and was never observed to take other nourishment. His devotion to those goddesses was such as to create jealousy on the part of his divine patrons of higher rank; and one day, while dedicating a sanctuary to the former, he was interrupted by a voice calling from the clouds, "Not to the nymphs, O Epimenides, but to Jove."

On the spread of his reputation for divine attributes, he was invited to Athens by Solon, in compliance with a response of the Pythian oracle, to purify the city from the pollution and pestilence consequent on the massacre of the suppliants at the divine altar, after the break up of the Cylonian conspiracy.¹ He was transported from his native place with festive solemnity, in a vessel commissioned by the Athenian state for the purpose. The mode in which he exercised his office was, according to some accounts, to let loose a herd, partly of white partly of black cattle, on the Areopagus, whence they were allowed to roam at liberty through the Attic territory. Where one of their number lay down to repose, an altar was built, and a sacrifice offered to the patron deity of the place, whoever he might be. In this way some explained the origin of the celebrated Athenian altars to the Unknown gods. Other accounts limit his services to the more simple expedient of pronouncing the stain of profanely shed blood the cause of the evil, and that by bloodshed alone could the offence be atoned.² On his departure, he was conveyed back to Crete with the same honours, after refusing a talent of gold offered him by the republic in repayment of his good offices, contenting himself with a sprig from the divine olive tree of the Acropolis. Similar services of lustration were performed by him for other states.³ When at Athens, viewing the port of Munychia, he foretold the national disasters of which it was ordained to be the scene many years afterwards; also the Persian war and its successful issue; and was believed to have obtained from the gods a few years' additional delay of the Barbarian expedition.⁴ He also forewarned the Lacedæmonians of the signal defeat they were destined to experience at the hand of the Arcadians, which afterwards befell them at the Peloponnesian Orchomenus.

According to some accounts⁵ Epimenides died tranquilly at home, shortly after his return from Athens. Others described him, when taken prisoner in a war between Crete and Sparta, as having been put to death by the Lacedæmonians, in revenge of some alleged sinister influence on their affairs; but not till after he had been detained for some time in durance, and constrained to perform the functions of priest and augur in their service.¹ By his countrymen he was decreed divine honours², and numbered among their patron deities the Curetes; while his mother Balte was promoted to the rank of Nymph. His skin was discovered at his death to be covered with written characters³, and was preserved, or as some reported his entire corpse, at Sparta as a sacred relic. The possession of this treasure was, however, disputed by the Argives.⁴

His influence on his age.

6. Apart from its intrinsic moral or historical value, this singular biography possesses interest, from the new and lively phasis in which it exhibits Greek poetical fancy, as exercised on the mystical or sacerdotal element of popular superstition. The primary fiction of the series, the trance in the cave, supplies also the germ or prototype of numerous similar chapters of later European romance; itself, perhaps, modelled after some older Eastern original of "The Sleeper awakened." That Epimenides was an impostor can hardly be disputed. He deserves, however, the credit of having exercised his delusive arts for the benefit of his fellow-men, rather than from any sordid motive of personal interest or vulgar ambition. Nor can the legend of his marvellous pretensions or performances, have originated in any other source than his own superior powers of intellect, his proficiency in the science and philosophy, as well as the cabalistic priestcraft, of his age, and his ascetic purity of manners.⁵ The more subtle interpretations of his fifty-seven years' trance, as allusive, for example, to the number of years he had devoted to solitary meditation¹, while they damage the fabulous interest, add little to the historical probability of his biography. The period at which Epimenides flourished, was one peculiarly favourable to the success of his arts. It was an epoch of rapid transition from poetical to practical civilisation, from the ascendancy of the imagination to that of the intellect; a state of things offering, in every age, to such as combined both those mental faculties in so eminent a degree, special facilities for acquiring influence over their fellow-men. Where knowledge is rare, and hence too valuable to be freely communicated, the wise man is tempted to turn the folly of his neighbours to account, often for their own benefit, in securing to himself the credit of supernatural attributes. The same science which in the future progress of events serves to dissipate, here conspires rather to thicken, the mists of popular ignorance; and the art of calculating an eclipse, or solving a problem in chemical science, became in the hands of Epimenides or Pythagoras, as of Roger Bacon or Michael Scott in our own middle ages, not so much a means of enlightening their contemporaries, as of augmenting the darkness in which they were immersed.

But in whatever degree Epimenides may have profited by the superstition of his countrymen in the extension of his own fame or influence, he seems to have allowed himself a considerable latitude of scepticism, as to the accuracy of the individual dogmas on which that superstition was founded. Upon one occasion, when favoured with an ambiguous, and, as appeared to him unmeaning response from the Pythoness, he told her plainly, that "the oracle might be the prophetic centre of the earth in the estimation of its own god, but hardly deserved to be so in that of the men who consulted it." For this boldness he was warned off the bounds of the sanctuary.¹

The influence of Epimenides extended even into quarters distinguished by that sound judgement and common sense, which might have been expected to place them beyond the reach of such delusion. The story of his supernatural longevity appears to have been countenanced by his own younger contemporary Xenophanes of Colophon², one of the earliest practical philosophers of Greece. His visit to Athens, and intercourse with Solon, are also among the best authenticated facts of his history. In addition to his other more miraculous influence on the affairs of that city, he has the credit of having suggested important reforms³ in the sacred as well as civil institutions of the republic, afterwards embodied in the legislation of Solon; of having simplified and purified the sacred rites; abrogated various remains of barbarous superstition and extravagant ceremonial; and promoted, generally, moral and religious habits and social unity among the citizens.

The epoch assigned by more reasonable authorities to the birth of Epimenides, is the second year of the xxxth Olymp., 659 B. C. His visit to Athens took place in Olymp. XLVI., 596 B. C.⁴ He was then, therefore, sixty-three years of age. His death, as narrated in connexion with that visit, occurred a year or two afterwards.¹ He was then consequently under seventy, the average limit of human longevity, and an age considerably less than half that allotted him in even the more moderate version of the popular tradition. It must further be remarked, as one of the most curious anomalies of his singular history, that by Plato² he is described as having visited, or rather revisited Athens, about ten years prior to the Persian invasion (the first by Darius, it may be presumed)³, and as having foretold its occurrence. As this second visit would fall about ninety-five years after his first to Solon, the duration of his life, assuming him to have died immediately after his return home, would thus have been prolonged to within a year of the exact period of 157 years, allotted to him in the least extravagant of the fabulous accounts. This coincidence seems to imply that Plato, or at least the Cretan mouthpiece through whom he speaks, adopted the mythical view of the poet's history. By a similar conflict of dates, Epimenides, in some accounts is made the master, in others the disciple, of Pythagoras. But whatever correspondence of doctrine may be traceable between the two, the right of priority certainly belongs to the Cretan sage.⁴

The principal accredited works of Epimenides⁵ were a Theogony, in five thousand lines; a Genealogy of the Curetes and Corybantes; an Argonautica, in six thousand five hundred lines; and a poem on Minos and Rhadamanthus, in four thousand lines. The more immediate subject of the Argonautica seems to have been the outfit and departure of the armament, probably a mystical inauguration of the enterprise, with prophetic anticipation of its results. The other minor poems ascribed to him were of a strictly religious character, oracular decrees¹, and sacrificial or lustral odes. All were probably composed in hexameter verse. Their loss deprives us of any sufficient means of estimating their merits, or claims to genuine character. Several prose works² were also assigned to Epimenides in later times, any remarks on which belong to another place. The extant citations of his text relate chiefly to the genealogy of the gods or leading heroes, and, assuming the works to which they refer to be genuine, abundantly testify the mystical character of his innovations on the old popular fable.³ Of his entire compositions six lines alone, in good epic style, have been preserved. One of these, quoted by St. Paul⁴, contains a satirical reflexion on the imputed vices of the poet's own countrymen.

³ According to Epimenides the original Chaos was composed of Æther and Nox, from whom sprang the egg which gave birth to the rest of the creation. Aphrodite was daughter neither of Uranus nor Jupiter, as in Hesiod and Homer, but of Saturn. The Dioscuri were male and female, the former representing life and unity, the latter nature and duality. Rhodes was daughter of Ocean, not of the Sun, as in her own tradition. The wife of Laius, and mother of Œdipus, was neither Epicasta nor Jocasta, but Euryclea. Düntz. fragm. p. 69. sqq.

mythical tenor, are, Aristeas, of Proconnesus a Milesian colony on the Propontis ; and Abaris, the Hyperborean.

Aristeas has already been noticed, as having obtained credit in some quarters for certain works attributed in others to Pisander. His biography acquires an additional interest from having been narrated in some detail by Herodotus. The following is the substance of that historian's account¹, illustrated by other subsidiary notices. Herodotus professes to give but the popular tradition, without vouching for either its authenticity or credibility.

Aristeas, the Proconnesian, son of Caÿstrobios, and member of a distinguished family of his native republic, while standing one day in a fuller's shop, suddenly fell down dead. The fuller, locking up his premises, hastened to communicate the unfortunate event to the relatives of the deceased. The news spread through the town. Before however the necessary means for removing the body could be prepared, a citizen, just arrived from a journey, came forward and denied the truth of the fuller's story, asserting positively that about the hour at which Aristeas was described as having died, he had himself met and conversed with him outside of the gate, on the road towards Cyzicus. In order to bring the matter to a test, the party proceeded to the fuller's house, where, on unlocking the shop door, no Aristeas was to be seen, either dead or alive. Nothing more was heard of him during seven years. At the expiry of this term he reappeared, and, settling again in his native city, composed an epic poem, comprising the results of his researches in the unexplored regions of the North, into which he had been transported by the agency of Apollo, during his period of expatriation. This work, entitled Arimaspea, treated, in three books², of the affairs of the Arimaspians, with the history and geography of the Griffins, guardians of the golden harvest ; of their wars against the Arimaspians, in defence of the sacred treasure³; and of the Hyperboreans, beyond them to the north, whose country was bounded by the Arctic Ocean. The Arimaspians were described as a race of Scytho-Cyclops, or one-eyed barbarians, covered with hair¹; the Griffins as lions in body, with the head and wings of eagles. Immediately after the publication of his poem Aristeas again disappeared.

Three hundred and forty years after this second disappearance, the city of Metapontum, in Southern Italy, was visited by a stranger, who ordered the inhabitants to erect an altar to Apollo, with a statue to himself by its side, inscribed with his name, "Aristeas of Proconnesus." He also informed them that they alone among the Italiote Greeks had ever, in former times, been favoured by the personal presence of Apollo; and that he, Aristeas, had accompanied the god on that occasion, in the form of a raven.² After delivering himself of this communication, he vanished. The Metapontines, before taking any step, sent to consult the Delphic oracle, and received an order from the Pytho-ness to fulfil the injunctions of their guest. An altar was erected accordingly, and two statues, one to Apollo the other to Aristeas, with his name inscribed in terms of his own instructions. These monuments were seen by Herodotus when he visited the place, in the agora, under the shade of a small grove of laurels.³ Aristeas, like Epimenides, asserted, and obtained credit for, the power of his soul to quit his body at pleasure, and roam at large through both earth and heaven, with which latter region he claimed to be better acquainted than with his native globe.⁴

The 340 years of interval reckoned by the Metapontines, between the last disappearance of Aristeas from Proconnesus and his visit to them, added to the era of Herodotus, would give about 800 B.C. But as the visit to Metapontum, from the tenor of the historian's narrative, was already matter of antiquity in that city, another century or more may safely be added, to make up the fabulous epoch of the traveller. Accordingly, in some of the popular notices, Aristeas is not only ranked as coeval with Homer, but as the instructor of that poet in their common epic art.¹ The greater his pretensions to mythical antiquity, the more necessary the distinction, as in the parallel cases of Orpheus, Musæus, and other fabulous minstrels, between his own age and that of the works which passed current under his name. The heads of subject treated in the Arimaspea, themselves afford argument that the composition of the work could not have preceded the latter half of the seventh century B.C.; and the legend, even as digested by Herodotus, contains details broadly at variance with its chronological results. Proconnesus, the birthplace of Aristeas, was not founded, in the accredited accounts, until 715 B.C.², so that no adventure of one of its natives could well have taken place until towards the middle of the ensuing seventh century. The style of the poem also, judging from the twelve extant verses, savoured but little of the flourishing age of the Epic Muse, being chiefly remarkable for an effort to impart novel effect to trite or even offensive ideas and images, by rhetorical pomp of language or affected figures of speech. The original Aristeas therefore, if not, as seems the more probable view, a purely mythical personage, may have been one of the earlier adventurers who, from the colonies settled in various parts of the Euxine during the eighth and seventh centuries B.C.³, visited or explored the inhospitable regions of the North, and around whose name the fabulous tales of Hyperborean wonder which afterwards obtained currency, when embodied in epic form, were concentrated. The only specific date assigned him⁴, which brings him down as low as the Lth Olympiad, may be considered the result of a critical estimate of the internal evidence of his poem, rather than of any more accurate researches into his own personal history.

His works.
The Ari-
maspea.

Besides the Arimaspea, and certain other works above noticed as doubtful whether by Aristæas or Pisander, a prose Theogony is attributed by more recent authorities¹ to the former poet. The Arimaspea², though familiarly quoted by authors of later date, is described by Gellius³ as little read, and not easily procured in his time (A.D. 130). The longest extant passage of the poem comprises six hexameter verses of turgid commentary on the dangers and discomforts of maritime life, among which a special prominence is given to sea-sickness. The mariners are described "with their eyes fixed on the stars, their minds on the bottomless deep, invoking the gods with outstretched hands and cruelly agitated entrails."⁴ The hyperbolical extravagance of this passage, has been appropriately contrasted by Longinus⁵ with the simple grandeur of parallel descriptions by Homer and Archilochus, in illustration of the proverbial shortness of the "step from the sublime to the ridiculous."

8. The mystical element of this poet's legendary biography is identified throughout with the worship of Apollo, at that time extensively in vogue among pretenders to supernatural gifts. The Metapontine adventure of Aristæas hinges entirely upon his connexion with that deity, by whose influence, Phæbus-smitten, to use his own expressive phrase, he described himself as having been impelled to undertake his Hyperborean expedition. The Hyperborean land is described, in another remarkable chapter of the same volume of fable, as distinguished for its devotion to Apollo in his character of agricultural deity¹; and this devotion was symbolised by an annual tribute of ears of corn, conveyed by way of Dodona to his sanctuary of Delos by messengers called "Perphereës."² Through the medium of this same variety of the character and worship of Apollo, the legend of the Phæbus-smitten Aristeas connects itself, no less closely than curiously, with that of the equally mythical Aristæus, son of the same god, to a portion of whose history attention has already been directed as the supposed subject of a poem of Eumelus.³ This Aristæus was a Helleno-Thracian agricultural hero or deity, whose life was devoted to the spread of the arts of rural economy through the countries bordering on the Mediterranean, and who occasionally assumes the person and honours of his father Apollo, under the title of Apollo Aristæus.⁴ The Proconnesian Aristeas is similarly identified with the arts of agriculture, through the same remarkable tradition above noticed, of the Hyperborean tribute of ears of corn to the Delian altar of his patron. It is an ingenious suggestion of Niebuhr⁵, that the title Hyperborean in this latter case, indicates the North-Western or Adriatic race of Pelasgi, who by this annual mission maintained their primeval community of religious rite with their Hellenic kinsmen. The name of the messengers, Perphereës, "carriers," finds, accordingly, its palpable etymology, (per-fero), in the Italo-Pelasgic dialects. But the proper emblems of Metapontum, the city and state so highly favoured by Apollo, and where the "Apollo-smitten" Hyperborean traveller Aristeas was honoured in company with his divine patron, were Ears of corn. Hence these emblems form the device of the Metapontine coins¹, combined with the figure of the god, occasionally perhaps with that of his servant Aristeas. This singular series of coincidences seems conclusively to prove, that the further coincidence between the names of the Apollinean heroes, Aristeas and Aristæus, and the Italo-Pelasgic term Arista, ear of corn, is not the result of mere chance. It sheds, consequently, a new and striking light on the primitive connexion between the severed branches of the old Pelasgic stem.

ABARIS.

Abaris, the Hyperbo-
rean.

The history of Abaris, son of Seuthes, is in many respects a counterpart of that of Aristeas. Although a native Hyperborean or Scythian², his adventures and accredited productions sufficiently connect him with Hellas, to entitle him to a place in her literary annals. During a great pestilence in his native country, he migrated southwards to Delphi, renewed an ancient bond of alliance between that community and his own nation, and engaged himself as servant or agent of Apollo. In this capacity he travelled over the world, imparting the sacred functions of his master, prophecy, lustration, and other beneficent arts, to the nations, and collecting from them in return devotional offerings for the Pythian shrine. This service he performed, bearing an arrow on his head, the gift and symbol of the god, or in other accounts, riding on the weapon through the air.¹ Like Epimenides, he was exempt from the human necessity of taking food, and endowed with the power of swaying the elements to his purposes.² The age of this mysterious person fluctuates, in the popular data, between that of Orpheus and that of Pythagoras. Pindar³ fixed the date of his visit to Greece in the time of Cræsus. Some authorities describe him as a disciple and friend of Pythagoras, who showed him his golden thigh, and in a joint disputation defended the merits of their common philosophy, before Phalaris, tyrant of Agrigentum.⁴ Among the spurious letters current under the name of that prince is one from him to Abaris⁵, with the answer of the Hyperborean sage. Phalaris himself is said to have died suddenly on the morning of the same day on which he had determined to put his gifted correspondent to death.⁶ These lower dates refer, probably, here as in other like cases, to the age to which, in more critical quarters, the works that passed under the name of Abaris were ascribed. those works, now entirely lost, the more remarkable were, the Nuptials of the river Hebrus, and the Progress of Apollo to his Hyperborean dominions ; besides oracular responses, lustral odes and charms, and a prose Theogony.¹

Hegesinoüs
(Atthis).

9. HEGESINOÛS is mentioned by Pausanias as author of a poem entitled Atthis, confounded by modern commentators² with the Amazonia or Æthiopis of Arctinus. Pausanias³ also quotes four verses of the text, in tolerably pure epic style, adding that he gives them at second hand, as the entire work had perished long before his time. They describe, in the way of episode it may be presumed, the mythical origin of Hesiod's birthplace Ascra. Nothing further is known, either of the author or the contents of the poem, beyond what is implied by its title, that it related to the affairs of Athens. That it was a poetical repertory of Attic genealogy and miscellaneous tradition, rather than a regular epopee, may also be inferred from the subsequent adoption of the same title by authors of prose works on the mythical annals of Attica.

Chersias.

CHERSIAS, a Bœotian of Orchomenus, was author

² Welck. Ep. C. pt. i. p. 313.; Bode, Gesch. der Hellen. Dichtk. vol. i. p. 404.; Düntz. frg. p. 4. Welcker (Ep. C. pt. i. p. 38.) himself supplies a conclusive objection to this view, in his own remark, that the Cyclic Amazonia was still extant in the time of Pausanias; whereas Pausanias himself distinctly states that the Atthis had perished before he was born. Nor is there a hint, by any antient authority, of Attic subjects having been treated in the Cycle. Of the Cyclic Amazonia, see supra, Ch. xviii. § 10.

of genealogical compositions the titles of which have not survived, but which seem to have related chiefly to the affairs of his native district. He was contemporaneous and intimate with Periander of Corinth and Chilon of Lacedæmon, two of the reputed Seven Sages. His poems were lost in the time of Pausanias, who quotes from them, at second hand, two somewhat commonplace verses. He also mentions Chersias as the accredited author of the elegiac epitaph on the mausoleum of Hesiod at Orchomenus, ascribed by some to Pindar.¹

The remaining poems in the foregoing list, the Phoronis, Danaïs, Theseïs, and Alcmaëonis, although no distinct notice is preserved either of their authors or the epoch of their composition, may yet, from the tenor of the existing fragments or appeals to their text, reasonably be assigned a place in this period. In the absence of more specific data, they have been classed in the order of their subjects.

The Phoronis² evidently derives its name from Phoroneus, son of Inachus, the primeval Pelasgic sovereign of Argos. As no adventures of a properly heroic character are recorded of this personage, the work may be presumed to have been rather a metrical chronicle of early Argive history than a heroic epopee. Its remains, referring exclusively to sacred matters, vouch for an extensive theological element. The hero was styled the "father of mortal men." The thirteen verses which have been preserved³ are not deficient in ease and purity of versification. They relate chiefly to the Curetes and Idæi Dactyli, and to the first institution of the rites of Juno, the patron divinity of Argos.

Danaïs.

The Danaïs, devoted, as its name implies, to the adventures of Danaüs the Egyptian colonist of Argos, and his fifty daughters, may be considered as a continuation of the Phoronis. It comprised 5500 verses¹, two alone of which remain, describing the preparation of the vessel of the fugitive princesses at the mouth of the Nile. The poem is also cited relative to the birth of the Attic hero Erichthonius.²

Theseïs.

The Theseïs is adduced by Aristotle³ as a sample of those epic poems, which aimed rather at methodical fulness of historical detail than unity of poetical action. The terms of this criticism, though implying, if taken by the letter, that the hero's whole career of adventure was treated, may be more fairly understood as indicating a tedious minuteness in the portion selected as the subject of the poem. It is the less easy to decide what that portion may have been, that there existed other poems of later date under the same title; and the citations rarely afford the means of ascertaining to which they refer. Assuming however, as is probable, that a passage of Plutarch, containing the most detailed extant notice of a Theseïs, alludes to the more antient poem quoted by Aristotle, it would appear that a prominent portion of its action was the war between Theseus and the Amazon queen Antiope, in which the heroine was defeated, chiefly through the prowess of Hercules, as ally of the Athenians. The adventures of the Theban hero, as the friend and comrade of Theseus, seem, from the tenor of the extant notices, to have further entered largely into the action of the poem. The citation, by the scholiast of Pindar, of the "author of the The-seis" in connexion with Pisander and Pherecydes, as an authority relative to the golden stag of Istria, captured by Hercules, may safely be referred to the more antient poem of the name.¹

THE ALCMÆONIS.

10. This poem has, by eminent modern critics², <sup>Alcmæo-nis.</sup> been supposed the same as the Cyclic Epigoni, but on very inadequate grounds. That to which weight has mainly been attached, is the circumstance that Alcmæon son of Amphiaraus, the hero from whom the title of the poem is derived, was intrusted with the chief command of the second Theban expedition, celebrated in the Epigoni. But among the various citations of the Alcmæonis, there is not one which tends to identify the subject of the two works; nor does Alcmæon enjoy any such preeminence in valour or heroic achievement among the younger heroes of the Theban war, as could warrant the selection of his name as the title of a poem in celebration of that adventure. His best claim to the part of protagonist in a heroic epopee, is to be sought in a more recent period of his history, marked by original and powerful features both of poetical and national interest.³

Amphiaraus, when constrained, through the intrigues and avarice of his wife Eriphyle, to join the first Theban expedition, in which he foresaw he was to perish, exacted from his son Alcmaeon a promise to avenge his father's death by the blood of his unnatural mother. This vow remained unfulfilled until the close of the second war, in which Alcmaeon himself had been induced, by similar intrigues of Eriphyle, to take part. After his return home, he consults the Delphic oracle, and with its sanction carries his fatal purpose into execution. Pursued, in the sequel, by the Furies of his mother, and deprived both of rest of body and peace of mind, he wanders disconsolate and maniac over the face of Hellas. Passing through Arcadia, he is hospitably received by Phegeus prince of Psophia, who purifies him from the blood-stain, and gives him his daughter Arsinoë in marriage. The bridegroom bestows on his spouse, among other nuptial gifts, the golden necklace and royal mantle, with which his mother had been bribed by Polynices to her acts of treachery. But neither his matrimonial ties, nor the lustral rite of Phegeus, afford him permanent relief from his disease of mind. He again has recourse to the oracle, which now enjoins him to seek the apparently hopeless refuge, of "a land which had not witnessed his crime, as not yet in existence at the period of its commission." After a further series of wanderings, during which he is hospitably received by Ceneus king of Ætolia, he at length settles in an island recently formed at the mouth of the river Achelous by the alluvial deposit of the stream. Having thus fulfilled the instructions of the oracle, he obtains relief and repose. Careless of his Arcadian kindred, he now marries Calliroë daughter of the river god, who bears him two sons, Acarnan and Amphoterus. His new spouse conceives a longing for the possession of the celebrated necklace and mantle. Alcmaeon accordingly journeys to the court of Phegeus, and having, under pretext of a divine order to dedicate those precious objects at the shrine of Delphi, procured them from Arsinoë, he sets out on his return to Acarnania, to present them to Calliroë. Phegeus, apprized of the deceit, sends his two sons in pursuit of his treacherous son-in-law, who is overtaken and slain. Calliroë, frantic with grief for the loss of her husband, supplicates Jove that her own two infant boys may be suddenly advanced to manhood, in order to avenge their parent's death. Her vow is gratified. The two young heroes assault and destroy not only the murderers of their father, but the old king

Phegeus and his wife in the royal residence at Psophis. After defeating the citizens of Psophis in battle, they dedicate the necklace and mantle to the god of Delphi, and return triumphant to their native kingdom of Acarnania.

That this series of adventures formed the subject of the Alcmæonis may, apart from their own fine adaptation to epic treatment, be inferred from the extent to which they have been reproduced in the page of the tragic poets. To Sophocles they have furnished matter certainly for one, probably for two dramas; to Euripides, Ennius, and Accius for one each¹; while nowhere has a similar prominence been assigned to this hero in any tragedy connected with the Theban war. As the tragedians drew their materials solely or chiefly from epic sources, it may be the more confidently inferred that they were here indebted to the Alcmæonis. To this circumstantial evidence may be added that supplied by the existing remains of, or appeals to, the text of the poem.² Several of these bear reference to the later vicissitudes of the life of the hero; in no case to the Theban wars. In one, the allusion to the history of Ceneus and his family, connects itself with the hospitality afforded by that prince to Alcmæon during his wanderings. In a second, mention occurs of the mythical connexion of the Laertian royal family with Acarnania, the name of which country was derived from Alcmæon's son by Calliroë. A third appears to be descriptive of the contumelious treatment of the corpses of Alcmæon's murderers. The remaining quotations, in one of which Atreus and his golden-fleeced ram, in another certain exploits of Peleus and Telamon are mentioned, bear no direct reference to any adventure of Alcmaeon, and may have belonged to the incidental or illustrative parts of the narrative. The poem, there can be little doubt, was the popular epopee of the Acarnanian Hellenes, of the citizens of Amphilochian Argos, Cœniadæ, and other states tracing their mythical foundation to the heroes of the Ætolian and Theban wars. The six remaining lines are in pure epic style, but are distinguished by no marked peculiarity either of sentiment or expression.

PARALLEL "SELF-CONTRADICTIONS" OF HOMER AND DANTE.

ABUNDANT evidence exists, that it was quite consistent with the laws of Greek epic poetry, in every age, for the same author to give prominence in different works to very different versions of the same fable. Pindar for example, in one of his odes, represented Orpheus as son of Apollo; in another as son of the Thracian river Ægrus.¹ In one, he described the dithyramb as invented in Naxos; in another, at Thebes; in a third, at Corinth.² In one place he described Homer as a native of Smyrna; in another, as a native of Chios.³ Nor do Heyne, Hermann, and other keenest of Homeric Separatists, make any difficulty in assuming Æschylus to have represented the punishment of Prometheus, in different dramas, as taking place in different parts of the world.⁴ That this license is not peculiar to the ancients will be manifest from the following example, derived from the poet of modern times between whose general character and that of Homer there is so great analogy, and where the parallel to P. Knight's imputed case of discrepancy in the Greek poet is also remarkable.

Dante, in the pathetic episode of Count Ugolino in the Inferno, has described the four younger victims of party rage who perished in the Tower of Famine, as sons of the count, and as young boys or youths of tender age.⁵ But it is certain, from the authentic records of the period, that two only of his fellow-sufferers were his sons; that the other two were his grandsons; and that all four were grown men, active members of their parent's faction, and taken in arms with himself. Of this Dante could not be ignorant, being not only a contemporary of Ugolino, but the man of all others of that day most conversant with the details of Tuscan history. He has therefore artfully given to the primary fact of the younger sufferers being the offspring of the principal victim, the turn most conducive to poetical effect. But, it may be urged, the anomaly in Homer is not so much in the extreme youth assigned to Achilles in the Iliad, as that the same poet should have described the same hero, in the Odyssey, as father of a full-grown son. The analogy however will here also be found complete, by reference to the second subdivision of the Tuscan bard's mythological poem. The catastrophe of the Tower of Famine took place in 1288; Dante's mystical journey in 1300, twelve years afterwards. Among the departed souls with whom he converses in the "Purgatory,"¹ is that of Nino Visconti, another grandson of Ugolino. This person, as we learn, both from his own account of himself in the poem and from contemporary history, was of advanced age at the epoch of his passage to the other world, and, to say the least, of mature manhood in 1288, the date of his grandfather's death in the tower. He appears, in fact, as early as 1282, acting as the able and popular leader of a powerful Pisan faction opposed to that of his grandfather.² The representation consequently by Dante, in the Inferno, of no fewer than four of Nino's uncles as young boys in 1288, involves a discrepancy between that poem and the Purgatorio which, upon modern Separatist principles, would infallibly prove the two works to be by different authors.

IMPUTED DISCREPANCIES IN THE COMPARATIVE MYTHOLOGY OF THE ILIAD AND ODYSSEY.

IN order to avoid an accumulation of controversial details in the text, the remarks suggested by the remaining objections, to which, under the heads of religion and manners, importance has been attached by Payne Knight and Nitzsch, the two leading advocates of the Separatist doctrine, have been reserved for this Appendix.

1. The Abode of the Gods.

The abode of the gods, it is maintained, appears, as represented in the two poems, under as broad features of dissimilarity as the deities by whom it is inhabited. "In the Odyssey," it is said, "there is not a single allusion which appears to characterise Olympus as a mountain. It is never called snowy, never many-topped, or steep, or rugged, or by any other epithet of the class so frequently occurring in the Iliad. The gods are described as dwelling behind the clouds, and their seat on Olympus is painted in the same glowing colours as the Elysian Fields."¹ These allegations are, as will be shown, like others already examined, altogether groundless. But even were they well-founded, it might be a question whether the distinction drawn, could properly be considered as more than a natural result of the difference of subject in the two poems. In the Iliad, the action is far more immediately connected with Olympus than in the Odyssey, owing to the number of Olympian deities of first rank who take part in the adventures of the former poem, and to their frequent journeys to and fro on their own account, or by order of Jove, who habitually maintains his seat on the summit of the mountain. The action of the Odyssey on the other hand, as of comparatively local interest, is to Jove a matter of proportionally little concern; to Juno and the other properly Olympian deities, with the exception of Minerva, of none whatever. Hence, as a natural consequence of this distinction, the name Olympus occurs five times more frequently in the Iliad than in the Odyssey. Even, therefore, had the more peculiarly characteristic epithets of the mountain been omitted, in whole or in part, in the latter poem, that omission would scarcely have supplied ground on which to construct a theory. The fact is however, that such epithets not only do occur in the Odyssey, but are proportionally as numerous in that poem as in the Iliad, and perhaps still more specific. The "many tops"² of the mountain are mentioned, and Minerva is described as walking down them. It is frequently designated as lofty³, by the term μακρός, which with Homer is the proper epithet of lofty mountains, but is never applied to the heaven in its independent capacity. Olympus is also described as snowy by the epithet *αιγλήεις*⁴, "glittering;" a term which can here bear no other sense than that of "glittering with snow," as well by reference to its parallel application to the mountain in the Iliad, as to the fact that it is never bestowed on the mere "heaven." The snow of the mountain is further indicated directly by the epithet λευκή, defining the nature of the glitter, and indirectly by the description, in the same passage¹, of the summit on which the gods dwelt as free from snow. The number and minuteness of these descriptive titles, compared with the limited number of times that the name of the mountain occurs in the Odyssey, seem to display at least as definite a conception of it in that poem as in the Iliad. The whole beautiful description indeed, in the last-cited passage of the Odyssey, deserves especial notice. Olympus is here figured as a mountain, the sides and visible summit of which are for the most part enveloped in snow and clouds, while its extreme peak, where the palace of Jove was situated, free from all such atmospheric contamination, enjoyed a perpetual brilliancy and serenity.

The distinction, or rather the confusion, between heaven as a mountain and heaven as a sphere, between the Olympian and the purely celestial dwelling of Jove, equally pervades both poems. It is indeed clear, that neither the Homer of the Iliad nor the Homer of the Odyssey had any very definite idea on the subject, nor in truth was the distinction capable of being very accurately defined.

2. On the Invisibility of the Gods.

For the fallacy of another series of distinctions to which importance has been attached by Nitzsch, it might almost suffice to appeal to the general remarks offered in a previous chapter (Vol. I. p. 475.) on the divine mechanism of the poems. Respect for his authority, rather than for his arguments, will render it proper here briefly to notice them. "Both poems," it is said², "are so far in harmony, that the gods, in their intercourse with men, frequently appear in human disguise. But there is this marked difference between the Iliad and the Odyssey, that in the former poem the deities, when preserving their divine character, appear, as a general rule, visible to human eye, and in order to conceal themselves, are under the necessity of enveloping their persons in a cloud or mist; in the Odyssey, on the other hand, they are essentially invisible to men without any such precaution; it is only to each other, as in the visit of Hermes to Calypso, that they appear, in that poem visible in their natural form."

The distinction is altogether imaginary, as an appeal to a few among many passages of each poem will at once evince.

Pallas, on the very first occasion of her appearance in the *Iliad*¹, is described as presenting herself in the Greek council without any cloud, invisible to all but Achilles, by whom alone it was her pleasure to be recognised.

In the ensuing battle, the same goddess removes the mist from the eyes of Diomed, "that he may be able to recognise the persons of gods as well as of men;"² or in other words, "to recognise what was habitually invisible to him." It is surprising that Nitzsch, who cites this passage, should not have perceived it to be in itself subversive of his theory. What could be the use of removing a mist from a particular hero's eyes, if the persons of the gods were habitually palpable to the eyes of all human warriors? Minerva ought to have removed the mist, pronounced by Nitzsch their only means of concealment in the Iliad, from the persons of her fellow-deities, not from the eyes of Diomed. In the sequel, endowed with this divine second sight, he is enabled to recognise various deities, Mars among others.³ Yet Nitzsch does not hesitate to quote his having, in the exercise of this new and exclusive privilege, descried that god in the distance, as proof that Mars was equally visible to the rest of the army.

When Apollo and Minerva interfere⁴ to promote the duel between Hector and Ajax, it is evident from the whole context, and especially from the mode in which their conversation is described as penetrating to the ears of the augur Helenus, that their persons, without any cloud, were invisible to that hero as well as to the surrounding host. The same may be inferred as to Iliad II. 168. sqq., XXIV. 170. It were superfluous to accumulate citations, or numbers might be added.

Thus far the Iliad. In the Odyssey, we are told, the case is reversed: "In their divine personality the gods are here always invisible, never appearing to mortals but in some mortal disguise." Upon this principle we must assume that Ulysses, during his long cohabitation with Circe and Calypso, never beheld either of those goddesses. Nitzsch asserts accordingly, that Calypso appears in her own proper person to Mercury alone. We prefer the authority of Homer, who certainly describes both her and Circe as equally visible to their lover Ulysses, and the latter goddess as visible all along to the hero's mariners as well as to himself.;

Minerva appears in her own proper person to Telemachus in Sparta¹; and in Ithaca to Ulysses and to the dogs, while invisible to the hero's son. A like honour is vouchsafed by her to Ulysses on at least one other occasion, as well as by Hermes to the same hero.² Add to these examples the appearance of the sea goddess Idothea and of her father Proteus to Menelaus, and that of Leucothea to Ulysses.

The practice therefore is quite uniform, or it may rather be said quite arbitrary, in both poems. The gods appear in each visible or invisible, in their own proper persons or in disguise, as may suit their own convenience or that of the poet.

The subjoined passages offer a curious parallel in the phraseology as well as the doctrine of the two poems, and may be added to similar examples of unity formerly cited in the chapter on style :

Il. xx. 131. . . . χαλεποὶ δὲ θεοὶ φαίνεσθαι ἐναργεῖς.

Od. xvi. 161. οὐ γάρ πω πάντεσσι θεοὶ φαίνονται ἐναργεῖς.

The term ἐναργής, it may be observed, occurs but five times in Homer, twice in the Iliad, thrice in the Odyssey, and invariably with reference to divine apparitions. Hence the vain-glorious Phæacians boast of their power of recognising the gods at all times, as an especial boon to their favoured race (Od. vii. 201.); falsely however, as appear from viii. 193. The humour of this, as of so many other parts of the poem, is a dead letter to Separatist commentators.

3. On the employment of Iris in the Iliad, Mercury in the Odyssey, as Jove's Messenger.

The discrepancy in the religious mechanism of the two poems to which the greatest importance was attached by the old school of Separatists, was the employment of Iris in the Iliad, of Hermes in the Odyssey, as the messenger of Jove. By Nitzsch, the chief of the modern Separatist school, this argument has been judiciously set aside, as more properly referable to difference of subject; and the soundness of his reasoning on this point renders it the more to be regretted, that he has not allowed his judgement to operate in a like critical manner in regard to other peculiarities, equally, or still more naturally accounted for by the same cause. To the motives which he has adduced for a preference of Mercury, inherent in the action of the Odyssey, may be added the marked popularity of the worship of that god in the Cephallenian islands and on the adjacent continent of Greece¹, and his near family connexion with the hero of the poem.²

The change of agency in the two poems, may furnish the interpretation of an otherwise enigmatical passage of the Odyssey. On the first introduction of Hermes in that poem, Jove, when about to intrust him with a commission, addresses him as follows: ³

Ἑρμεία· σὺ γὰρ αὖτε τὰ τ' ἄλλα περ ἄγγελός ἐσσι·
Hermes! for thou art again, as formerly, our messenger.

Whence this solicitude to announce, at the expense of so abrupt a parenthesis, that a deity, about to perform his customary functions, had been employed before in the same capacity? May not the apologetic or explanatory tone of the remark be interpreted as a spontaneous allusion by Homer, through the mouth of Jupiter, to the substitution of the god for the goddess; a poetical atonement, as it were, to the former, for having previously appropriated to his female rival an office which by antient, and doubtless prior right belonged also to himself?

APPENDIX C. (p. 163.)

ON THE IMPUTED DIFFERENCES IN THE STATE OF MANNERS AS DESCRIBED IN EACH POEM.

THE remaining distinctions of this nature urged by Payne Knight, are founded on a misunderstanding of some of the passages cited by him, and on an arbitrary dismissal of others as spurious. Of the former class of cases may be taken as an example his appeal to the simile in the *Odyssey*¹, borrowed as he imagined from the art of falconry, and hence assumed by him, strangely enough at best, to indicate a more advanced state of manners in that poem. It is evident however, from the phrase ἐξ ὀρέων ἐλθόντες, that the vultures (not hawks, as he translates the term αἰγυπιοί) here described, were not trained, but wild birds.

The arguments of this critic, though reproduced by W. Müller and other secondary professors of the Separatist school, have been very justly dismissed, as inconclusive or hypercritical, by Nitzsch, who supplies another series similar in character from his own resources. The impartial arbiter will probably incline to pronounce the list of Payne Knight to be, upon the whole, the better of the two. The examination of a few items of that substituted by Nitzsch, for it were tedious to analyse the whole, will tend still further to show the weakness of a doctrine which required to be supported by such arguments. It will be remembered that this critic's whole train of reasoning, proceeds on the hypothesis of a more advanced state of society in the Odyssey:²

"1. In both poems, missions are sent by states to demand redress for grievances, but in the Odyssey the ambassador is much younger than in the Iliad.

"2. In the former poem alone does any notice occur of engagements between states, binding the contracting parties to abstain from plundering each other, with penalties mutually imposed in case of violation.

"3. Prisoners of war are, it is true, occasionally set free in both poems, but in the Odyssey alone is there an instance of a captive marauder generously pardoned, and permitted to settle in the territory of his conqueror.

"4. Allusion is made in the Odyssey alone, to the foundation of a city; and a new temple is promised, ex voto, to Apollo.

"5. In the Odyssey there is the peculiarity that the hand of the widow queen carries the crown along with it, while the crown prince retains but his own private patrimony," &c. &c.

The advocates of the old opinion might perhaps safely allow these, and about as many other similar subtleties, so gravely adduced by the same critic, to rest on their own merits. Let us, however, concisely test their value in the order of their statement:

1. Extreme youth in an ambassador, if it indicate anything, were evidence rather of barbarism than of civilisation. In our own middle ages, a noble stripling would frequently be sent as envoy in cases where, in the present day, none but an aged and experienced statesman would be selected.

2. Such treaties of "black-mail" are about the rudest kind of alliance customary in the rudest ages, and but sorry proof of the superior civilisation of the Odyssey, when compared with the maintenance in the Iliad, during ten years, of two such mighty feudal confederacies as those ranged under the banners of Agamemnon and Priam.

3. The lively fiction of Ulysses, here referred to, may illustrate the generous character of the reigning Pharaoh of that day. But it is difficult to see in what respect the civilisation of Egypt can be adduced in illustration of that of Greece. With equal reason, might the cases of Polyphemus and the Læstrygonians be cited as proof of brutal, even cannibal barbarism in the Odyssey. One hears of no man-eaters in the Iliad.

4. Where both cities and temples abound, as they do in the Iliad, it may be presumed that they were occasionally both founded and dedicated. Direct allusion to such undertakings can prove nothing but that the subject of the one poem offered greater opportunity for the introduction of similar notices.¹

5. There is no evidence whatever that the suitor on whom Penelope's choice might fall, was to become king of the Cephallenians in right of her hand. Even supposing it to be so, it would prove but a singularity in the Achæan law of royal succession. That law indeed, as illustrated in both poems, offers curious anomalies of heroic jurisprudence. It is never explained why, in both poems, Menelaus, through his wife Helen, should have inherited the kingdom of Tyndareus, to the prejudice of her brothers the Dioscuri; or why Ulysses should, equally throughout both poems, appear as reigning sovereign, his father Laertes being still alive and, in the Iliad, still in vigorous health.

¹ He must indeed be a very subtle casuist, who can discover in the allusion to the foundation of Scheria, Od. vi. 9., here adduced by Nitzsch, as compared with Il. xx. 216. sqq., xxi. 446., vii. 452. sq., any sensible advance in the science either of civic architecture or of fortification.

APPENDIX D. (p. 164.)

ON THE IMPUTED DIALECTICAL DISCREPANCIES OF THE TWO POEMS.

PAYNE KNIGHT is the Separatist commentator by whom the greatest importance has been attached to this head of evidence. Among the arguments most pointedly pressed by him are, the substitution in the Odyssey of contracted for primitive forms, as in δόαρο for δοάσσαρο, θέσπς for θεσπέσιος, νώνυμος for νώννυμος, ἀγρότης for ἀγροίωτης, and the use of κρέα as a monosyllable, which word in the Iliad is bisyllabic.¹

In the first four of these cases, the argument of archaic usage, if valid at all, would be in favour of the superior antiquity of the Odyssey. The obscure term δόαρο, which occurs but once even in that poem, is assumed by Knight to be a contraction of δοάσσαρο. Another critic however, of still higher authority², prefers the reading δέαρο, which he derives from an entirely different source. So precarious is the very foundation of this class of arguments. In any case, δόαρο is an antiquated and, with the exception of this passage of the Odyssey, obsolete idiom.

Similar is the case with θέσπς. This epithet, far from being, as assumed by Knight, a contraction of θεσπέσιος, is the primary form, of which θεσπέσιος is an extension. That the form θέσπς, though it does not happen to have been employed by the author of the Iliad, was familiar before his time, is evident from another of its derivatives, θεσπιδάης, compounded of θέσπς and δαίω, and of frequent occurrence in that poem.

Νώννυμος and ἀγρότης, in like manner, are not derivatives of νώννυμος and ἀγροίωτης. On the contrary, the latter are evident extensions of the more antient and simpler forms, suggested for the convenience of the hexameter verse.

Κρέα is a mere synizesis; it is also one of a class of synizeses³ abounding in both poems, and perhaps most numerous in the Iliad. If the occurrence of κρέα as a monosyllable in the Odyssey alone be a proof of the recent age of that poem, the occurrence of ρέα, ἔῤ, βέλεα, in the same contracted form in the Iliad alone, must be at least equal proof of the more recent age of the Iliad. This counter-argument might be carried a good deal further. The contracted or monosyllabic forms in εων, for example (*ἀγορέων*¹, ἐφετμέων, ἀρέων), and in εω ω (Πηληϊάδεω, Ἀτρείδεω Ἀρμονίδεω, Ἄλτρεω, Ἰδεω, χαλκέω, *Μίνω*²), predominate in the Iliad, and are comparatively rare in the Odyssey. Add to these πολεῖς for πολέας, which occurs five times in the Iliad, and but once in the Odyssey; ἄριστος, for ὁ ἄριστος, eight times in the Iliad and but once in the Odyssey; ἱππεῖς for ἱππῆες, so written in the Iliad, never in the Odyssey.

Another hypercritical distinction, founded by Knight on the use of the full and contracted forms γεραιά and γρηῖς suggests a curious illustration of the elegant subtlety with which the Homeric dialect varies the forms even of the same word, to suit the varieties of its signification. The form γρηῖς occurs twice in the Iliad, in the more homely sense of "old woman;" γεραιά four times in the same poem, in the more dignified sense of "venerable matron." In the Odyssey the abbreviated form alone is used (varied once into γραιή), and exclusively, as in the Iliad, in the more homely signification of "old woman." That the difference of form is here connected with that of sound and sense, with the sonorous dignity of the one phrase and the quaint brevity of the other, must be palpable to every ear familiar with the niceties of the Greek tongue. Convert, for example, the phrase γρηῖ καμινοῖ of the Odyssey into γεραιῇ καμινοῖ, and the impropriety is obvious. The difference then resolves itself into this: that the subject of the one poem involved allusions to both classes of antient female, that of the other poem to one class alone.

The employment of the terms χρᾶν, χρᾶσθαι, in the sense of "consulting" and "delivering" oracles, has also been adduced as a novelty peculiar to the Odyssey. The answer to this objection is simply that, as no oracle is consulted in the Iliad, there was no room for the introduction of those terms. Stress has also been laid on the employment, in the two poems respectively, of different terms, χρήματα and κρήματα, for example, to express the same idea. The former of these words is found solely in the Odyssey, where it occurs fourteen times; while κρήματα is common to both poems, occurring forty-four times in the Odyssey, eighteen in the Iliad. As however the two terms are substantially the same in signification, as they have precisely the same metrical power, and differ but by a trifle in pronunciation, it is evident that wherever the one now stands, both sense and rhythm would equally admit the other. It may therefore reasonably be assumed that the uniformity of usage in the Iliad is the work of editors or diasceuaists, rather than of the original author. Granting however the phrase χρήματα to indicate a more complicated state of property, might not the fact of the general idea which it expresses occurring three times oftener in the Odyssey than in the Iliad, account better than any more far-fetched hypothesis for its introduction in the latter poem alone? Even accident or caprice might suffice to explain many such incidental anomalies.

Another similar argument has been founded¹ on the occurrence of the term χραισμεῖν, "to succour," nineteen times in the Iliad, and not once in the Odyssey. Here it will be remarked, that there are four terms more or less habitually used by Homer, to denote the cognate ideas, "defend, succour, rescue." These terms are ἀμύνειν, ἀλέξειν, ἀρήγειν and χραισμεῖν. The whole number of times that they occur collectively in the Iliad is one hundred and twenty-eight; in the Odyssey the whole number is but nineteen. Ἀμύνειν occurs seventy-six times in the Iliad, sixteen times in the Odyssey; ἀλέξειν sixteen times in the Iliad, thrice in the Odyssey; ἀρήγειν and χραισμεῖν are limited to the Iliad alone, where each occurs eighteen times. All that can here be inferred is the more martial character of the latter poem, involving a far more frequent introduction of words of martial import. That the nineteen examples of the Odyssey should happen to be confined to ἀλέξειν and ἀμύνειν may be the result of chance or caprice, but can supply no legitimate ground of speculative argument.

It has further been maintained, that certain terms of common occurrence are used in broadly different senses in the two poems; and that not in incidental passages, but with such constancy throughout each work, as to reflect a corresponding difference of vernacular usage. The futility of this objection, in the only instance where it has been pointedly pressed, has already been shown in an article in the Rheinische Museum (1839, p. 491.), by the author of this work.

MINOR APOCRYPHAL TEXTS OF THE ILIAD AND ODYSSEY.

THE doubtful or disputed texts of this minor class have been enclosed within brackets by Wolf in his edition of the poems. The whole number of those so treated by him comprises ninety-three verses for the Iliad, and a hundred and fourteen for the Odyssey. In this collection there are comparatively few passages which have been impugned by the antient grammarians on what can properly be called historical or "diplomatic" evidence; many have been stigmatised by Wolf on his own authority alone; others on so slender or so hollow a basis of antient grammatical speculation, as can scarcely amount to classical authority. Considered with reference to the intrinsic value of the passages, the omission would in many cases be an improvement, as in the examples here subjoined:

Il. v. 808.; viii. 528. 557.; ix. 694.; x. 84. 409.; xi. 515. 543.; xii. 175.; xiii. 731. 749.; xiv. 376.; xvi. 614.; xx. 135.; xxi. 570.; xxiii. 843.; xxiv. 514. 569.

In the following cases the effect would be prejudicial to the spirit or connexion of the text:

Il. ii. 168.; v. 342.; vii. 353. 380.; viii. 73. 183. 189. 277. 466. 475. 548.; x. 531.; xi. 662.; xiii. 255.; xiv. 95. 114.; xvi. 381.; xvii. 585.; xix. 94. 177.; xx. 312.; xxi. 471. 481. 570.; xxiii. 565. 757.; xxiv. 558. 790.

Od. i. 141.; iv. 57. 192.; v. 91. 110.; vi. 313.; viii. 58.; x. 253. 329. 368. 430. 475.; xi. 38. 60. 157. 343. 525.; xii. 147.; xiii. 320.; xiv. 132.; xv. 45. 74. 139.; xviii. 330. 393.; xix. 130.; xxi. 109. 276.; xxiii. 127.

In the remainder the result would be comparatively unimportant:

For the abolition of royalty in Bœotia, see Pausanias, ix. v. 8.; conf. ix. i. 2. For the same political crisis in Attica, see Pausanias, iv. v. 4.; Smith, Dict. of Biogr. art Codrus. For the virtual abolition of royal power in Argos, see also Pausan. ii. xix. 1.: hence the subsequent monarchy of Phidon in that state is designated a tyranny, as distinct from the constitutional royalty of Lacedæmon. In conformity with the first-cited text of Pausanias, kings in the Homeric sense seem not to have been known to the Bœotian poet Hesiod, Works and Days, 258. sqq.; conf. 38. alibi. The title Basileus frequently occurs in the Works and Days, but in the plural number, and evidently denoting an aristocratical magistracy acting also as judges, similar to the Archons of Athens, or the Prytanes of Corinth and Corcyra. The responsibility of those Basileis to the Demus, or public, for their conduct, is also inculcated by the same poet. In the Homeric hymn to Ceres¹, the most antient probably in the collection, the government of Eleusis is described as a magistracy of six Basileis, uncontrolled by any presiding power. Similar, it may be presumed, to the magisterial kings of Bœotia and Attica, were those who swayed the early destinies of the Ionian republics. Their royal dignity is stated, in what appear to be the more authentic notices on the subject, to have been extinguished almost immediately after the settlement of the colonies. In other more popular accounts it is described as remaining hereditary, in a sacerdotal probably rather than a civil form, in the legendary heroic lines of Codridæ, Glaucidæ, and others, just as the office of rhapsodist in Chios was hereditary in the family of Homeridæ.² The names indeed of most of the sons, brothers, or grandsons of Codrus, who act as leaders of the Ionian migration, and from whom the Ionian noble families boasted descent, have nearly as much the air of fabulous eponyme titles as those of Hellen, Ion, or Dorus. Such are Apœcus, the "colonist;" Naucleus

¹ 150. sqq.² Herodot. i. cxlvii.; Strab. xiv. p. 633.; Steph. Byz. v. Βέρνα, vulg. Βερναύλα.

the "navigator;" Damasichthon, the "subduer of territory;" Damasus; Prometheus, the "provident;" with Cnopus, and Ægyptus son of Nileus, titles significant probably of "Cecropian" origin.¹

The remains of the earliest extant Ionian poets in the first century of the Olympic era, of Callinus, Archilochus, Simonides, with the notices of their own lives or of the vicissitudes of public affairs during or previous to their times, exhibit a purely republican state of society; and the term "tyrant," stigmatising monarchical rule, in contradistinction to republican government, as unpopular or unjust, is of familiar occurrence in their writings.² Even the legendary biographies of Homer, though comprising probably some of the more authentic traditions concerning primitive social life in the Ionian states, represent their form of government as republican. The poet's patrons are there but wealthy citizens, occasionally, when acting as judges³, styled "Basileis," in the magisterial sense. The only genuine kings mentioned are those of Phrygia and Lydia. Of monarchical government in Crete there is no trace whatever, except in the poems of Homer.⁴

ON THE COMPONENT ELEMENTS OF THE EPIC CYCLE.

HITHERTO the view taken in the text, of the nature and extent of the Epic Cycle, has been substantially the same as that so ably illustrated by the author's valued friend Professor Welcker, in his excellent work on the subject. The above list of poems will be found however, in respect to the ante-Troic portion of the series, to differ from that of Welcker in several important particulars. This is chiefly owing to the author's inability to attach the same degree of value or importance as Welcker has done, to the Borgian tablet, as an authority relative to the contents of the Cycle, or to admit the validity of his restoration of the missing parts of that inscription. Our objections to Welcker's views, are much the same as those urged by K. O. Müller in his criticism¹ on the work in which those views are explained. We cannot admit that either the "Amazonian war" or "Atthis," supplied, conjecturally by Welcker as one of the erased names of the tablet, or the epithet of "Chian," added by him on equally conjectural grounds to the still existing name of Cinæthon, formed part of the entire monument. Nor, even had an "Amazonian war" been included in the list of the tablet, would that circumstance have been any sufficient proof that such a poem had ever found a place in the Homeric Cycle. Welcker's argument seems to proceed throughout on the understanding, that if in any such inscription as the Borgian tablet, a certain number of the poems mentioned can be identified as Cyclic poems (the Œdipodia, for example, and the Thebais, in the present case), the others in the same list must also be considered as members of the Cycle. The inadequacy of any such evidence in any such case, is sufficiently clear from the fact, that in the Tabula Iliaca, the most remarkable document of this kind, the poem to which the most conspicuous position is assigned is the lyric Ilii-Persis of Stesichorus, a work which could never possibly have found a place in the Epic Cycle. The "Danaïdes" consequently, which occupies a prominent place in the preserved part of the Borgian tablet, can have no claim on that account alone to the honour awarded to it by Welcker of a place in the Homeric collection. Still less pretension can it advance on any other account, as neither treating of a subject possessing the smallest claim to the character of Homeric, nor being ever alluded to as a Cyclic poem, or as the work of a Cyclic author, in any extant notice on the subject. It has therefore been omitted in the list given in the text. Our reasons for excluding the Minyas, identified by Welcker with the Phocais, and inserted by him between the Epigoni and the Œchalia, will be given in the part of the text devoted to the two former works, which we consider as quite distinct poems. The only very important matter of fact supplied by the Borgian inscription, as bearing on the history of the Cycle, is the notice of the Homeric poet Cinæthon as author of the Œdipodia; a notice which tends to confirm the otherwise plausible claims of that poem to a place in the collection.

APPENDIX H. (p. 265.)

ON CINÆTHON OF LACEDÆMON AND CYNÆTHUS OF CHIOS.

CINÆTHON flourished, according to the received chronology, in 765 B. C.¹, and ranks accordingly next in antiquity to Arctinus, among the successors of Homer and Hesiod. His name, under slight variety of form, is common to Cynæthus of Chios, celebrated by Hipponostratus as a rhapsodist at Syracuse in the LXIXth Olympiad, and the accredited author of the Delian hymn to Apollo, as will be seen further in treating of that poem. Welcker (Ep. Cycl. pt. I. p. 237. sqq.) endeavours to show the latter date to be corrupt, and that Cinæthon and Cynæthus represent but a single Chian Homerid of the earlier period. To this view there are insuperable objections. Apart from Welcker's somewhat summary disposal of the existing numerals of Hipponostratus, the title of "Rhapsodist," habitually given to Cynæthus and never to Cinæthon, who is as pointedly described as "Poet,"² forms so marked a distinction between the two by the authors who mention them, as to be incompatible with any hypothetical theory of their identity. It could never have occurred to these authors, to connect the title Rhapsodist in so specific a manner with the name of a primitive bard of the IIIrd Olympiad. The further description, by the same authorities, of Cynæthus, as one of the first rhapsodists who systematically corrupted or interpolated the Homeric poems, while quite appropriate in regard to a professor of the Pisistratid era, were totally inapplicable to a Cyclic poet of the eighth century B. C. Nor were it easy to comprehend, on Welcker's view, how the inventors of this supposed fictitious Cinæthon should have had recourse, for his equally fictitious title, to Lacedæmon, a city of all others least fertile in such characters. Conf. note on Delian hymn, supra, p. 329.

APPENDIX J. (p. 297.)

ON THE POETICAL MERITS OF THE CYCLIC POEMS.

THE composition and style of the Cyclic poems have found a zealous and able, though not, we apprehend, a successful vindicator

in Welcker.¹ That distinguished critic, uninfluenced by the various facts or authorities, from Isocrates² and Aristotle downwards, appealed to in the text, maintains that several of these poems not only possessed great merit, but even rivalled the Iliad and Odyssey in epic unity, and in other higher excellences of the genuine Homeric minstrelsy. As a test of the success of his argument, it might almost suffice to state, that his extensive reading and thorough insight into all the details of this head of subject, have not enabled him to adduce a single passage of any antient critic unequivocally favourable to his own opinion. His argument has, in fact, been restricted solely or chiefly to attempts to explain away certain passages of Callimachus, Horace, and other critics, where the term Cyclic is used in a satirical or contemptuous sense, as alluding, not to the old poems of the Homeric Cycle, but to certain works of a later period, which he assumes, on more or less valid grounds, to have been also occasionally entitled "Cyclic." Even admitting this line of argument to have been completely successful, all that it would establish would be, that the poets of the Homeric Cycle had not been actually ridiculed by those critics. But this result were still a very slender basis on which to found an opinion as to the great excellence of the same poets, in the face of the, to say the least, disparaging terms in which Aristotle alludes to them, and of the indifference to their merits displayed by the other great critics of antiquity. We cannot acquiesce in the reasoning by which Welcker would persuade us that Horace, in his expression "Scriptor cyclicus olim," "Cyclic writer of old," alludes to any other than "the old Cyclic poets," in the simple and natural sense of the terms. We are still also inclined to abide by the opinion expressed in the text, that the same Horace, in characterising the particular Cyclic writer whom he has in view, as one who "began by announcing his intention of singing the Trojan war and the fortunes of Priam," alludes to the author of the Little Iliad; although we readily admit that the allusion may be conceived in a spirit of severe or even of harsh sarcasm. The analysis of the action of the Cypria in the text above, added to the authority of Aristotle, must also outweigh Welcker's objections to the belief that the other poem, alluded to by Horace³ as commencing the history of the Trojan war from Leda's twin eggs, is the Cypria. Still less can we subscribe to Welcker's proposal, to interpret the epigram of Callimachus on the Æchalia of Creophylus in a sense laudatory of that poem or of its author. All that Callimachus¹ appears to say is, "that it was indeed a mighty honour for a second-rate poem, by a second-rate author, to obtain the title of Homeric : "

APPENDIX K. (p. 391.)

ON THE SUPPOSED LOST PORTIONS OF HESIOD'S WORKS AND DAYS.

THE most curious of these passages is that of Manilius², who, in an appeal to the Bœotian bard's agricultural science, describes him as treating of an extensive range of subjects scarcely if at all touched on in his extant poem, such as the soils or exposure best adapted to the culture of the vine, of the olive, or of corn ; the grafting of fruit trees ; with the worship and attributes of the sylvan deities male and female. There can be no reasonable doubt that this is a mere random apostrophe by the Roman poet to "Hesiod," in his capacity of classical eponyme or patriarch of the science of husbandry.

The supposition that a poem, so universally popular and familiar as the Works and Days was at every period of antiquity, should, as assumed in Thiersch's theory, have become extinct in its genuine form between the age of Manilius and that of Plutarch, and that its place should have been occupied in the interval by a garbled abstract of its former contents, seems in itself something almost too wildly improbable to be seriously entertained. In the age of Proclus, the most copious extant scholiast of the poem, the commentaries not only of Plutarch, but of the great Alexandrian critics, Aristarchus, Aristophanes, and Zenodotus, were still extant, and are copiously cited by that scholiast. (See Scholl. Gaisford, passim ; conf. Göttl. Præf. p. xxxii. sqq.) But no where in these citations is there a symptom of the same Alexandrian critics having found more in the text than Proclus did himself, while in several instances verses are now read which he states them to have condemned. Nor, in the vast number of incidental quotations of or appeals to Hesiod by antient authors, has a single verse or passage been specifically cited as from the Works and Days, which does not now form part of its text. These facts are in themselves sufficient to outweigh a multitude of such random generalities as the passage of Manilius, or others similar, occurring in the works of popular Roman writers.

Nor can any thing be more fallacious than the proposal of Göttling and other modern critics, to assign to this supposed original and more comprehensive Works and Days, all the existing fragments or citations of Hesiod in which reference is made either to rural affairs generally, or to particular plants, vegetables, drugs, and the like. The allusions by Homer in the Odyssey to the herb Moly, and to the use of dung as manure, with those occurring in both his poems to many other interesting matters connected with rural husbandry, sufficiently prove, that even in works of the purely heroic order ample scope was afforded for the introduction of such notices. How much more likely then were they to find a place in the voluminous body of didactic poems which, beside the "Works," passed current under the title Hesiod.

Of the citations in question, those relative to the herbs Polion and Hippomanes (Göttl. frgg. xv. — xviii.) belonged probably to the Ornithomantia or the Melampodia. Frg. xiv. (Göttl.) has no claim to a place in the collection; the words "præcipua voluptate" being evidently but Pliny's free translation (after Theophrastus, Hist. Plant. vii. ii.) of Hesiod's μέγ' ὄνειαρ; showing the quotation consequently to be made from an existing (41.), not a lost, passage of the "Works." In frg. xii. from Fulgentius, the corruption of the text places it beyond the pale of profitable criticism. It seems to contain vestiges of an elegiac distich:

εὐλακτιστῶν αἱματόεντι δρόσῳ.

For any more detailed examination of this question, as also of that concerning another supposed poem of Hesiod under the title of "Ἔργα μεγάλα," or "Great Works," altogether distinct from the existing "Works and Days," the reader is referred to Marckscheffel's valuable treatise on the Hesiodic fragments. The whole subject has there been fully and ably discussed¹, with results substantially the same as those to which we had been led on the same data, before obtaining access to that treatise.

APPENDIX L. (p. 404.)

ON THE LYRE AND THE LAUREL BRANCH IN EPIC RECITAL.

A DISTINCTION has been drawn by various commentators, antient and modern¹, between the modes of recital proper to the respective minstrelsies of Homer and Hesiod, which distinction has also been made the basis of an argument bearing on the relative age of the two poets. Homer, it has been said, with the heroic school of which he was the chief, sang or chanted his compositions to the chords of the lyre. Hesiod on the other hand simply recited or declaimed, without musical accompaniment, holding in his hand, in place of the lyre, a wand or rod as his emblem of office. In support of this view, appeal has been made to a passage of the *Theogony*², where the Muses, as a symbol of the poetical genius with which they inspire its author, present him with a laurel branch. This text has been brought into connexion with the later custom of persons, when reciting poetry on convivial occasions, bearing a similar branch or rod; from the Greek name of which rod, rhabdos or rhaps, some would also derive that of "rhapsodist," or professional rehearser of epic poems.³ Hesiod's art therefore, it has been inferred, may be considered as a transition from the pure epic minstrelsy to the later less genial style of performance. This however appears a somewhat overstrained interpretation of the passage of the Theogony. The laurel may there with better reason be taken as the type of poetical recital generally, whether with or without the lyre, for such it was at every period, than of any distinct class of performance. Homer himself frequently appears in his classical effigies with a laurel wand in his hand instead of a lyre. There is no doubt something plausible in the general argument, that the transition from the more musical to the more familiar mode of delivery, would be likely to take place in connexion with a style of poetry itself of a more homely and familiar character. It must be remembered however, that many of the Hesiodic poems, inclusive of the Theogony itself, where this notice of the supposed rhapsodist rod occurs, are as essentially heroic in their style and materials as the Iliad and Odyssey, and were as dependant for their full effect on the aid of lyric accompaniment; so that, giving their authors credit for any reasonable degree of antiquity, it seems very improbable that such aid should have been withheld.

APPENDIX M. (p. 408.)

ON THE SUPPOSED LOST PORTIONS OF HESIOD'S THEOGONY.

IN explanation of several of these anomalies, recourse has been had by modern commentators to the same hypothesis already noticed in treating of the Works and Days; that each poem namely, as it now exists, is but an abridgement or epitome of the original work. The main argument urged in favour of this view, the citation by antient authors, apparently from one or other of the poems, of passages no longer extant in their text, if more specious perhaps in respect to the Theogony than to the sister poem, is hardly more conclusive. The point, apart from its immediate bearings on the text of the Theogony, is the more deserving of somewhat closer attention, as tending to show generally the vague and problematical nature of many of these incidental appeals by classical authors to the works of their predecessors, and the danger, consequently, of founding theories upon such evidence.

Manilius, in the same passage above appealed to as containing a supposed allusion to the Works and Days, also cites Hesiod with apparent reference to the Theogony, as narrating, among other matters, the second birth of Bacchus from the thigh of Jupiter:

Hesiodus memorat Divos Divomque parentes, Et Chaos enixum terras, orbemque sub illo
Infantem, et primos titubantia sidera partus;
Titanasque senes, Jovis et cunabula magni,
Atque iterum patrio nascentem corpore Bacchum.¹

But in the extant Theogony, the god of the grape is described simply as begotten by Jupiter of Semele. Hence, it is urged, the passage of the original poem relating to the second nativity of the divine infant, must have been ejected subsequently to the time of Manilius. The inference is fair, assuming the testimony of Manilius to be true to the letter. That this however is neither a necessary nor a reasonable assumption, will appear from a comparison of the opening lines of the existing Theogony with the second verse of the text of Manilius above quoted, in which Hesiod is made to describe Earth as the progeny of Chaos. The genuine character of those opening lines has never been, nor can it reasonably be, called in question. But in them we find no trace of Earth having been generated by Chaos. Chaos, Earth, Tartarus, and Eros are described as springing into existence spontaneously, in independent succession. This, in fact, is a peculiarity of the Hesiodic system which distinguishes it from the Orphic and others in popular vogue. It has accordingly been pointed out as such by other commentators¹, who had the original text of the Theogony before them in writing; and it seems very doubtful how far that may have been the case with Manilius. The further description by that poet, in the above text, of the globe or sphere as in a state of infancy, and of the parturition of the various stars, finds also no parallel in the Theogony. Such vagueness in these essential particulars gives ample colour to the suspicion formerly expressed, that the Roman astronomical poet here uses the name "Hesiod" merely as the poetical type or standard of the classical theology, with the details of which the same Manilius was more familiar in the text of other more popular repertories of his own age.

A similar discrepancy of Hesiodic legend occurs in the case of the Hydra, and of other kindred monsters. Nicander², in his Theriaca, quotes "Hesiod" as deriving the origin of the whole race of venomous animals from "the blood of the Titans." The scholiast on this text plainly taxes his author with falsehood or error; no such passage being to be found in Hesiod. In support of Nicander's credit appeal has been made to another scholiast³, who represents the Hesiodic Theogony as having described "the genealogy of the gods; Erebus and Chaos; Heaven and Earth; Cronus and Jupiter; the Hecaton-Chiras (or Titans); the battle of the Giants, and the issue from their blood of many venomous monsters, of the Hydra slain by Hercules, of the Chimæra slain

³ Ap. Lobeck, Aglaoph. p. 567.

by Bellerophon, of the Gorgon slain by Perseus, and of the three-headed dog" [Cerberus]. Here again the question at issue is not one of mere omission, but of entire discrepancy; for the existing Theogony, in a passage of unexceptionably Hesiodic character¹, derives the Hydra, Chimæra, and Cerberus from an amour of Typhaon and Echidna. The same passage gives fifty, not three heads alone, to Cerberus. It must therefore be assumed, either that a passage of the Theogony, tracing the birth of the Hydra and her fellow-monsters to "the blood of the Titans," had been ejected, and another with a different version of the story inserted in its stead; or that the original text contained both accounts, and, by consequence, was guilty of a self-contradiction; or, thirdly, that in the different editions of the poet different versions of the same fable were preferred; or, finally, that the whole dilemma originates in a misunderstanding on the part of Nicander and of the secondary authorities on the same side, all probably drawing from a common source of error, and imputing to Hesiod, or to the Theogony, statements contained in other popular compendia of mythological science. The latter alternative is certainly the most reasonable of the whole. It may be added that the commentaries of Aristophanes, Aristarchus, and other leading Alexandrian critics who flourished prior to the age of Nicander, are freely cited in the extant scholia to the Theogony; and it would certainly be very surprising, had the text of the poem, as known to those critics, differed in so remarkable a degree from that extant in later times, that the same scholia should betray no knowledge whatever of any such difference.

APPENDIX N. (p. 416.)

ON THE PROCEMIA OF THE THEOGONY.

THIS theory appears to have been somewhat exaggerated in its application by its acute and ingenious proposer, Hermann.² Not less than seven of these supposed separate exordia have been set apart by him; a number which seems at least double that required to explain the difficulty. Nor can that number be elicited but by assuming a process of mutilation and repatching on the part of the antient compiler, almost as improbable as that the whole mass should be the genuine production of a single poet. It has been but rarely and with diffidence, in the course of this history, that we have ventured to expatiate in the field of subtle, and for the most part profitless criticism, to which such questions belong. Admitting however the validity of the theory itself, three of these elementary proœmia were the utmost number of which it could reasonably warrant the assumption. They might be distributed as follows :

- | | | |
|------|-------------------|------------------|
| I. | comprising verses | 1 — 4 and 22—52. |
| II. | „ | 1—21 „ 75—103. |
| III. | „ | 1 „ 53—74. |

The points of distinction are here marked out with obvious plainness by the three leading incoherencies of the text, at vv. 22. 53. 75. The opening lines, as in Hermann's arrangement, are admitted as more or less common to each subdivision. Each also combines the two conventional heads of celebration essential to all such epic exordia, the one addressed directly to the Muses, the other indirectly to Jupiter and the rest of the gods.

1. In the present book it is proposed to offer :

First. A general outline of the history of lyric poetry, in its connexion with the kindred arts of music and dancing.

Rise and early cultivation of Greek lyric poetry.

Secondly. A review of the more remarkable occasions or objects of lyric celebration, and of the varieties of hymn, ode, or song, appropriated or adapted to each.

Thirdly. A biographical notice of the more distinguished lyric poets of the period, with critical remarks on their genius and works.

Attention has already been directed in the previous book¹ to the origin of lyric poetry, and to the causes which obtained for the sister epic art, if not the palm of prior invention, a preference at least in respect to culture and preservation. It will now be proper to inquire into the circumstances to which, at a later epoch, the Lyric Muse was indebted, in her turn, for an equal share of honourable distinction.

The primary cause of the rise, progress, or decline of every popular art is to be sought in the social condition of the country where it is exercised. The decay of the epic school, the productions of which had hitherto sufficed for the higher poetical wants of the nation, was a consequence partly of changes in the social state of Greece unfavourable to the prosperity or popularity of that school, partly of the tendency of all human art to degenerate after reaching a certain climax of excellence. The same external influences which led to the decline of the one branch of composition, contributed to the improvement and extension of the other.

Epic poetry, as it appears in the age and works of Homer, is the poetry of a whole nation. The honour, the interest, or the ambition of the individual is concentrated around common objects, of a grandeur in the national estimate which requires a corresponding extent and dignity in the works devoted to their celebration. The break up of the old heroic confederacy, the substitution of independent republics for patriarchal monarchies, with the complexity of social interests consequent on advancing civilisation, produced a parallel change in the taste for literary pursuit. As the objects of popular ambition became more numerous and varied, the channels for the display of poetical talent were proportionally multiplied. The decay of the heroic minstrelsy, originating in causes peculiar to itself, involved no similar decline in the national genius, which, still buoyant and energetic, sought out the more zealously fresh materials for its exercise. The attempts of Pisander and his contemporaries to enliven by artificial expedients the languor of the superannuated epic style have already been considered. The same thirst for novelty led others to abandon that style altogether, and turn for relief from its dulness to more original sources. The nicer distinction of dialects, coinciding with a like subdivision of the federal body, tended still further to vary and extend the field of literary enterprise. Hence, while the old epic masterpieces still remained the common standards of poetical excellence, the Ionians and Æolians of the Asiatic coast, and the Dorians of Southern Greece, the three races now jointly in the ascendant of the Hellenic body, each started forth to enliven, by some new style of treatment, the new subjects and interests which the progress of society had called into existence.

The more practical or "subjective" tendency of the lyric, as compared with the epic order of composition, is strikingly illustrated in several distinctive features of their respective histories. It can hardly be doubted that the earlier ruder stages of epic poetry abounded in popular ballads, celebrating the heroes or enterprises of the day. Yet in no instance has the author of any great heroic epopee selected his subject from contemporary events. A certain mist of antiquity was required to magnify both actions and characters to the pitch which constituted them fit subjects for the higher inspirations of the Epic Muse. Her lyric sister, on the other hand, recognises the full rights of the present. She seeks her materials by preference in local, or even domestic sources: in the honour of a patron deity or an illustrious citizen; in a victory which the poet has helped to achieve, or a disaster in which he has participated. The distinction is similarly marked in the personal lot of the authors. In scarcely an instance, if indeed one can be found, has a lyric composition of any note been transmitted to posterity anonymously. Not only is the poem, whether a war-song of Tyrtæus, a lampoon of Archilochus, or a love melody of Mimnermus, invariably identified with the name and person of the author, in most cases through his own allusions to himself or his concerns, but he is often himself the subject of his work.¹ Many of the greatest epic productions, on the other hand, are either unconnected with the name of any poet, or, what is nearly equivalent, are claimed by so many, as to impart not only to the pretensions, but to the existence, of those claimants, a doubtful or mythical character. Nor is there any instance of a distinct allusion contained in a great epic work to its author or his affairs. The first advance towards the individuality of spirit which distinguishes the Lyric Muse is observable in the Works and Days of Hesiod. That poem may, accordingly, be said to form an intermediate stage between the two branches of composition, as being the production of a local school of poetry devoted to a comparatively homely class of subjects, and deriving its chief interest from its detailed notices of the author and his domestic affairs.

2. Another important cause or concomitant of the more extended culture of the art of lyric composition was the improvement of that of music. These two arts were, in the early ages of Greece, if not inseparable, so closely connected, that the advance of each from infancy to maturity must have been simultaneous. Lyric composition was invariably destined, at least on occasions of public or festive recital, for musical accompaniment. Purely instrumental music, on the other hand, at all times comparatively little popular among the Greeks¹, could at this early period have exercised proportionally slender influence on the progress of the science. While, therefore, the developement of the more complex forms of poetical metre depended on that of the musical schemes or systems, these, in their turn, were similarly indebted for their extension and refinement to the parallel improvement or complication of the poetical measures to which they were adapted. The adjustment of the accompaniment to the words, on the most delicate ideal principles, thus became essential to the full effect of a lyric performance. Hence that harmony between the genius of the different families of the Hellenic race and that of their respective lyric and musical styles, which, in these earlier stages of elegant culture, forms so prominent a feature in the character as well as literature of the nation. The gravity and severity for which the habits and language of the Dorians were proverbial, were also the proper attributes of their music and poetry. Among the Æolian colonists, on the other hand, a race of a naturally ardent temperament, and whose primitive patriarchal rudeness, verging on ferocity of manners, was superseded in their new seats by a taste for voluptuous enjoyment, the change in their own character was accompanied by a softening down of the native asperities of their dialect into an apt vehicle for the impassioned strains of Alcæus and Sappho. The more sprightly genius and varied intellect of the Ionians displays itself in the point and precision of the elegiac and iambic orders of composition, which they were the first to cultivate, and with which was associated a spirited but somewhat licentious musical style, as distinct from the severe majesty of the Dorian as from the fervid excitement of the Æolian school.¹

The nicer relations between the two arts belong to the history of music rather than literature. The analysis of those relations is a subject which, beyond a few elementary facts, is involved in great obscurity. It is one, too, which, even apart from defective historical data, would demand, for the full apprehension of its more subtle details, a depth of insight into the theory of musical science by no means necessary to the general student of classical literature, and which few, even of the most accomplished, can be expected to possess. Poetry and music, to whatever extent they may tend mutually to adorn each other, and vitally as they were linked together among the Greeks, are yet, like architecture and painting, literary composition and elocution, distinct arts. A building may derive much of its effect from the coloured decoration of its walls, or an oration from the eloquence of its recital; but an architect is not, on this account, required to be a painter, nor an elegant writer an orator. Similar is the relation between poetry and music. The office of the poet is to adapt the style of his work, even in the form of expression, or the sound of the words, to the spirit of his subject. The musical accompaniment, like colour in architecture, is but a secondary aid to these primary requisites. A poetical composition which through the vehicle of language alone failed to produce its effect, and was solely dependant on its musical arrangement, would be but a sorry performance.

The question here naturally arises, how far, among the Greeks, the functions of poet and musician may have been combined in the same person. It must certainly have been desirable, in the spirit of the Greek Lyric Muse, in order to secure the requisite harmony between the words and the air of a composition, that both should be the produce of the same genius; and such, there is reason to believe, was frequently the case in the infancy of musical science, among a people so highly gifted in regard to all the imaginative faculties. But neither probability nor historical data warrant the belief that this was the universal rule¹, or that all the great lyric poets, from Callinus down to Callimachus, were also accomplished musical composers. Nor can it be supposed that the original words would be held at all times inseparable from the original melody. The same ode might acquire popularity in different places, where different musical tastes prevailed. The air might, in such cases, be varied at pleasure, without real detriment to the literary character of the composition. It may also be presumed that, from the earliest period at which the two arts had reached that stage of maturity in which they already appear in the days of Archilochus and Terpander (B. C. 676), there was, besides the public or festive, also the purely literary enjoyment of lyric composition, through the medium of written circulation, without the aid either of voice or instrument.

Wherever the above relation between the two arts was reversed, and the words of an ode became altogether secondary to the air, the case would pass from the province of poetical into that of musical criticism. The parallel of the modern opera is here closely in point. As a general rule, the words of the Italian musical dramas, where not mere vapid commonplace, possess no pretensions to higher poetical excellence. They are but a vehicle for the execution of the music, which is alone responsible for the effect on the audience. There are however exceptions to this rule, supplying cases analogous to the Greek lyric rehearsals. Many of the popular dramas of Metastasio, for example, were composed for musical recitation, and the odes in which they abound were arranged to melodies; yet the intrinsic poetical value of those compositions has secured for them, apart from all musical aids, a permanent popularity with the reading public. If a knowledge of the sister art can be dispensed with in a case where the means of obtaining that knowledge exist, still less essential must it be in one where the utmost extent to which it can be acquired amounts to a few doubtful antiquarian speculations. All, therefore, that here falls strictly within the province of the literary historian is the fact that lyric compositions were, among the Greeks, especially in the public festivals, far more closely and habitually combined than in modern times with musical execution, and that the latter was adapted to the genius of the poem on the most refined ideal principles.¹ As, however, the general connexion between the two arts will necessarily form the subject of frequent allusion in the sequel, it will here be proper, without enlarging on the nicer links of that connexion, to offer a concise notice of the Greek musical systems, and of the terminology by which they are distinguished.

3. The foundation of the Greek art of music² was the tetrachord, or four-stringed lyre, an instrument furnishing, as its name indicates, but four distinct sounds or tones. The limited variety of accompaniment which these sounds supplied seems to have sufficed for the recitative of the epic minstrelsy during its flourishing ages. With the progress of lyric art, the number of strings was increased to seven (B. C. 676), the first and last of which, by the omission of a centre tone of the scale, were placed at the interval of an octave from each other. The different key or pitch in which this scale of chords was strung constituted the fundamental distinction between the national styles or harmonies.¹ Of these there were at first but three, the Dorian, Phrygian, and Lydian. The Dorian was in the lowest key; the Phrygian was strung a tone higher than the Dorian; the Lydian a tone higher than the Phrygian. Not long after the regulation of these three primary harmonies two others were invented: the Ionian between the Dorian and Phrygian, the Æolian between the Phrygian and Lydian; the interval between the key note of each harmony and that of the next in order being here, consequently, but half a tone. Besides the key or tone, these styles were characterised by the genius of their metrical numbers.² The Dorian measure was distinguished by a grave and equable modification of notes, and a corresponding arrangement of the words, with a prevalence of long syllables and uniform succession of feet. In the Phrygian and Lydian, and their respective modifications, the Ionian and Æolian, a livelier, more flexible, sometimes turbulent or enthusiastic rhythm was preferred. In the different harmonies, these peculiarities of national style depended mainly for their developement on the different modes of applying to each the three musical scales or "genera," still familiarly known under the titles of diatonic, chromatic, and enharmonic; according to which the seven notes of the octave were intonated, and the intervals between each note regulated, in the adaptation of the instrument to different styles of performance.³

The above three or five primitive harmonies form the basis of numerous other subordinate varieties, under the titles of Hypophrygian, Hypolydian, Mixolydian, and others similar. This multiplication of styles, involving a proportional mixture or confusion of the antient fundamental forms in which the new varieties originated, is censured by the best native critics as a corruption of the popular taste, concurrent with the general decline in the character of the nation.

One of the few distinctly recorded facts in the history of antient music is, that, at least during this earlier more genial period of the art, the rhythmical numbers of the air were far more essentially dependant on the poetical numbers of the song than in modern times. The accompaniment was considered, as a general rule, altogether subservient to the words, both in its adaptation to the character and genius of the poem, and in the special adjustment of its numbers to the length or brevity, gravity or vivacity, of the verses and of their syllables and feet.¹ The best or only practical insight therefore, into the musical element of Greek lyric poetry, is the familiarity which every competent scholar possesses with the fundamental laws of prosody, quantity, and versification.² The analysis of these laws belongs to the

² Beyond these elementary principles the science of Greek metres is itself a mystery, forming, in fact, a chapter of the same general field of investigation as that concerning the more subtle connexion of the musical and poetical arts, and offering the same poverty of tangible results. This grammar of the language, not to its history, where they can fitly be considered but with reference to the mode of their application by different authors or schools of poetry.

Much of what has here been said of music applies also to the sister art of dancing, on which certain orders of Greek lyric composition seem to have been little less dependant for their full effect than on the musical accompaniment.¹ With the varied movements of the festive dance were more immediately connected, in their origin or their artistic arrangement, those varieties of poetical form which under the names of Strophe, Antistrophe, and Epode, constitute so prominent a characteristic of the more advanced stages of lyric art. Several of the more popular styles of poetical composition are also identical, in name and origin, with the dances to which they were chiefly adapted. In Homer, the Threnus or dirge, and the Pæan are the only two classes of song with which dancing is not combined; and in the immediately subsequent age the Pæan no longer forms an exception.² In the festive halls of Ithaca, Scheria, and Sparta the bard not only plays, but sings, to the dance of the suitors, of the Phæacian youths, and of the guests of Menelaus. A similar sufficiently appears from the wide discrepancies in the respective views of the two distinguished modern grammarians, Hermann (Doctrina Rei metr.) and Boeckh (De Metris Pindari), who have bestowed the greatest amount of labour and ingenuity on the subject. The scholar who correctly appreciates the more recondite excellences of Greek rhythmical science according to the one, must be a stranger to them in the estimation of the other. See Herm. op. cit. Præf. p. xvii.; Boeckh, Expl. Pind. pp. 693—698.; conf. Thiersch, Einleit. zu Pind. p. 66.

accompaniment enlivens the evolutions of the vine-dressers on the shield of Achilles, and those of the more accomplished performers in the Cretan dance of Dædalus, in another compartment of the same sculptured series. The word Chorus, signifying in later usage a concert of voices, denoted in earlier times simply a dance, or even, in the stricter usage of primitive art, a place suitable for such exercises.¹ The custom of the dancers joining in the song led to the term being extended to each kind of performance. Finally, on the greater distinction of the two arts, and the substitution in the tragic chorus of the processional march and gestures for the ordinary dance, the phrase was appropriated in a great measure by the art of music. The more extended application of it maintained its ground however, during the flourishing age of lyric poetry, in regard to many of the higher branches of festive solemnity.

4. It has already been shown, that while epic composition was indebted for its highest perfection to Æolian genius, the chief seat of its later cultivation and subsequent decline was the neighbouring region of Ionia. That decline however, it has also been remarked, was but a prelude to a spirited development of the national talent in a new direction. In the same Ionia the first fruits of this revival were brought to maturity in the elegy and iambic trimeter. These two branches of composition, if they cannot be proved to be next to the hexameter the earliest cultivated, are those at least of which the next most antient remains have been preserved. Each, while conventionally classed as lyric, might perhaps with greater propriety be defined as a medium between the lyric and epic; a first step in the transition from the one to the other style of popular art. Of the two, the elegy possesses upon the whole the strongest claims to priority, as well on historical grounds, as from its close connexion with the old heroic measure, of which the pentameter may be considered, theoretically at least, but a slight modification, adapting it to more homely and familiar objects.

For the better understanding of the nature of this modification, attention must be recalled to those properties of the hexameter verse formerly¹ pointed out as peculiarly fitting it for epic composition; to the variety and flexibility of its metrical numbers, and the scope which they afforded both to narrative continuity and dramatic mechanism, in the treatment of every kind of subject. These properties were illustrated by the contrast of certain other systems of epic versification, where the text is subdivided into groups of lines, forming, in their successive repetition, distinct metrical stanzas or clauses of the narrative.

This subdivision of the metrical text, and into very minute parts, is the special characteristic of the elegiac, as compared with the purely hexameter order of versification. The fundamental base or element of the former is not, as in the hexameter, a single line, but a distich or couplet, formed by subjoining to the heroic verse another shorter line consisting of the same dactylic elements, and commonly called the pentameter. The single distich² is named,

² The employment of the pentameter in its single capacity was never countenanced by classical usage. The few examples which occur belong technically, an Elegium. The elegy or elegiac poem (Elegia) is but a repetition of the distich in numbers proportioned to the extent of the subject. The obvious effect of this combination of the longer and shorter measures, enhanced by a peculiar abruptness in the central cæsure of the latter, and in its closing foot or "catalexis," is to impart a certain emphatic point to the entire period. This branch of composition therefore is essentially epigrammatic or sententious. Its scope and tendency is to express concisely and emphatically, in the case of the single distich a certain statement or maxim; in that of the prolonged elegy a series of similar statements or maxims. Each distich forms, it is true, a concise metrical system, capable, like the hexameter verse, of being multiplied into a poem of any length. But the process of repetition is here far from offering the same freedom and facilities for the treatment of a varied and extensive subject. Each pentameter couplet ought, obviously, in the true spirit of the Elegiac muse, either itself to comprise a distinct clause or period of the sense, or at least to form a subdivision of another more comprehensive clause or head of argument terminating in a pentameter verse; in other words, every full pause in the sense ought to coincide with a full pause in the measure. Where a continuous head of the subject runs through the close of one distich into the commencement of another, there results a palpable incongruity, which becomes the more glaring when the ensuing pause takes place in the body of the distich; whether at the close of the hexameter or in the middle of either verse. Not only, therefore, is the elegy disqualified by its epigrammatic spirit for continuous narrative, but even in its own proper sphere comparative brevity is essential to the full effect of an elegiac poem. A protracted series of such epigrammatic commentaries, upon any subject, can hardly fail to prove jejune and monotonous. These anomalies, it is true, are all more or less authorised by the practice of the great professional masters of this style, in their natural anxiety to adapt their favourite means to every kind of object. The real impropriety however does not the less exist: and, despite the ingenuity with which it may be smoothed over, the discerning critic must, in his own experience, have felt how much superior is the effect of the elegiac measure in the pointed epigram, and other concise and pithy compositions, than in prolonged poetical narratives or moral dissertations.

early cultivation.

5. In any theory therefore as to the origin of this measure, we may safely assume, by reference both to the general law of human invention and to the discriminating taste which marks the developement of art among the Greeks, that the elegiac distich was called into existence by the object to which it was best adapted, that of modifying the old dactylic metre to familiar epigrammatic purposes.

This view is confirmed by the fact that the elegy was the measure solely or chiefly employed, in early times, for sepulchral or dedicatory inscriptions: the kind of epigrammatic composition which would first, or alone, suggest itself as an object of polite culture. The parent term Elegos, whence Elegium and Elegia, denotes accordingly, in its earliest usage, mourning or sorrow; as we learn from the united testimony of the antient critics¹, confirmed by its own probable etymology.² It is accordingly classed by some of the same authorities, though not with strict propriety, as identical with Threnus. The threnus was the dirge, or funeral lament, sung over the corpse, or during the funeral solemnity. The elegy was the more permanent tribute of mournful respect to the memory of the deceased, recording his own virtues with the regrets of his friends, and commonly engraved on his monument. So peculiarly was the elegiac measure, in the subsequent stages of its cultivation, considered as proper to poems of a doleful tendency, that the name Elegy was extended, in vulgar use, even to those of like character where a different metre was preferred.

To this view, however, it has been objected³, that the extant elegiac compositions of remote antiquity are for the most part in a style quite opposite to

² For the infinity of speculative, often very fanciful hypotheses upon this point, see Frank. Callin. p. 42. alibi; Welck. der Elegos, Kleine Schr. vol. I. p. 63.; Osann, Beiträge zur Gr. Literaturgesch. vol. I. p. 11.; Ulrici, Gesch. der Hell. Dichtk. vol. II. p. 101. sq.; Bode, Gesch. der Hell. Dichtk. vol. II. p. 120. sqq. The most reasonable etymology appears to be that which connects the term with ἔλεος or ἔλεος. But even this connexion is obscure and doubtful. All that can safely be assumed is, that the word was originally of mournful import.

³ Frank. Call. p. 7. sqq., 36. sqq.; conf. Ulrici, loc. sup. cit. The doctrine of these authors, that the first application of the elegy to mournful purposes was not earlier than the time of Mimnermus, a century after Callinus, seems quite inconsistent with their admission, as above quoted, of the originally mournful signification of the term. Equally groundless is the assumption of Frank. (p. 77.), that the phrase Elegos and its derivatives were first invented in the age of Simonides. The former term occurs a full generation earlier, in an epigram of Echembrotus, a poet of the XLVth Olympiad. Paus. x. vii. 3.

either the funebral or the epigrammatic, being chiefly martial or patriotic appeals, often of considerable length, addressed to the poet's fellow-citizens in times of public emergency. These poems however, while possibly the oldest ascertained specimens of pentameter style, cannot reasonably be assumed to represent the taste or practice in which that style originated. The distinction between what may formerly have existed, and what has been preserved to posterity, is one of essential importance in questions of this nature. The elegy, in the works of Callinus, and others of its earliest recorded professional votaries, already appears in an advanced state of cultivation, implying a long course of previous practice, and consequent modification of its primitive use. Their compositions stand to its first beginnings in the same relation as the Iliad and Odyssey to the earlier efforts of the Epic Muse. It were as reasonable to argue, from the actual priority of the Iliad, that the first poem in hexameter verse was a finished epopee, as from the existing compositions of Callinus, admitting him to be the most antient author in this style, that the first elegy was a martial or political ode. For the great antiquity of the elegy, however, in its application to what has here been assumed to be its original object, appeal may be made to Archilochus, an author of the same age as Callinus, but of far more varied genius. The remains of the former poet, while exhibiting the measure in its adaptation to every variety of subject, plaintive, martial, and satirical, offer, together with several elegies of a funebral character, a general predominance of those of the epigrammatic order.¹ But, even did the works of these earlier poets furnish no distinct proof of this presumed original destination of the measure, there remains another more competent source of illustration in the sepulchral or votive dedications of the same era. The existing relics of this class, though scanty, in the ratio of their antiquity, yet form a more or less continuous series of evidence that, during this whole early period, from an epoch equal or little inferior to that of the poets above cited, the pentameter was the measure exclusively preferred in monumental inscriptions. The general rule is curiously confirmed by the exceptions, the few dedications where the hexameter verse occurs being confined, solely or chiefly, to such occasions as either possessed or pretended to an antiquity prior to the age at which the elegiac measure is supposed to have come into popular use. Another indirect proof of the essentially epigraphic character of the latter measure is the circumstance, that the only other compositions of a like brief or sententious nature emanating from the same period, the oracular responses, are with equal constancy couched in hexameters. This may be ascribed partly to a religious veneration-for primeval custom, partly to the heroic measure being itself, in a poetical point of view, better suited to the dignity or sanctity of such edicts.¹

¹ Of the thirty or forty dedicatory epitaphs or epigrams given by Pausanias, all are pentameters but three; two of which (i. xxxvii., ix. xi.), as in honour of mythical heroes, are appropriately embodied in the hexameter measure. The only hexameter distich connected with the historical age is that to Miltiades (vi. xix.). Of those in elegiac measure, four or five may belong to this earliest lyric period (iv. xxii., v. xxiv., ix. xxxviii., x. vii.). To these may be added the inscription of Orrhippus at Megara (Boeckh, Inscr. tom. I. p. 553.; Clint. ad Ol. xv.). The oracles cited by Pausanias, on the other hand, about thirty in number, are all in hexameters, with the exception of one in iambs (iv. ix.). The

6. There can be no reasonable doubt that the remote origin of the elegiac distich is lost, like that of the hexameter verse, in the mists of antiquity. When therefore we find, according to the prevailing practice of confounding the higher cultivation of an art with its invention, the merit of that invention variously ascribed in the present case to Callinus and Archilochus, the only real question of precedence must relate to the age of these authors, or of others of still greater antiquity, if such can be pointed out, from whom genuine specimens of this style of composition have been transmitted. Both these poets flourished towards the close of the eighth or commencement of the seventh century B. C. They are by consequence so nearly contemporaneous, that the closer examination of their claims to priority, as of no material bearing on the history of elegiac poetry, will be reserved for the chapter on their personal history. The same measure was also cultivated in its primary epigrammatic form by Asius of Samos¹, an epic poet of uncertain age, but possessing claims, perhaps, to equal antiquity with either Callinus or Archilochus. Their younger contemporary Tyrtæus was distinguished, still more than Callinus, for its application same general rules apply, with rare exception if any, to similar specimens of these various orders of monumental or sacred literature preserved by other compilers.

The inscriptions on the Chest of Cypselus (Paus. v. xviii. sq.) are in hexameter verse; but they are of a properly epic character. It is also probable that the age of this monument may be prior to the familiar use of the elegy. This latter remark applies further to the epigrams cited by Herodotus (v. lix. sq.) in the Ismenian sanctuary, whether genuine or forgeries.

to martial and political subjects. About the same time certain of the earlier Greek musicians, Olympus, Clonas, Terpander, Sacadas, and others, are mentioned as authors of elegies; but it seems doubtful whether the term here applies to the pentameter measure, or to the plaintive style of music with which that measure was originally connected.¹

The next elegiac poet of any celebrity is Mimnermus of Colophon, who flourished about the close of the seventh century B.C. To him belongs the credit of having greatly extended the use of the pentameter measure in the more plaintive style of amatory composition, its adaptation to which constituted, in later times, its chief source of general popularity.²

Coeval with Mimnermus was Solon, in whose remains, and those of his contemporary Sages, are the first distinct traces of the gnomic or didactic elegy. This style was extensively cultivated in the latter half of the sixth century B.C. by Phocylides and Theognis. During the same period flourished Xenophanes of Colophon, who seems first to have employed the pentameter measure in prolonged narrative compositions; and Simonides of Ceos, who above all his predecessors gave prominence and effect, as a cultivated branch of literature, to the strictly epigrammatic style of elegiac poetry.

¹ Plut. de Mus. III. VIII.; Suid. v. Ὀλυμπος. It appears probable, from these passages and other sources referred to in p. 17. supra, that the term Elegos, in its origin, attached with equal, or perhaps greater propriety to the melody than to the words of a composition.

² Mimnermus was celebrated on this account by Hermesianax ap. Athen. XIII. p. 597. sq. This passage, misinterpreted by later uncritical writers, obtained for the same poet with those writers, in spite of the notoriously far higher antiquity of Callinus and Archilochus, the credit of first "inventor" of the elegiac measure. Conf. Frank. op. cit. p. 9. sqq.

In the sequel of the Attic period Antimachus of Colophon, an early contemporary of Plato, distinguished himself in the tender amorous elegy as an imitator or emulator of his fellow-citizen Mimnermus, by whom that style had been first carried to perfection. In the Alexandrian school, as among the Romans, both the joys and the sorrows of love supplied abundant and popular subjects for the elegy. With the poets of the latter nation this measure obtained a peculiar vogue, and was largely employed in compositions of an epic character.

In the musical accompaniment of the pentameter distich, the flute, though not to the exclusion of the lyre, was the instrument preferred, as that which in every age was considered more immediately adapted to mournful composition. Accordingly Mimnermus, the most popular author in the plaintive style of elegiac poetry, and various other early elegiac poets, are themselves described as skilful flute-players.¹ This preference may perhaps be considered as in part a consequence of the Ionian origin of the elegy, the taste for wind-instruments among the Greeks being confessedly derived from Asia. Among the Lydians of the coast on which the Ionian colonies were established, the flute was extensively used in martial as well as mournful music.² Hence, as the earliest regular odes of the elegiac order, those of the Ionian Calinus, are of a martial tendency, the preference of the flute by the Greeks, as the accompaniment of the Elegy, the more naturally suggested itself. How far elegiac poems were at any time regularly set to music, how far merely attuned to harmonious chords like the epic recitative, would probably depend much on the nature of their subject. The more it partook of a continuous narrative character, the more appropriate the simpler style of accompaniment; the nearer the approach to the pure lyric, the more artificial would be the style of music preferred. The poems of Mimnermus, where the lyric character predominates more than in those of any previous author, are stated accordingly to have been set to music.¹ To the more dignified martial and political addresses of Callinus or Tyrtaeus, a graver recitative tone might seem better adapted; while the elegies of Solon, Periander, Xenophanes, and Phocylides, where the gnomic or didactic style predominated, are expressly said not to have been musically arranged.²

7. The invention of the Iambus, the rival of the Elegy in antiquity and early popularity, was familiarly ascribed by the antients, as was that of so many other

poetry.

² Athen. xiv. p. 632. In the older vocabulary of the poetical art (Solon, frg. xvi. 2.; Gaisf. alibi; conf. Herodot. v. cxiii.), and indeed during every subsequent age of literature (conf. Frank. Callin. p. 77. sqq.), the more familiar title of poems of any length, either in pentameter or hexameter measure, was ἔπη, or "lines;" obviously with reference to that continuity of style which distinguishes each order of composition, in its relative degree, from the more properly melic branches of lyric art. The plural formation τὰ ἐλεγεία, denoting, like ἐλεγεία, an elegiac poem, originates in this usage, ἔπη being understood. The term ἔπη was also occasionally applied, on similar grounds, to iambic, trochaic, and other compositions marked by a like continuity of metrical succession (Bekk. Anecd. p. 751.; Dionys. Hal. de Comp. verb. xxvi.). Hence, in later times, the works of Archilochus, Simonides the elder, Tyrtaeus, and Phocylides, are said to have been "rhapsodised" occasionally, along with the properly epic poems of Hesiod and Homer. metrical forms, to Archilochus.¹ In the Margites however, a poem of very early date, and assigned by Aristotle to Homer himself, iambic verses were interspersed with heroic hexameters.² It must be presumed therefore, either that the respectable authors who attribute the invention of the former measure to Archilochus differed from Aristotle as to the genuine antiquity of the Margites, or that the term Invention, as here applied by them, relates merely to the regular poem of continuous trimeters, to which, in popular usage, the phrase Iambic measure was appropriated.

Characteristics of the iambic
rhythm.

But the nature and spirit of the Iambus, still more perhaps than of the Elegy, entitle us to look, for its first beginnings at least, to the spontaneous effort of the primitive Muse rather than to the artifice of a politer age. The component elements of the elegy were contained in the old hexameter. It might very naturally occur, therefore, to an ingenious master of later times to invent a new form to suit a new purpose, by curtailing two syllables of every alternate verse; for such in fact is the whole amount of change in the mechanical structure of the measure. The iambus on the other hand bears, perhaps above all other metres, in its very essence the stamp of popular origin. It is, as Aristotle³ and other antient critics have pointedly remarked, the metre of familiar discourse. Hence, as the same critics observe, the frequency of its spontaneous occurrence in prose compositions, the justice of which remark may be easily verified by the test of experiment. The measure suggested itself instinctively, therefore, to primitive genius, in any attempt to impart to the poetical treatment of a subject, not so much dignity or solemnity, as emphatic pungency and smartness. This view, together with the remote mythical antiquity of the iambic measure, is supported in the tradition of the Homeric Hymn to Ceres¹ by what is probably the earliest extant vestige of the name, the title of the Eleusinian nymph Iambe, who contributes by her jibes and drolleries to dissipate the grief of the goddess for her lost daughter. A popular ceremony of the rites of Ceres, both at Eleusis and elsewhere, were sallies of bantering and railery, directed by the assembled crowd against each other or the passers by, during the procession.² Iambe is the mythical type both of this ceremony and of the mode in which it was performed. A similar custom prevailed in the kindred worship of Bacchus, combined with a still more decided dramatic ingredient, which afterwards ripened, under the auspices of Thespis and Susarion, into the regular Attic tragedy and comedy. So naturally indeed, in the opinion of the antient critics, did the iambic measure suggest itself as the weapon of satirical attack, that both Horace and Ovid suppose its imputed invention by Archilochus to have been for the special convenience of his biting pasquinades.³

In its further cultivation however the iambus, or rather the iambic trimeter, for in that form alone is its full excellence displayed, not only embraces, like the elegy, the treatment of every variety of subject, but as possessing, in a degree little short of the hexameter, the principle of continuity which is wanting in the elegy, is qualified to treat those subjects with similar, if not the same, ease, amplitude, and dignity as the hexameter itself. The essential property of the iambic foot, consisting of one short and one long syllable, so as to commence with the weaker and terminate smartly in the stronger element, may be defined as a union of simplicity and emphasis. These primary elements again, through the ordinary expedients of Greek metrical art, solution, common syllable, and the like, admit, without any actual violation of their own fundamental attributes, the variety of effect derivable from an interspersion of trochaic, dactylic, spondaic, or anapestic forms. Still however the excellence of the measure, even in its complete adaptation to the drama, shines forth less in the flowing discourse or narrative, than in its own original proper class of subjects, lively conversation, pungent satire, or smart repartee. An oration of Æschylus, with all its rhetorical pomp and elevation, falls far short in true poetical grandeur of the higher eloquence of the Iliad. The perfection of iambic versification is the text of Aristophanes, where it will ever remain unsurpassed and unrivalled in variety and brilliancy of dramatic effect.

The honour of the first invention, or in other words higher cultivation, of the iambic measure, while usually awarded to Archilochus, was disputed in some quarters in favour of the elder Simonides, author of the most antient extant iambic poem of any considerable length. The point is of little importance as affecting either the history of this style of composition, or the credit of the two poets, both having adapted it to satirical purposes, and having been contemporary with each other. If we except these two authors and Solon, who was partial to the iambic trimeter, the measure seems to have been comparatively little popular during this period, owing, perhaps, to its being less well adapted than other rhythmical forms to the melic or pure lyric order of performance, now so greatly in the ascendant. The iambic compositions of Solon, consisting chiefly of addresses to the Athenian public in vindication of his own political conduct, or reflecting upon that of his fellow-citizens, appear from the extant specimens to have partaken at times much of the character of speeches in the mouth of a hero of Euripides, affording a foretaste, as it were, of the style of the tragic dialogue.

In the arrangement of the iambic trimeter to music, the same general rule seems to have been observed as in the case of the elegy. Where the melic element prevailed, as in the jocund sallies of festive revelry, a properly musical accompaniment might be preferred; where the composition was of a graver character or more continuous tenor, the simple recitative would suffice. This view seems in some measure confirmed by the statement of Plutarch, that the iambic odes of Archilochus, the standard master of this branch of art, were partly sung partly recited to the harp, and that their author had himself prescribed rules for the allotment to each of its appropriate style of accompaniment.¹

position.

8. The two branches of composition above treated, the elegiac and iambic, while both apparently of Ionian origin, form, as already observed, an intermediate stage between the epic or heroic and the purely lyric style, and might thus be conjointly characterised as the Epico-lyric, in contradistinction to the melic or choral orders of poetry, where a more vital connexion with the sister art of music was maintained. The precocity of Ionian inventive genius is, however, similarly exemplified in these more refined and complicated styles of lyric performance, to which attention will now more immediately be directed. Although the strictly musical element of lyric poetry appears to be chiefly of Æolian origin, a priority in respect to the culture and extension of its literary element is, by a preponderance of antient testimony¹, awarded to the same Ionian Archilochus so distinguished by his services in extending and adorning the elegiac and iambic branches of art. Certain it is, that in the works of this remarkable man a number even of the more delicate varieties of melic rhythm appear in an advanced state of maturity. Among these the Trochaic, while capable in its lighter combinations of the liveliest musical effect, may, in its more prolonged tetrameter form, be classed along with the elegy and iambic trimeter, as another intermediate stage between the epic and lyric styles. It offers in fact a counterpart to the iambic trimeter, as well in the equal division and regular progression of its numbers, and its consequent, though less complete, adaptation to continuous recital, as in the general spirit of its poetical expression. The iambic foot, rising from the short to the long syllable, possesses a vigour and emphasis favourable to smart invective or keen expostulation ; the trochee, subsiding from the long to the short, has a more rapid but comparatively smooth and equal progression, suited rather to persuasive appeal, querulous complaint, or even dignified declamation.¹ Hence its names of Trochæus, the runner, or Choriæus, the dancer, from its adaptation to the more airy motions of the dance. The Anapæst, the converse of the dactyl, and another imputed discovery of Archilochus, is an extension of the time and rhythm of the iambus, enhancing the rhetorical power of that measure from emphasis to impetuosity, but forfeiting much of its narrative or conversational spirit. To the same poet were also ascribed the Choriambic and Pæonic, with various more complicated metres, arising from the combination of those already described with each other or with the elementary forms in which they originated, and adapted to corresponding varieties of poetical expression.²

The term Invention, as applied to the earliest ascertained use of these varied metres, may in some cases safely be taken in a literal sense. Not only were many of them dependant on a parallel improvement of the art of music, but their arrangement seems to imply a more forward stage of literary culture, and a more copious stock of technical resources than was required for the earlier recitative branches of composition. Still however it is not likely that any art, in the ordinary course of things, can have reached at a single step the stage in which lyric rhythm appears in the works of Archilochus. It may reasonably, with all respect for the brilliant genius of that author, be assumed in his case, as in that of Homer and the epopee, that many zealous labourers, had preceded him in the same field, but that their productions, whether from their own slender claims to permanent popularity, or from the slowness of the public to appreciate those claims, had not been preserved. There can, indeed, be little doubt that even in the very infancy of society, among all poetically gifted nations, popular songs admitted of a variety of metrical forms suited to their variety of subject ; and that in Greece, consequently, even in the days of Homer, there must have existed for the lighter orders of composition livelier systems of versification than the dactylic hexameter, or even the elegy and iambus. The same rule holds good in modern literature. Many of the lyric stanzas which now charm in the page of Dryden or Gray, existed in substance in the popular ballad minstrelsy, long before the more dignified epic measure was improved by Chaucer, or carried to perfection by Milton. In every age however the nobler orders of poetry, as more immediately connected with objects of public or national interest, naturally take precedence, in polite cultivation, of those of a lighter more familiar character ; and it is the epoch of that cultivation which, in any such case, can alone or chiefly supply tangible material for critical commentary.

poetry.
The Nome.

9. It has already been remarked, that while any technical analysis of the Greek art of music would here be out of place, the elementary history of musical composition must enter to a greater or less degree into the history of Greek lyric poetry, owing to the vital connexion between the two arts, especially during their earlier stages. All the authentic notices of the origin and early progress of the more refined branches of lyric composition revolve, in fact, around the names and performances of the primitive improvers of the science of music. To the efforts of these personages consequently, in the joint field of invention, a reasonable share of the present chapter will be allotted. With the notices of their labours will also be combined the few particulars of their personal history which have been recorded. This arrangement will here be preferable, on various accounts, to that of reserving such biographical details for separate treatment; the method which, for equally valid reasons, has been adopted in regard to contemporary authors of the strictly poetical order. Scarcely one of those celebrated patriarchs of the art of music, while all were probably to a certain extent poets, seems to have possessed claims to higher distinction on the ground of his poetical, apart from his musical talents.¹ Nor, indeed, is there any one of them of whose personal affairs the extant notices are such as to supply material for a separate memoir.

The views of the leading antient authorities relative to the early progress of the combined arts have been preserved in the Treatise on Music which passes current under the name of Plutarch. This tract is more remarkable for learning than method or precision. The object of its author was less to promulgate any definite system of his own, than to embody an abstract of the doctrines of the older writers on the subject. His authorities, accordingly, while agreeing generally in fundamental matters, are often much at variance in details; nor has any serious effort been made by the compiler to reconcile their discrepancies. The greater indulgence therefore is due to the following attempt, by a collation of his best accredited and most consistent data, to place before the reader, in as distinct a form as the case will admit, the substance of the information which they supply.¹

The clearest insight into the earlier stages of pure melic art is afforded by the extant notices of that primitive order of poetico-musical performance called Nome. This term, by reference to its etymology, denotes any thing "set apart" or "appropriated." In its application to the arts of music or poetry it admits of a twofold interpretation, as signifying either a poem or ode set to a musical air, or a piece of music arranged to the words of a poetical text.² The foundation of Plutarch's treatise is a distinction between the recitative and the lyric element in the works of the old epic poets. Under the head of Lyric he classes the hymn, the threnus or lament, the chorus, the convivial song; illustrating his doctrine by the Hymn of Mars and Venus, and other parallel portions of Homer's poems.³ Such compositions, he remarks, were not merely chanted or recited, like the ordinary epic narrative, at the free discretion of the poet, but were arranged to a nome or piece of music specially adapted to their respective characters. The existence of some such distinction seems, indeed, inherent in the first principles of art. It can hardly be supposed that the music of the brilliant chorus of Phæacian youths, of the joyous pæan to Apollo Chryseus, or the song of the Muses in Olympus, "responding to each other with their beautiful voices¹," was but the same comparatively monotonous succession of citharædic chords used by the epic minstrel in his ordinary narrative.

At a period however, when the lyre had but four strings, and wind instruments were comparatively little popular in Greece, any such instrumental accompaniment must have been at the best but meagre. These early citharædic nomes therefore, are consistently described as first permanently arranged and reduced to system on the introduction of the seven-stringed lyre by the celebrated master Terpan-der.² But previously to his improvements, a wider compass and nobler character had already been imparted to the nomic order of composition, through the medium of the flute or clarionet³, by the Phrygian musician Olympus. From this composer dates also the extension among the Greeks of a taste for the aulodic branch of music. Wind instruments were obviously better qualified than the primitive lyre, by their greater flexibility, compass, and sonorous power, to give effect to a complicated variety of metrical forms, or to that lively expression of mental emotion which forms a distinguishing characteristic of lyric poetry. Olympus accordingly is described as the founder, that is, the first systematic improver of the musical or "nomic" element of Greek lyric art¹, the more advanced cultivation of which took place in connexion with the heptachord lyre, as the more chaste and purely Hellenic instrument. All authorities seem to agree that aulodic music, although in its ruder rustic form the most antient probably in every country, was first scientifically cultivated (in popular phraseology, invented) in Asia.² The mythical contests of Apollo, the god of the lyre, with Marsyas³ and other patrons of the flute, shadow forth the struggles of the two styles for the ascendant. The lyre represents among the antients the more chaste and elegant order of music; the flute, that of a more turbulent and exciting character, expressive equally of morbid melancholy, joyous revelry, or phrensied passion. Hence the former instrument was preferred by Apollo, the patron of all the more noble and refined branches of Hellenic art; the latter by Bacchus and his worshippers, as best adapted to their enthusiastic orgies.⁴ Herein, too, lies the historical import of the long rivalry between the festive solemnities of the two gods. Apollo however became reconciled to the flute. Alcman and Corinna

The popular citations however, of Homer, as an authority for this view, are fallacious. Homer represents both Greeks and Asiatics as equally familiar with the lyre and the flute, each on its proper occasion. (Il. III. 54., IX. 188., XIII. 731., x. 13., XVIII. 495.) Wind instruments had this disadvantage, that the poet could not accompany his own compositions. Every "aulodic" minstrel required an assistant. Nanno accordingly, the mistress of Mimnermus, was his favourite flute-player.

describe him as himself a flute-player.¹ The bond of amity was cemented by the union of the worship and of the favourite instruments of each deity in the Pythian sanctuary.²

To return, however, from the history of the instruments to that of the art which they contributed to adorn, Olympus, the earliest accredited author of these refinements of Greek lyric style, must not be confounded with another Olympus, who, as a mythical reflex of the fame acquired by his successor, occupies a place in Græco-Asiatic legend, similar to that of Amphion, Orpheus, or Musæus, in the fabulous records of Greece.³ The historical reality of the younger Olympus, together with the priority and extent of his influence on Greek musical science, is attested by numerous and competent authors.⁴ Concerning his age, the only specific account places him towards the close of the eighth century B. C., coeval with Midas, king of Phrygia, whose name, like his own and various others celebrated by the Greeks in connexion with that country, denotes both a fabulous hero and a person of real note in national history. The compositions of Olympus are frequently mentioned, by the highest authorities in such matters, as still extant and greatly esteemed in the best ages of Greek art.⁵ Among his imputed inventions is the Enharmonic Scale of Intervals, the ac-knowledgeed foundation of a higher and nobler style of Greek music, chiefly preferred in the accompaniment of hymns to the gods.¹ As there is no authority for Olympus ever having used stringed instruments, this notice supplies an additional evidence that the higher refinements of antient musical art were first developed by Asiatic masters in connexion with the flute, and subsequently adapted to the heptachord lyre by Terpander.² The trochaic order of musical rhythm used in the festivals of Cybele, besides several others popular in later times, was also considered as an invention of Olympus.³ This Phrygian form of trochaic rhythm is understood⁴ to be the same as the galliambic, the powerful effect of which may be appreciated from the spirited ode of Catullus⁵, commencing

Among the more remarkable compositions of Olympus extant in later times were nomes to Apollo, Mars, and Minerva⁶, the latter of which is cited by Pindar. One of those to Apollo was called, from its compass and variety of parts, the Polycephalic, or many-headed Nome.⁷ Another of great celebrity was a processional nome of Cybele, hence called the Harmatian Nome⁸, of the character of which some notion may be formed from the lament uttered by the Phrygian slave in the Orestes of Euripides.⁹ That impetuous outpouring of excited feeling, in broken irregular measure, is described by the complainer himself as the "Harmatian Song."¹ Aristophanes² also alludes to aulodic nomes of Olympus, of a similarly mournful nature, as popular at Athens. All authorities bear testimony to the excellence of his compositions, as combining with passionate fervour great purity and simplicity of character.³

The above notices seem to refer almost exclusively to the musical element of the nomes of Olympus; nor is there any distinct trace of a poetical text having passed current at any period under his name. The ambiguity, however, incident in all languages to the technical phraseology of the two branches of art, and especially among the Greeks, owing to the peculiar closeness of the connexion between the two in the practice of that nation, renders it often difficult or impossible to distinguish whether in such notices allusion be made to poetical or purely musical composition. The term Nome appears, indeed, at all periods to have borne a more immediate reference to the music or air, than the poetry or words of a song. In later times it came to be restricted, in a proper sense, to a certain graver more dignified order of musical composition, both vocal and instrumental, performed in honour chiefly of the greater gods, and on high and solemn occasions.⁴

The only two musicians specially described as disciples of Olympus are Hierax of Argos⁵, and Crates,

Citharædic
nomes, Terpander.

10. Nearly coeval with Olympus was Terpander, by whom were extended to the citharædic branch of lyric composition the same services for which the aulodic branch was indebted to Olympus. This celebrated musician was a native of Lesbos, then the most distinguished seat of the Æolo-Asiatic colonies. In his person, therefore, Æolian genius asserts the same priority and the same preeminence in the art of music which the Iliad and Odyssey had secured for it in that of poetry. The chief seat, however, of his professional activity was Lacedæmon, the centre of Dorian power and Dorian national feeling. His high reputation is figured in the tradition² of his descent from Homer according to some accounts, from Hesiod according to others. In the same fable he inherits the lyre of Orpheus, borne on the waves from the shores of Æolian Greece to those of Æolian Asia, where it was discovered and preserved by fishermen for his use. Other organs of the popular tradition make him a contemporary of Lycurgus; on the principle common with classical antiquaries, of connecting the origin of all the chief institutions of Sparta, among which was the musical system established by Terpander, with the name of her great lawgiver. More distinct and satisfactory is the notice of Hellanicus, who makes Terpander the first victor in the great musical festival of the Carnea, instituted under his own direction in the year 676 B.C.³ He may thus be considered as a generation younger than Olympus, and nearly coeval with Archilochus. Sparta was, at this early period, the state in which musical art was cultivated with the greatest zeal. Her citizens were in the habit of engaging the services of the ablest professors from every part of Hellas. Here accordingly the leading improvements of Terpander were matured and promulgated.

Terpander's connexion with Lacedæmon is said to have originated in an invitation by the Spartan rulers to visit their city during a period of intestine discord. This step was taken by them in obedience to an injunction of the Delphic priestess, by whom the Lesbian musician had been pointed out as the destined means of reconciling the hostile factions. Such is said to have been the effect of his music on those reputed men of iron, that the contending parties, dissolved in tears, embraced each other, and buried all previous differences in oblivion.¹ Fixing his abode in the city, he fulfilled during the remainder of his life the functions of state poet and musician, amid new system of music at Sparta as late as 644 B.C., is strangely at variance with the account of his triumph in the Spartan Carneia in the first year of their institution, thirty years before. It is certainly far more probable that the introduction of his improvements should have been, if not anterior to, simultaneous at least with the institution, under his own auspices, of the national festival where they were publicly sanctioned and reduced to practice. See Appendix B. Nor is there the least notice of any fundamental change in the Spartan system of music after the institution of the Carneia. The date of the chronicle is also, it need hardly be added, repugnant to the received tradition, which describes the revolution effected by Terpander in the musical art and taste of Lacedæmon as simultaneous with his first settlement in the country, not as a work of his old age, after more than thirty years' service as state musician.

universal admiration and esteem. After his death his memory was revered, and his compositions esteemed as models to all succeeding professors of citharædic art. His system continued to flourish, chiefly under Lesbian masters, both at Lacedæmon and elsewhere, up to the time of his countryman Phrynis¹, whose innovations, about the period of the Persian war, were considered as corruptions of the "genuine Hellenic music."² Terpander, besides his victory in the Carnea, conquered four times in the Pythian festival³, at that time apparently the only one of the great Panhellenic solemnities of which competitions in lyric poetry formed a part.

Great as was Terpander's fame as an original genius, his merits would yet appear, from the more authentic notices, to have consisted less in actual discovery, than in the adaptation to Greek tastes and habits of refinements of art already familiar to the cultivated nations of Asia. The most celebrated novelty for which he obtained credit was the invention of the seven-stringed lyre⁴, by the addition of three chords to the old tetrachord instrument. This however cannot be considered, nor has it been so understood by the more critical even of his own countrymen, as indicating the first actual construction of a stringed instrument with the compass of an octave. There can be no doubt that the more civilised nations of Asia possessed, before his time, instruments of equal or greater compass; and Terpander is stated, on no less authority than that of Pindar, to have founded his improvements of the Greek cithara on a Lydian instrument of two octaves, called magadis, which, under the Greek name of pectis or barbiton, he had also the merit of first introducing into Europe.¹

Terpander is also the accredited "inventor" of the art of writing music²; and there can be little doubt of his having possessed a system of notation forming the basis of that still in use. Here again, however, his services are probably to be understood rather in the way of adaptation to native Greek practice than of original discovery. It is difficult to believe that Olympus could not only have carried his branch of art to so high a degree of excellence, but have succeeded in transmitting his many elaborate compositions to posterity, without the aid of some such expedient.

Consistently with his preference of the lyre as the favourite instrument of the old Heroic Muse, Terpander, even in its adaptation to melic poetry, showed a partiality for the antient rhythmical forms. His nomes were chiefly in hexameter verse, and the words of many of them are described, not as his own composition, but portions of the Homeric poems arranged by him to a lyric accompaniment. He was, however, also the author of original poems, though apparently few in number, and with a preference here also for the hexameter or other cognate³ metres. Of these poems several fragments still remain. One is a portion of a hymn or nome to Jupiter, in spondaic measure¹, and marked by both grandeur of conception and harmony of numbers. Of the four pure hexameters which have been preserved, two² recording, in somewhat boastful terms, his substitution of the seven-stringed for the four-stringed lyre, are a less favourable sample of his style. Far superior are two others³ imitated by Pindar, in honour of the combined musical and military genius of Sparta. Pindar's assignment to Terpander of the "invention" of the Scolion or Greek convivial Catch⁴, can hardly be understood as referring to any thing more than improvements in the style or musical accompaniment of that entertainment.

Other early poet-musicians.
Thaletas.

11. The next in celebrity among these early improvers of Greek melic art is Thaletas, a native of Gortys in Crete⁵, and attracted like Terpander to Sparta, as the central seat of musical culture. Like Terpander also he possesses claims to mythical antiquity, but his probable epoch may be placed about a generation subsequent to the Lesbian musician. His chief merit consisted in his application of Terpander's system to the martial and orchestric branches of Spartan state ceremonial, as founder, in the year 665 B. C., of the second of the two great Lacedæmonian musical festivals, that of the Gymnopædia⁶;

⁶ Plut. de M. IX. X. He must not be confounded with another earlier, perhaps mythical Thales or Thaletas, who acts as coadjutor of Lycurgus

Trepander being still more renowned as the author of the first, or Carnea. Of the younger solemnity the war-dance formed the leading feature, and it was distinguished generally by its athletic character from the graver more dignified Carnea.¹ The pyrrhic, and other dances chiefly preferred in the Gymnopædia, were held, like the author of the ceremony, to be of Cretan origin.

The personal history of Thaletas is, in its details, little more than a counterpart of that of Trepander, and may accordingly be considered as somewhat apocryphal. By the power of his music he allayed a pestilence which ravaged the city, and by his soothing influence repressed the factious spirit of the inhabitants, and moulded their wills to the wise purposes of their rulers.² His musical compositions are described as chiefly pæans or hyporchems³, both of which were connected with the rites of Apollo and with the popular exercise of the dance, and were nearly akin to each other. The poetical works ascribed to him were, accordingly, in pæonic measure, and in honour of Apollo; but no remains of them have been preserved. The originality of his productions was questioned by antient critics, some of whom stigmatised him as a plagiarist of Archilochus, others of Olympus. From the latter he is also said to have borrowed the mea-

in his legislative labours. (Plut. in Lycurg. iv., Clinton, F. H. vol. i. pp. 159. 191. 201.) It is however not easy to understand how Clinton, in the face of the authorities which he himself quotes, should have placed the genuine Thaletas, author of the second musical "Catastasis" of the Spartans, earlier than Trepander, the author of the first. sure called, probably from his own partiality for it, the Cretic.¹

Clonas.

Nearly contemporaneous with Thaletas was Clonas², another aulodic musician and poet of elegies and epic hymns, whom the Thebans of Bœotia and the Tegeans of Arcadia each claimed as their citizen. He shares with several other primitive artists the credit of having composed the celebrated trimelic or tripartite nome, so called from consisting of three parts or strophes, each in one of the three chief musical modes or styles, Dorian, Phrygian, and Lydian.

In the arrangement of the Gymnopædia, the name of Thaletas is associated³ by classical authorities with those of four other poet-musicians, Xenodamus of Cythera, Xenocritus of Locris, Polymnestus of Colophon, and Sacadas, of Argos, all, like Thaletas himself, distinguished as performers on the flute or clarionet, the instruments preferred in the Gymnopædia. It is certain, however, that several of these artists belong to a much later epoch than Thaletas. The notice, therefore, of their joint services in regard to the Gymnopædia, must be understood to imply, not a simultaneous exercise of their talents, but their successive modifications or improvements of the solemnity, resulting in the form which it afterwards presented during the flourishing age of the Spartan republic.
